SPECIAL REPORT.

THE SELECT COMMITTEE to whom the "SALE OF LIQUORS ON SUNDAY BILL" was referred, have taken evidence upon the subject, and have agreed to the following SPECIAL REPORT :

1. Your Committee are agreed that in certain parts of the country, and especially in some of the large towns in the north of England, a considerable feeling exists in favour of further restriction upon the sale of intoxicating liquors on Sundays ; that such feeling has been fostered and stimulated by the organisation of temperance societies and by constant efforts on the part of the advocates of further restriction ; that the existence of such feeling has been proved to your Committee by the evidence of witnesses conversant with the state of opinion in those communities, and claiming specially to represent the working classes, by the reports of various public meetings held upon the subject, and by the returns of many canvasses made in large towns with the view of ascertaining the sentiments of the inhabitants upon this question.

2. Your Committee would, however, observe that great caution must be exercised in affixing a value to the results of any such canvass. Although no imputations of dishonesty rest upon the canvassers, it has been proved to your Committee that in many instances the canvass has been of a partial nature, and does not adequately convey the real sense of the community whose opinions it professes to represent. Moreover, it is evident that a canvass conducted by persons whose object it is to obtain a particular expression of opinion is not one of a character to command such implicit confidence as one conducted by more impartial persons. Therefore, whilst so far admitting the value of such canvasses as to accept them as corroborative evidence of the existence of a feeling in favour of further restrictive legislation among a considerable portion of the community, your Committee are of opinion that no proof has been afforded of such a general demand of that nature as should induce Parliament to disregard those other considerations which lead to a different conclusion.

3. It has been proved to your Committee that a very large number of persons make use of public-houses on Sunday against whom no complaint whatever is alleged, and to whom further restrictions to the extent contemplated by the Bill would be productive of serious inconvenience. And whilst this inconvenience would occasion great discontent among such persons, it by no means follows that a commensurate benefit would result with regard to the class against whom such restrictions would be especially directed. Those who drink to excess form a very small per-centage of the whole number of persons who make use of public-houses upon a Sunday, and it is probable that many of these persons, if deprived of their present facilities for obtaining liquor, would have recourse to drinking in private houses and to various methods of evading the law. For however beneficial may be the results of restriction within certain limits, its enforcement to such an extent as to cause any violent interference with the habits of the people has a tendency to create a discontent which is sure to be followed by evasion, the law is brought into disrepute, and effects are not unfrequently produced the very reverse and opposite of those intended by the Legislature.

4. It is, moreover, clear to your Committee that there would be great difficulty in enforcing the restrictions proposed in the Bill. Not only would the duties of the police be materially increased, but the duties so imposed would be at once harassing to them and annoying to the public. To the vexed question of "Who is a bonâ fide traveller?" the Bill would add the question, "What is a bonâ fide meal?" and this is only a sample of the difficulties under which the publican would be obliged to carry on his business.

5. Your Committee would further observe, that the proposed restrictions do not afford any hope of the settlement of the question upon a permanent basis. Most of the advocates of the measure openly avow that they would accept it only as an instalment, and many of them declare their desire to put a stop to the whole retail trade in exciseable liquors. In that trade a very large amount of capital is embarked; and so long as the licensed victuallers and keepers of beershops stand in the position of men carrying on a recognised and legitimate trade, and one moreover subjected to heavy and special taxation, it would be unjust that their operations should be embarrassed, and their property depreciated in value by constant attempts to impose upon them restrictions which do not appear to be demanded by any urgent public necessity. Your Committee however believe it to be a question worthy of consideration, whether it would be advantageous to those licensed victuallers and keepers of beershops who may be desirous of closing their houses on Sunday, that licenses should be granted at a reduced rate for the sale of liquors on week days only; but that it is one upon which they have not felt themselves empowered, by their order of reference, to take such evidence as would guide them to a conclusive opinion.

6. The beneficial working of the Public-houses (Scotland) Acts, 1854-62, which has been declared by a Royal Commission, and of which evidence has been given before your Committee, does not in their opinion establish any proof that a law similar or approaching it in strictness would be either acceptable or expedient in England. For even those witnesses who spoke to the success of the Scotch law admitted that there was so remarkable a difference between the habits of the English and those of the Scotch people in their use of public-houses, that your Committee are of opinion that no trustworthy inference could be drawn from the fact of that success.

7. Although it cannot be denied that drunkenness, to a considerable extent, both on Sundays and other days, is to be found in this country, yet the admission appears to be general that the present law is working well, and that under its operation a great diminution of drunkenness has taken place. From this fact it has been argued that further restrictions would lead to further diminution, but, having regard to the experience of the past, and to the agitation consequent upon the passing of a less stringent measure than the present in 1854, which measure was repealed in the following year, your Committee are inclined to believe that the safe limit of restrictive legislation has been reached, and that further measures in the same direction would be unwise and injudicious. The praiseworthy exertions of the advocates of temperance must not be undervalued. These have, no doubt, materially contributed to the diminution of drunkenness, and simultaneously with these exertions, and the salutary influence exercised by the ministers of religion, the opening, in several of our large towns, of parks and other places wherein fresh air and innocent recreation may be obtained by the working classes upon Sunday, has drawn many of them from public-house associations, and induced them to spend their only leisure day in a manner more advantageous to themselves and to their families. Other causes have likewise contributed to this desirable result.

8. The concurrent testimony of all the witnesses proves that for many years past there has been a steady, decided, and progressive improvement in the morals, habits, tastes, and manners of the people. The advance of education, the wider wider diffusion of knowledge, and the moral influences which have been brought to bear upon them, have doubtless all combined to produce this satisfactory result. Regarding, then, this general improvement, and at the same time bearing in mind the fact that the habits of the upper and middle classes of society are far more temperate at the present day than was the case in the early part of the century, your Committee are of opinion that it is not too much to hope that as the working classes also advance in self-improvement, and are actuated by that self-respect which is engendered by improved education, the vice of drunkenness will gradually disappear without the necessity of further coercive measures on the part of the Legislature. In this view your Committee cannot recommend the passing of the Bill referred to their consideration, and would rather trust to the progressive improvement discernible under the present law, and to the further development of those moral influences to which they have already referred.

A letter from Rev. Dawson Burns to the Chairman was handed in, read, and ordered to be printed (vide Appendix).

Mr. George Candelet and Mr. Arthur James Johnes were severally examined.

Room cleared; the Committee deliberated.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That, considering that the present law has worked most beneficially, and that drunkenness is steadily diminishing, the Committee are of opinion that further legislation of a restrictive character is not required"—(Mr. Roebuck).—Amendment proposed, to leave out from the words "that the," to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "Restrictions now placed by law on public-houses and beer-houses on the Sunday are shown to have worked beneficially in diminishing drunkenness, and that very great numbers of the working classes desire still further restriction, your Committee are of opinion that further legislation in that direction will be attended with public advantage"—(Mr. John Abel Smith)—instead thereof.—Question proposed, That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question.—Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Another Amendment proposed, to leave out from the word "That," to the end of the Question, in order to insert the words "believing that the restrictions established by the present law have worked beneficially in diminishing drunkenness, your Committee, while they think some of the restrictions proposed by the present Bill to be unnecessary, are of opinion that an earlier closing of public-houses on Sunday evenings will be attended with public advantage"—(Mr. Hibbert)—instead thereof.—Question put, That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question.—The Committee divided:

Special Report proposed by Mr. John Abel Smith, read a first time, as follows :—

“ The Committee appointed to consider the Sunday Sale of Liquors Bill, and the questions immediately connected therewith, beg to report to your Honourable House, as follows :

Witnesses examined.

“ 1. The Committee have examined 59 witnesses, pursuing diversified occupations, and occupying various social positions, who have shown themselves, more or less, acquainted with the condition of the people, and with their sentiments upon the subject of this inquiry. This list of witnesses was composed of two Members of the House of Commons, D. M'Laren, Esq., M. P. for Edinburgh; and the Honourable F. H. Berkeley, M. P. for Bristol. Four London stipendiary magistrates, Sir T. Henry (Bow-street), T. B. Burcham, Esq. (Southwark), E. H. Woolrych, Esq. (Lambeth), C. E. Ellison, Esq. (Worship-street). One provincial stipendiary magistrate, A. Bigge, Esq. (Brighton). One county court judge, A. J. Johnes (Midland Wales). Three justices of the peace, R. Gladstone, Esq. (Liverpool), D. Lupton, Esq. (Leeds), C. Bushell, Esq. (Neston, Cheshire). Three mayors, T. Avery, Esq. (Birmingham); R. S. Newall, Esq. (Gateshead); J. Barlow, Esq. (Bolton). Seven chiefs of police, Sir Richard Mayne (Metropolitan), Major Greig (Liverpool), Captain Palin (Manchester), Mr. Jackson (Sheffield), Mr. Glossop (Birmingham), Mr. Enright (Southampton), Captain Segrave (Wolverhampton). Two magistrates' clerks, Mr. Eldridge (Southampton), Mr. Wybergh (Liverpool). Four aldermen and town councillors, Mr. Alderman Mackie (Manchester), Mr. Alderman Fisher (Sheffield), Mr. Elliott (Plymouth), Mr. Beal (Sheffield). Twelve ministers of different religious persuasions, Archbishop Manning (London), Rev. Dr. Garrett (Manchester), Rev. Newman Hall, LL. B. (London); Rev. Cyril Page (London), Rev. G. M. Murphy (London), Rev. Dr. White (Liverpool), Rev. E. Jackson (Leeds), Rev. S. A. Steintal (Manchester), Rev. J. Flather (Sheffield), Rev. T. de Vine (Newcastle-under-Lyne), Rev. E. Mathews (Bristol), Rev. G. W. M'Cree (London). One superintendent of towns' missions, Mr. Jowett (Bradford). Twelve large employers of labour, or persons intimately acquainted with bodies of working men, J. Howard, Esq. (Bedford), R. Waygood, Esq. (London), Mr. G. Walker (Leeds), Mr. G. Freshwater (Bedford), Mr. Potter (London), Mr. Leicester (London), Mr. W. Cockburn (Pease's ironstone mines, Yorkshire), Mr. Morrell (London), Mr. West (London), Mr. J. Wilson (Sheffield), Mr. W. Aitken (Ashton-under-Lyne), Mr. W. Rea (Stockport). Four prominent members of licensed victuallers' associations, Mr. Smith (London), Mr. Winterbotham (London), Mr. Wadhams (Birmingham), Mr. Candelet (Manchester); and three persons otherwise engaged, Mr. Rowland (London), Mr. Staton (Sheffield), and Mr. Henshall (Gorton, near Manchester).

Principal subjects of inquiry.

“ 2. The witnesses above enumerated were examined at 18 sittings of the Committee, and the questions, 8,488 in number, traversed and re-traversed the whole of the ground comprehended within the present inquiry. The leading points upon which information was chiefly sought and supplied were four: 1st. The influence of legislation already restricting the period for selling intoxicating drinks, especially on Sunday; 2ndly. The extent to which intemperance and social demoralisation are still induced by the Sunday traffic in strong drink, and their probable reduction by legislative action; 3rdly. The measure of acquiescence and support, on the one hand, or of disapproval and opposition on the other, which additional limitations on the Sunday traffic in strong drink would receive from the public generally, and the working classes in particular; 4thly. The nature and force of the objections entertained by those who oppose further restrictions. On each of these points we proceed to summarise the salient features of the evidence submitted.

First subject of inquiry.

“ 3. I. The legislation which at present restricts the period during which intoxicating liquors are legally sold on Sunday has been almost unanimously approved by the witnesses examined. They agree in attributing to it a diminution of the Sunday intemperance formerly formerly prevalent, and a preventive influence of important and permanent value. Referring to restrictive enactments, Sir Richard Mayne said (Q. 189), 'They have been useful.' Again (Q. 202), 'There would be greater drunkenness if there were no restrictions.' Again, when asked (Q. 203), 'Do the evasions bear any proportion to that state of drunkenness which would exist if there were no restrictions?' he replied, 'No, I think not.'

General approval of present legislation on the Sunday sale of intoxicating liquors.
Sir Richard Mayne's evidence.

"Mr. Burcham, stipendiary magistrate of Southwark, said (Q. 556), 'I do not go so far as to say that I am against all restrictions, because certain restrictions are reasonable, and, I think, necessary.' Mr. Woolrych, stipendiary magistrate, of Lambeth, who was asked by Mr. Roebuck (Q. 659), 'I presume that you believe that restriction has hitherto been beneficial in keeping down drunkenness?' replied, 'Yes, I do believe so.'

Mr. Burcham's evidence.
Mr. Woolrych's evidence.

"Mr. Ellison, stipendiary magistrate, of Worship-street, said, in answer to Q. 848, 'that the measures referred to had worked well.'

Mr. Ellison's evidence.

"Major Greig, chief constable of Liverpool, on being asked (Q. 890) whether the Wilson Patten Act of 1854 was beneficial, replied, 'Yes, particularly so.'

Major Greig's evidence.

"Mr. Jackson, chief constable of Sheffield, certified from his own observation at Oldham, that the same Act 'had the effect of diminishing drunkenness considerably.' (Q. 1469.)

Mr. Jackson's evidence.

"In reply to the Question 1740, 'Can you bring to mind any one instance in which restrictions on the facilities of getting drink have been otherwise than good?' Mr. Glossop, chief constable of Birmingham, answered, 'I cannot.' The late superintendent of police at Southampton, Mr. Enright, said (Q. 4436) that the operation of restrictive laws in that town had been attended 'with very much benefit,' thus confirming the testimony of Mr. Eldridge, the clerk to the Southampton bench (Q. 3850), 'I am quite sure that past restrictions have worked usefully.' Concerning the effects of the Act of 1854, Mr. Lupton, a magistrate of Leeds, and a great promoter of popular improvements, declared (Q. 3206), 'Yes, it was very beneficial, as far as Leeds was concerned, and we were very sorry when it was repealed; it had a very important effect.'

Mr. Glossop's evidence.

Mr. Enright's evidence.

Mr. Eldridge's evidence.

Evidence of D. Lupton, Esq., J.P.

"The testimony of Mr. George Potter, president of the London Working Men's Association, is decided on the same point; for when asked (Q. 5047): 'Certain restrictive laws now exist with reference to drinking, particularly on Sunday; do you believe that those restrictive laws, as far as they have gone, have been beneficial in their operation?' He replied, 'I believe they have been greatly beneficial.'

Mr. George Potter's evidence.

"A few examples, however, occurred of dissent from this all but universal belief. Sir Thomas Henry, stipendiary magistrate of Bow-street, asserted (Q. 376), that 'he did not believe that if public-houses were opened on Sunday morning drunkenness would be increased;' yet he had previously extolled (Q. 351) the Act closing public-houses on week-days from one to four a.m., as 'the most useful Act that ever was passed for the purpose of preventing drunkenness.'

Sir T. Henry's opinion against Sunday morning closing, but approval of the Closing Act of 1864.

"Mr. Waygood 'denied (Q. 7033) that restriction had anything whatever to do with 'the moral improvement of workmen;' but the same witness also gave evidence (Q. 7045) that he had seen 900 persons drunk on one Sunday morning, on Glasgow-green; and that a credible gentleman had seen 2,000 in that condition, in the same place; and he also gave it as his opinion (Q. 7066) that the reign of Queen Victoria 'is the most unfortunate which the future historian would have to record.' Another witness against the Bill referred to the Committee, Mr. Beale, of Sheffield, said 'he did not think past restrictions had been beneficial' (Q. 7718); and Mr. Wybergh, clerk to the Liverpool magistrates, avowed (Q. 7549), 'I have no faith whatever in restrictive laws on this subject;' but however useful such opinions may be as a means of testing the reliance to be placed on other opinions against further restrictions, these witnesses were flatly contradicted upon the above point by other witnesses who were likewise opposed to the Bill. Mr. Morrell (Q. 6445) confessed that closing up to one o'clock on Sunday had 'decidedly diminished drunkenness.' Mr. Staton, of Bolton, after asserting that he did not think existing restrictions had diminished drunkenness (Q. 7232), admitted that the closing up to one o'clock had been 'beneficial, and that the law had had a good effect' (Q. 7290). Captain Segrave, chief constable of Wolverhampton, said (Q. 7326) that 'the present Act works very satisfactorily.' Mr. Wilson, of Sheffield (Q. 7868), was 'sure the Sunday morning closing had led to good.' Mr. Aitken, of Ashton (Q. 8186), regarded the same practice as 'a very great advantage, decidedly.' Mr. Henshall (Q. 8433) 'approved of present restrictions.' Mr. Wadham (Q. 8049) believed they had done 'a great amount of good.' Mr. Candelet (Q. 6514) 'was free to admit that the restrictions which closed public-houses on Sundays to one o'clock after Divine service, 'was of value to a large portion of the working classes.' Mr. Wadham suggested (Q. 8004) that the efficiency of the Sunday morning closing would be increased by appointing a superior class of police to supervise the public-houses, 'because,' he said, 'I have no doubt at all that there is a great temptation in the way of the police officer who goes to visit these places.'

Second subject of inquiry.

Representations as to the small extent of drunkenness on Sunday.

Based on a forgetfulness of important facts.

"Some important evidence was submitted as to the effect of restrictions, where they extend to the whole of Sunday. Archbishop Manning entered at some length into the facts relating to the Sunday closing of public-houses in the Roman Catholic diocese of Cashel, through 'a voluntary and spontaneous compact by the people with the clergy, and 'with one another;' and the tendency of this arrangement is stated by close observers on the spot, to be (Q. 2399) 'to make temperance a public virtue, and to make men temperate every day in the week, as well as on Sunday. The committals for drunkenness on Sunday, which were before very numerous, have become nil. In one bridewell, every Monday morning, there used to be from a dozen to 20 persons for drunkenness on Sunday; now there is seldom one; for three months not one committal for drunkenness.' The evidence of another witness, Rev. G. M. Murphy, relates to Guernsey (5547), 'where the entire population is almost a working-class population, and they close the public-houses entirely on the Sunday there, not only without inconvenience, but with so much advantage from the restrictive principle, that now they are making a canvass through the various parishes to get the people to go to the Estates court for restricting the sale of 'drink altogether.'

"Concerning the effect of the law in Scotland, under which all sale of liquor is prohibited from 11 on Saturday night to 8 o'clock on Monday morning, Mr. M'Laren, M.P., for Edinburgh, has afforded information of a very instructive kind. Immediately the Scottish Act began to operate (in May) it was found possible to save the expense of a new prison for the county and city of Edinburgh, which was about to be erected; and although the remarkable diminution of the consumption of ardent spirits in Scotland may in part be attributed to other causes, especially to the increase of the revenue duty returns put in by Mr. M'Laren, clearly attest the powerful and salutary operation of the Sunday Closing Act. In 1853, the total of helpless drunkards taken up in Edinburgh were 5,727, in 1855 they were 5,014, and in 1867 they had sunk to 1,915. Of this number, the Sunday drunkards in 1853 were 641, in 1855 they were 389, and in 1867 they were 164. Of these again, the number found drunk between eight on Sunday morning and eight on Monday, were 337 in 1853, in 1854 there were 176, and in 1867 there were 33. Monday drunkenness has also greatly diminished. The daily average of persons in the great county and city prison was 531 in 1853, in 1855 it was 371, in 1867 it was 337; nor is it a small consideration that this diminution of drunkenness and crime should have been continuous in the face of an increasing population. In regard to the Royal Commission which was appointed in 1859, Mr. M'Laren remarked (2672) that the Commissioners 'did not merely 'stay in Edinburgh, but went to different towns and important districts in Scotland, and 'took evidence upon the spot, and the evidence was overwhelming in favour of the Act, 'and they reported accordingly.' The public opinion in Scotland at the present time concerning the entire Sunday Closing Act is thus deposed to (2674): 'I think the longer 'that the experience has been, these Acts are more and more valued, and I should think 'that Members from all parts of Scotland, boroughs and counties, would strenuously resist 'the repeal of those Acts.'

"The testimonies and facts above adduced are a complete answer to the simply abstract arguments advanced against a restrictive policy (such as the right of a person to do what he pleases, unless in so doing he directly produces some perceptible mischief),—arguments which are usually so advanced without a perception on the part of those who use them, that they are as available against the degrees of restrictions already in force, and confessedly of great value, as they are against other degrees of restriction which may be desired on the ground of the general weal.

"4. II. The extent of Sunday intemperance, with its consequent evils, and the probable effect of legislation further restricting the hours of Sunday traffic in drink, were questions upon which considerable diversity of opinion was manifested by the witnesses examined. It was represented by some of the witnesses against the Bill that intemperance on the Sunday was small in amount and comparatively insignificant in its results; and in support of this view appeal was made to statistics showing that the persons taken up for drunkenness on Sunday bear only a small proportion to the bulk of the population. But such a method of reasoning is based on assumptions directly contrary to evidence laid before the Committee, showing, first, that but a fraction of the public intemperance ever gets entered on the police sheet; secondly, that great demoralisation is consequent on Sunday drinking that stops short of open drunkenness; and thirdly, that great misery to families, and injury to industrial operations are produced, altogether apart from the drunkenness committed to the police cell, or brought before the police court.

"In the careful and able Report of the Committee on Public-houses, in 1854, it is stated,— "That 'in considering the question of the existing state of the law in its bearing on 'public morals, they have to observe that there are no sufficient statistics to enable the 'average amount of drunkenness in the United Kingdom to be stated with any approach 'to accuracy.'

"Further, that 'the evidence before the Committee is sufficient to show that the 'amount of drunkenness is very much greater than appears on the face of any official 'returns.'

"Again,

"Again, 'The testimony is universal that the greatest amount of drinking takes place 'on Saturday night and during the hours that the houses are allowed by law to be open 'on Sunday.'

"Your Committee concur in the accuracy of these conclusions.

"(1.) The police statistics are no accurate gauge of public drunkenness; in such cases 'it is dangerous,' as Sir Thomas Henry said (344), 'to trust to mere returns.' Sir Richard Mayne, when asked (166), 'What are the instructions given to policemen with regard to drunken cases?' replied, 'That if a person is merely drunk, and not exposed to danger either of person or property, he should be got home, if his home is known.' And the effect of this regulation is pithily summed up in the answer of another witness, Rev. G. W. M'Cree (6144): 'A serjeant of police in St. Giles's, a few days ago, said to 'me, that a wise policeman never interferes with a drunken man if he can help it.' Major Greig says, of even the Liverpool statistics (1007): 'Those figures are perfectly 'truthful; but, for instance, in the case of any person, although he may be very much 'under the influence of liquor, if he is quiet, the police have orders to advise him to go home, 'and not get into trouble; and then, with regard to those "refused charges," whenever 'there is an opportunity, or there is any chance of a person finding his way home, he is 'not detained.'

"Mr. Glossop's testimony as to the rule in Birmingham is similar: (Q. 1588.) 'If they 'are very drunk, you always keep them?—Yes; and if they were not, we certainly would not interfere with them.' (Q. 1589) 'What general instructions do you give your police 'on that matter?—Not to interfere with persons if they are able to go home.'

Evidence of Mr. Glossop.

"The Mayor of Bolton describes the practice adopted in that town: 'It is not a true 'description of the entire drunkenness; we do not take people up for being drunk merely, 'it is only when they are drunk and disorderly, or drunk and incapable.' (4213.)

Evidence of the Mayor of Bolton.

"The Rev. G. M. Murphy gives evidence of what practically occurs in respect to a large number of public-houses on the south side of the Thames (5436): 'I have estimated that, 'on the very lowest average, on every Sunday night, at least half a dozen persons are 'turned out of each of those places helplessly drunk, or nearly so. I was mentioning that to two friends of mine, two navvies, yesterday, and asking them whether they thought my 'average an excessive one, and one of them stated, "All I can say is, that I lived in this "street some time ago, and out of that public-house at the corner I have seen 50 persons "turned out drunk between Saturday night and Sunday night.' "

Statement of Rev. G. M. Murphy.

"(2.) The effect of public-house drinking, when falling short of intoxication, is often very injurious, and exceedingly so to the young. The Rev. E. Jackson, who is actively interested in one of the lowest parishes of Leeds, remarks (3235): 'If I was to be asked to 'single out any one cause which is productive of hurtful results to the working man more 'than others, I should say the opening of public-houses and beer-houses on Sunday for 'drinking on the premises.'

Public-house drinking very injurious, especially to the young.

"Mr. Jackson again says at (3251), 'Of all classes of the community females are the 'class to whom the public-house influence on a Sunday is the most deadly. A girl from '14 to 18, once drawn to the public-house to drink on Sunday evening is almost certain 'to fall; and my experience in connection with the Penitentiary of Leeds, which we call 'our Guardian Asylum, of which I am generally chairman, has ever been to that effect, 'that those who are brought there in a great measure have to trace their fall to their 'having been drawn to the public-house on Sunday.'

Evidence of Rev. E. Jackson.

"Mr. Howard, the large employer of labour at Bradford, observes (4812), 'I may say 'that the fathers of families felt very strongly upon the question, and said that the opening 'of public-houses on Sunday was a great temptation to the junior members of their family; 'that they could manage them during the week, when they were at work, but on Sunday 'they had very great difficulty in controlling them.'

Evidence of J. Howard, Esq.

"Mr. Lupton, J.P., who is a great promoter of social reform in Leeds, observes (3050), 'of all classes of the community, young women are most damaged by Sunday drinking.'

Evidence of D. Lupton, Esq., J.P.

"The Rev. G. W. M'Cree gave evidence (6181), 'I have had a letter from the country 'stating that a correspondent of mine found 20 boys and girls drinking in the back pre-mises of a public-house on a Sunday evening, and he recognised most of them as Sunday 'scholars; therefore, the benefit received in the Sunday school on the morning of Sunday 'is counteracted by the demoralization of Sunday evening.'

Evidence of Rev. G. W. M'Cree.

"Rev. Newman Hall, minister of Surrey Chapel, Blackfriars-road, asserts (2558), 'Anyone here or elsewhere who would undertake to devote three or four hours on the 'Sunday to elevate the people, socially and intellectually, just to raise them up from their 'degraded condition, and endeavour to do them good by personal effort, would at once 'find the great antagonism of this Sunday drinking, and would at once feel the im-portance of such a movement as this.'

Evidence of Rev. N. Hall.

"(3.) The relation of Sunday drinking to domestic misery and week-day idleness has been aptly illustrated by several of the witnesses before the Committee. According to an estimate by Mr. Candelet, Secretary of the Manchester and Provincial Licensed Victuallers' League, the sum of 8,000 £. is the profit every Sunday on the sales of the Relation of Sunday drinking to domestic misery and week-day idleness.

Estimate of Sunday receipts of publicans.

5,340 licensed victuallers connected with that association. The estimate is certainly a low one, as it amounts to but 30 s. profit per house per Sunday; yet, if the same estimate applies to all public-houses in England (68,000), a total of 100,000 l. profit is obtained in these houses each Sunday, or 5,200,000 l. yearly on the Sundays of every year. If but a fifth is added for the 45,000 beer-shops, a total of 6,240,000 l. profits is arrived at; and it is impossible to suppose that this enormous sum can be obtained, so much of it from the working class, without serious detriment to the domestic comforts of their wives and children.

Evidence of D.
Lupton, Esq., J.P.

"Mr. Lupton, in answer to the question (Q. 3063), 'You believe that the men and their families would be better and happier if Sunday drinking were entirely suppressed?' replied, 'It is a proposition about which any man acquainted with the working classes 'could not have the slightest doubt.' Major Greig, head of the Liverpool police, was asked (Q. 1043), 'Do you believe that the women and children would benefit very 'largely in Liverpool if the expenditure of the working men on beer on Sunday was 'reduced?' and he replied 'No doubt of it.' He was asked again (Q. 1044), 'A very 'considerable amount of the earnings of those men are spent on Saturday night and 'Sunday in the public-houses, are they not?' and he answered 'Yes, and that money 'is diverted from the clothing and education of their family.' These effects are not produced by set intention, but, according to Archbishop Manning (Q. 2385), 'by the 'excessive and dangerous facilities afforded to the working classes on Saturday night and 'Sunday, by which they are drawn from their better resolutions, and spend all their 'honest wages;' and it is not, therefore, surprising that benevolent gentlemen, like Mr. Howard, twice mayor of Bedford, should be able to say (4814), 'The feelings of 'the women, not only in my official capacity, but in my capacity as a manufacturer, are 'often brought home to me, and I know that the great grief of the wives of the working 'men is, that all their troubles are brought upon them by drink.'

Archbishop
Manning's evidence.

Evidence of
J. Howard, Esq.

Mr. Wilson's
evidence.

"Mr. Wilson, of Sheffield, testified to the existence of a large class in that town, popularly known as those 'who burned charcoal on Sundays; that means keeping in their 'houses, because they have no clothes to appear out in.' It is the testimony of the Rev. Newman Hall (2552) that 'Sunday drinking deprives the wife and the children of much 'money which otherwise would go to the comfort of the household; it interferes, as I 'have already said, with religious liberty, and the religious life of the women, who are 'frequently, by their husbands drinking on Sunday, prevented from being at the House 'of God.'

Evidence of Rev.
N. Hall.

Mr. Leicester's
evidence.

"The effects thus induced do not terminate with the Sunday. Mr. Leicester, who is conversant with the habits of working men of superior skill, states (5682), 'I find that 'Sunday tippling leads to Monday drinking; and I believe that the very cream of the 'Bill which you have had the honour of bringing into Parliament is, that it does not allow 'tippling on the premises.'

Rev. G. W. M'Cree's
evidence.

"The Rev. G. W. M'Cree, who for more than 20 years has been acquainted with St. Giles, declares (6115), 'I have been in the habit of visiting the poor in their homes 'on the Monday and during all the week, and I have always found a larger proportion of 'drunkenness to have existed on the Sunday, and consequently a larger amount of misery, 'and unhappiness, and vice existing on the Monday and Tuesday, in consequence of 'Sunday drinking.'

Mr. Cockburn's
evidence.

"Mr. Cockburn, the foreman of Messrs. Pease's ironstone mines, in Yorkshire, has given evidence (5951) of a loss of labour, not properly accounted for, of '78 out of 592, equal to three-fourths of a day each man per week, and this he largely ascribes to Sunday drinking. He adds (5953), 'It entails very serious loss upon the owners of pro- 'perty themselves, and not only upon them, but upon all the various works which are 'depending upon their works, as they are the producers of the raw material, and there 'is the same staff to keep for the Monday, Tuesday, and Wednesday, of clerks and officers, 'and men about the place, as there is on the Thursday, Friday, and Saturday; and that 'gives something like three-halfpence more per ton in the working cost for the first three 'days.' And he proceeds to state (5934), 'their being off on the Monday, Tuesday, and 'Wednesday is from the effects of their drinking, principally, on the Sabbath day.' Mr. Howard, of Bedford, bears similar testimony (4796): 'We have more absentees on 'Monday than on any other day.' Referring to employers of labour in Leeds, Mr. Lupton remarks (3061), 'Many of them deplore that good hands do often give way 'to drinking on the Sunday, and are unable to come to their work on the Monday morn- 'ing, and that they have to turn them off occasionally as an example to the other men break- 'ing time to such an extent as many of them do.'

Mr. Howard's
evidence.

Mr. Lupton's
evidence.

Mr. Walker's
evidence.

"Mr. Walker deposes to the same connection (3422), 'I have known instances, and I 'believe many more could be given, where men have been kept from the public-house on 'a Sunday, and have been at their work on the Monday; but if they have had access 'to the public-house on Sunday, they invariably broke their time on two days in the 'week.'

Mr. Jowett's
evidence.

"A similar explanation is supplied by Mr. Jowett, of Bradford (3536): 'In many 'trades, such as boiler-makers, smiths, brick-setters, and in some cases engine-fitters and 'moulders, those who are off drinking on Sunday morning hinder those who are their 'mates

'mates or partners in work for Monday, and very often for Tuesday. I have had 'sorrowful experience of that myself, and I know that there are thousands of cases of that 'kind.'

"Important evidence on this head is furnished by the Rev. G. M. Murphy (5463): 'Before I came to London I was associated with the large firm of Sir Charles Fox and 'Mr. John Henderson, at Birmingham. Sir Charles Fox has stated (and it quite bears 'out my own views of the matter) that the large majority of accidents in connection 'with their extensive works occurred on the Monday, and were the results of unsteadiness 'occasioned by the Sunday's drinking. I had an opportunity of asking Sir Charles Fox, 'within the last fortnight, as to whether he still coincided with that opinion, and he said 'that he did; and that he should be quite willing to ratify anything that he had said upon 'that subject.'

Rev. G. M. Murphy's statement of Sir C. Fox's opinion.

"The inference suggested by evidence of the character above cited, that farther restrictive legislation is admissible and desirable, was strongly advanced by many of the witnesses themselves. The opposite sentiment was indeed expressed by several magistrates and the chief constable of Wolverhampton, but no satisfactory reason was assigned for an opinion which resembles rather a foregone conclusion than a deduction from a body of well-established facts. Nothing was elicited in examination to prove that the limits of judicious legislation had been reached, or that a power operating for good up to the existing boundary would cease to act, or act in a reverse direction, if that boundary should become in any degree extended. Mr. Woolrych, stipendiary magistrate of Lambeth, though evidencing a bias unfavourable to restriction, acknowledged (676), that 'upon 'the whole there would be a diminution of drunkenness;' and added, 'Even allowing 'that there might be private drinking, drinking by associated bodies, and so on, on the 'whole, I think that probably there would be a diminution.' Major Greig, chief of the Liverpool police, gave a very decided opinion (921): 'I have had a great deal of conversation upon this point with clergymen, and in two cases with two eminent brewers, and 'with the people generally, and I give you the opinion of 1,100 men, because in all matters of consequence, I take the opinion of those who are the seniors in the force, and 'they are one and all of opinion that if the hours were curtailed so the drunkenness 'would diminish.'

Inference in favour of further restrictions on the Sunday sale of liquors.

Mr. Woolrych's opinion of the effects of further restrictions.

Major Greig's opinion.

"In answering a question (1063) he said, 'I think that it would produce great general 'good.'

"Mr. Bigge, stipendiary magistrate of Brighton, gave it as his belief (2028) 'That 'further restriction would prevent drunkenness, and it is a thing to be desired.' Not less decided was the expressed opinion of Mr. George Potter, President of the London Working Men's Association, who said (5039), 'I believe that restriction could be carried 'further with benefit not only to them, but to other classes of society also.' By far the greater number of the other witnesses expressed the same conviction.

Mr. Bigge's opinion.

Mr. Potter's opinion.

"5. III. The question, whether further restrictions on the Sunday Sale of Liquor would be popular or otherwise, was a point warmly contested before your Committee. Those who affirmed that they would not be popular, had seldom any evidence to adduce except impressions gathered from personal observation or casual converse. The advocates of restriction mainly relied on the evidence afforded by great public meetings, by numerous petitions, and by special canvasses of localities and trades. With regard to Liverpool, the Rev. Dr. White (2941), testified to the holding of 'immense meetings crowding the largest 'buildings,' and to a town canvass resulting in 44,149 signatures of householders in favour of entire Sunday closing, 3,300 signatures against, and 6,417 signatures in favour of closing except for two hours, during which no drink should be consumed upon the premises. These signatures, when classified, showed that of the artisan and labouring classes, 29,920 were in favour of entire closing, compared with 2,121 against any change of the law. It also appears (2884), that 759 Liverpool publicans signed a paper in favour of entire Sunday closing, and that 113 others declared themselves verbally in favour of such a measure.

The third subject of inquiry.

The popularity or otherwise of increased restrictions.

Rev. Dr. White's evidence concerning Liverpool.

"Mr. Wybergh, when asked whether his own opinion against further restriction was shared by the inhabitants of Liverpool generally, answered (7566), 'Possibly not;' and on being further asked, 'Perhaps more than possibly not?' answered (7567), 'Very likely not.' As to Manchester, Captain Palin, chief of the police, when asked (1513), 'Would the public opinion at Manchester sanction some further restriction?' replied, 'I 'gather the impression from what I have heard, that it would sanction it;' and when asked (1322), 'Whether the wives of working men would approve of it, and consider it to be in 'their interests?' he said, 'I think they would.' The Rev. S. A. Steinthal affirmed the existence of a strongly preponderant public opinion in Manchester in favour of very extensive restrictions, and presented the figures of a canvass of a ward, the lowest as regards moral condition, showing for entire Sunday closing 1,474 householders, 364 against, 175 neutral, 201 forms refused, 203 persons out when called on, and 48 houses empty. The returns of a general Manchester household canvass showed 27,612 affirmative replies, 4,070 negatives, and 2,190 neutrals. Concerning Birmingham, Mr. Glossop, the chief constable, when asked (1741), 'Whether the upper classes, the middle classes, 'and the more respectable portion, and the better conducted portion, of the working 'classes, would be in favour of further restrictions on Sunday,' replied, 'I think they 'would;'

would;' and when asked (1742), 'Would those who would be dissatisfied, and who would complain, be a very marked minority?' he answered 'Yes.'

The Mayor of Birmingham's opinion. "The Mayor of Birmingham also stated (1952) that 'the conclusion he had arrived at was, that public opinion is advancing in the direction of additional restrictions upon the liquor trade.'

Rev. E. Jackson's evidence as to Leeds. As to Leeds, Rev. E. Jackson gave evidence (3263) of a great meeting held above 10 years ago in the Cloth Hall, attended by 10,000 persons, when a resolution approving of entire closing was carried by a large majority. 'Again, four years ago, in a borough meeting held in the large Town Hall of Leeds, and crammed with men amounting to 1,400 or 1,500 people, only five hands were held up against total closing. Again, a body of working men came to me two years ago, and offered themselves to canvass amongst their work-fellows for the affirmative for Sunday closing; and I have this morning received from Leeds the first instalment of the canvass of the families, from door to door, which has taken place in only a portion of one ward, but that ward is pre-eminently a working man's ward, and the result is this, that out of 1,129 families in the East Ward of Leeds, who have been called upon within the last three or four days, for closing entirely there were 802, against closing there were 204, and neutral 123. And, from my knowledge of working men, and my continual intercourse with them, I have not the slightest doubt that, if it depended upon a popular vote, we should carry it by five out of six, or six out of seven, throughout the whole borough of Leeds.'

Mr. Lupton's evidence as to Leeds. "Mr. Lupton gave evidence (3032) of a recent meeting in the Working Men's Institute, attended by 400 or 500 working men, when every hand but one was held up in favour of Mr. Smith's Bill. Mr. Lupton also stated (3061), 'I have spoken to a great many, and some of them representative men, in almost every class, and there is a complete concurrence of opinion that it would be a most desirable measure.' It may be added, that Mr. Lupton declared himself (3208) to have been authorised by a distinct resolution of the Leeds magistrates to represent their views to the Select Committee in favour of the Bill. In reference to Bradford, Mr. Jowett says (3571), 'I really do believe that I am speaking the feelings of an overwhelming majority of the people of Bradford when saying that the town would be in favour of further restriction on Sunday drinking.'

Mr. Jowett's opinion as to Bradford.

Evidence of D. M'Laren, Esq., M.P., as to Edinburgh. "As to Edinburgh, where entire Sunday closing is carried out, Mr. M'Laren, M.P., said (2724), 'I think, if you were to poll the working classes of Edinburgh, an enormous majority of them would be in favour of the present state of the law.' The Mayor of Gateshead said (5208), 'I think the opinion there is very much in favour of restricting the hours,' and he explained (5209) that he referred to 'both the magistrates and the working men; those with whom I come in contact.' The stipendiary magistrate of Brighton said of the respectable working class of that town (2041), 'I think they are in favour of further restriction.' Of Plymouth, Mr. Elliott testified (5314), 'The working classes generally are in favour of increased restrictions.' Concerning Cornwall, with which Mr. Elliott is connected by business, he said (5332), the feeling there among working men is much stronger than it is in Plymouth in favour of restriction.

Rev. E. Mathews' evidence as to Bristol. Rev. E. Mathews stated (6096) that a house canvass of Bristol had procured 13,785 returns thus classified; yeas, 8,829; nays, 1,822; neutral and not voted, 3,134; a representation of public sentiment which may well be placed by the side of the statement that 4,000 electors had signed an address to the Hon. F. H. Berkeley, requesting him to exercise his unfettered judgment on the Bill referred to this Committee. Concerning Bolton, one witness states (Mr. Staton, 7149) that the public opinion is not favourable to further restriction, but opposite evidence is furnished by the Mayor, who asserts (4025) that, 'for many years there have been large public meetings held upon the subject, from 2,000 to 3,000 have generally assembled, and the votes have been almost unanimous regularly; and also (4028) that, as the result of a house canvass, 9,717 papers were collected, 6,377 of which were in favour of entire Sunday closing, 1,783 against, and 1,557 neutral.

Evidence concerning Bolton by Mr. Staton and the Mayor. Mr. Cockburn, referring to the 2,600 men employed under him at Messrs. Pease's mines, affirmed (5947) that 'the major part of them would wish restriction to be carried further.' The chief constable of Wolverhampton, himself disinclined to a greater restriction, said (7249) that 'though it would cause some inconvenience at first, the people would in a very short time bear it as any other law that would be passed.'

Mr. Cockburn's evidence. Concerning Wales, Mr. Johnes, a county court judge of great experience, speaks in very comprehensive terms (8753): 'I am certain that there is scarcely a working man throughout North Wales, and, as I believe, throughout South Wales, that is not in favour of the Bill, or of entire closing.'

J. A. Johnes, Esq.'s evidence as to North Wales. Mr. Johnes also furnished statistical returns whose accuracy he guaranteed, from his personal knowledge of the persons employed in the canvasses, in proof of his declaration. As one example, he instanced (8764) the slate quarries of Festiniog, where, out of 1,270 people, 1,260 voted for the Bill: 'those are workmen in the quarries, and almost all labouring men.' One witness, Mr. Henshall, of Gorton, near Manchester, a Unitarian Sunday school teacher, testified that a portion of the ratepayers of that district were opposed to the Bill, but he acknowledged that the annual assembly of Unitarian churches in Lancashire and Cheshire had recently petitioned in favour of Mr. Smith's Bill. Of Bedford, Mr. Howard stated (4820) that he 'believed the bulk of the people would be glad of such a Bill as the one before the Committee.'

Mr. Henshall, of Gorton.

Vote of the Annual Assembly of the Unitarian Churches of Lancashire and Cheshire.

Mr.

Mr. Freshwater, of the same place, also gave interesting evidence in these terms (4881): 'There are between 500 and 600 men where I work now; and before that I worked at another factory where there were a great number of men, and I have conversations with a great many men now with whom I am connected. Although they are drinkers, and although, at the present time, they make use of public-houses from the Sunday drinking custom, yet they have invariably told me that they would very much approve of public-houses being closed on the Sunday, to prevent anyone going to sit down in the public-houses to drink.'

Opinions of J. Howard, Esq., and Mr. Freshwater, of Bedford.

"In reference to Newcastle-under-Lyne, the Rev. T. de Vine stated (5022), that a canvass had resulted in 1,863 signatures of householders for total Sunday closing; 131 opposed, 36 neutral, and 262 refusals to fill up the papers; and he added (5023), that this was 'a fair picture of the feeling of that town.' Mr. George Potter when questioned concerning Mr. Smith's Bill, avowed his belief (5037) that 'it would be received with much favour amongst the respectable and intelligent, and thoughtful artisans of the country.' Mr. Leicester gave evidence to the same effect (5675): 'My position, as secretary, brings me in contact with between 200 and 300 glassblowers in London; and on one occasion I took a petition in favour of this measure into the club-room, and I merely pointed out the provisions of the Bill, and every name in the club-room was attached to the petition at the end of the meeting.'

Evidence of Rev. T. de Vine, of Newcastle-under-Lyne.

Mr. George Potter's evidence as to working men's opinions.

Mr. Leicester's opinion as to working men in London.

"Other questions addressed to this witness, with the answers returned, were as follows:—

"(5656.) 'Do you believe that their personal wishes and aspirations go beyond the limits of the Bill referred to this Committee, inasmuch as a great many of them are in favour of Sunday closing altogether?—My opinion with regard to the sentiments and feelings of the working classes with reference to this measure is that it is not restrictive enough.'

"(5657.) 'That is your opinion; do you believe that that opinion is shared by the majority of the respectable working men in the class to which you belong?—I do.'

"(5654.) 'Your employment and your habits of life bring you into communication very largely with the working class and labouring men in London?—They do.'

"(5655.) 'On the whole do you believe that that class of men view with favour the proposal for increasing the restrictions on Sunday drinking?—Decidedly so.'

"Rev. G. W. M'Cree corroborated this testimony in a very decided manner, and portions of his evidence may be appropriately cited:—

Rev. G. W. M'Cree's evidence.

"(6121.) 'Do you believe that the people feel that themselves, and that they are disposed to see restriction carried further than it is?—It is very common both for the men and the women on the Monday and Tuesday to say to me, and often with tears, "Oh, Mr. M'Cree, we wish the public-houses were all shut up on the Sundays; it would be a great blessing to us and our families."'

"(6150.) 'Reverting to the feelings of working men as to restriction, do you think that they look at the existing restriction as a useful means of protecting them from their own folly?—I have found the more respectable and thoughtful working men to be decidedly in favour of increased restriction.'

"(6166.) 'Having a very long and varied experience in reference to the working men of London, and the country generally, do you give an undoubting testimony in favour of increased restriction, wishing to see it carried further than the limits of my Bill?—Yes; and I believe that such restriction would be perfectly safe, and most beneficial to the poor.'

"(6167.) 'Do you know anything of the feelings of employers of labour in London upon this subject?—I have conversed with large numbers of them.'

"Rev. G. M. Murphy, among other facts, informed the Committee (5448) that meetings had been held by working men in the Lambeth Baths, and all the expenses paid by them, and he added, 'We have also had a conference on education at the Lambeth Baths, attended by nearly 1,000 men, and it was held by adjournment on two weeks. Mr. Aldermen Lawrence presided over one sitting, and Mr. Thomas Hughes, the Member for Lambeth, over the other; and I remember the resolution passed at the first sitting of that conference was to this effect, "That the conference is further of opinion that the diminution of the public-houses and beershops, the abridgment of the hours of sale on week-days, and their entire closing on Sundays, associated with a keener sense of justice on the part of the clergy, squires, and farmers of the rural districts, would tend very much to diminish what of ignorance exists amongst us;" & c.'

"The general drift of Mr. Murphy's evidence was subsequently controverted before the Committee, and a canvass of certain streets and workshops, the particulars of which he related, was the subject of considerable discussion, but nothing was elicited tending to show that this canvass had been conducted otherwise than with perfect fairness of intention. One witness, Mr. Morrell, who claimed to speak with authority as to the prevalence of a hostile feeling among the working classes of London against further restriction, adduced no facts except in reference to a single workshop, where the only question submitted had been that of entire Sunday closing. It may be noticed that the gratuitous attempt of this witness to cast discredit on a canvass undertaken in St. Pancras, caused information to be laid before the Committee that in 1863 the great metropolitan parish of St. Pancras was carefully canvassed to ascertain the opinions of the adult inhabitants upon Mr. Somes's Bill for closing public-houses from 11 o'clock on Saturday night till six on Monday morning, and that this canvass, costing 130 £, resulted in the returns of 26,544 adult opinions in favour of that Bill, 19,014 against, and 7,766 neutral. Each of the eight wards gave a majority for the Bill, the total majority being 7,530 or 17 per cent. The case of Sheffield has been sui generis, in regard to the conflicting nature of the evidence submitted as to the state of public opinion upon additional restrictions. Mr. Alderman Fisher, Mr. Wilson, and Mr. Beal have affirmed that a majority of all classes would be opposed to such legislation, while the chief constable, Mr. Jackson, and the Rev. J. Flather, have given evidence of a different tenour. Mr. Jackson remarked (1507), 'I think they would submit to the house being open two hours less in the evening.' Mr. Flather (4525) gave the summary of a canvass in 1863, in reference to Mr. Somes's Bill; in favour, 13,152 householders; against, 6,031; for closing, except two hours, 613; neutral, 2,256: total, 22,052. When asked whether there would now be a larger number in favour of partial closing than there was in 1863 in favour of total closing, Mr. Flather answered (4568), 'Yes, that is the predominant feeling, I believe, in the town.' Mr. Flather also presented (4536) the result of a canvass of 130 workshops, representing all the principal trades of the town, the totals being, for total Sunday closing, 4,769; against, 3,369; neutral, 769. No. 6 of the Appendix Papers furnishes a summary of household canvass in 56 towns, giving a total of 88,776 votes for entire Sunday closing, 13,809 against, and 11,127 neutral. A shorter list of eight towns using canvass schedules, differing from those supplied by the Central Association, gives a total of 37,098 yeas, 6,824 noes, and 5,104 neutrals. Returns from 40 workshops canvassed, also show a greatly preponderating feeling among the workmen who have expressed an opinion; nor does it seem possible, in view of all this accumulated and concurrent testimony, to avoid the conclusion arrived at from independent evidence by Archbishop Manning, that 'to a very great extent the working people of this country are at this moment moving in favour of such a restriction as the Bill 'before the Committee proposes,' if not of legislation still more extensive and complete. The evidence from petitions equally points in the same direction; for, although the remarkable effort of 1863, issuing in 5,393 petitions with 903,987 signatures, has not been repeated, the 27th Report of the Select Committee on Petitions gives a total of 4,473 petitions, and 486,737 signatures, thus composed: in favour of total Sunday closing 820 petitions, 156,183 signatures; in favour of Mr. Smith's Bill, petitions, 3,653; signatures, 330,544. The petitions against the Bill up to the same date were 583, with 476,942 signatures. Of signatures there has therefore been a majority of 9,795, and of petitions 3,890. No reason has been advanced for impugning the genuine character of the petitions in behalf of further restriction, which (taking into consideration the number and the variety of localities whence they have proceeded) indicate a very general interest in the question to which they relate. Imputations cast upon the petitions, such as having been signed by children, or as bearing fictitious signatures, have in no single instance been established. It may be sufficient to remark of petitions on the other side, that they have invariably been projected and circulated by persons pecuniarily interested in the result of this inquiry, and do not afford any evidence of a deep or wide-spread public sentiment against the curtailment of the Sunday liquor traffic. Mr. Alderman Mackie, himself a large wholesale and retail spirit dealer, states (4404), 'My idea is that it is not the 'public that wants this accommodation so much; it is those who deal in the article; they 'say that the public would be very much disappointed; it is their business, and they say, 'We are so interested in supplying the wants of the public that we dare not shut up on 'Sunday.' The public make no such demand upon them; in my opinion, they are only 'open for the purpose of the mere sale of drink.'

"6. IV. In considering the objections that have been taken by some of the witnesses to further legislation of a restrictive tenour, while there is no reason to speak otherwise than respectfully of the persons proposing them, it is impossible to assign to their objections any considerable weight.

"(1). The objection, 'that drunkenness is steadily decreasing under the operation of 'moral causes, and that its further diminution may be wisely left to the continued action of 'such causes,' can only be accepted when it is shown that legislation is not itself a powerful educator of public sentiment, and a necessary co-operator in the improvement observed. In the opinion of several able witnesses, intemperance is not diminishing in some of the more populous districts of the country. This opinion is somewhat supported by the Judicial Statistics of England and Wales, according to which the cases of drunk and disorderly in the the year ending 29th September 1864 were 100,067; ending 29th September 1865, 105,310; ending 29th September 1866, 104,368. Intemperance also continues, as formerly, the greatest cause of crimes of violence and of the poverty to which crimes against property are largely due. The complaint is likewise general that intemperance among women and children is extensively increasing, one sign of which seems to be afforded by the fact, that whereas in 1840 the total cases of females charged with drunkenness in the Metropolitan District were 5,842 out of 16,505, or 35 per cent., the number in 1867 was 7,838, out of a total of 16,941, or 46 per cent. It cannot be maintained for a moment that law has no preventive office in regard to crime; and if preventive legislation against Sunday tipping is now confessedly operative to a marked extent, it may be legitimately inferred, till the contrary is shown, that extended restrictions will have a tendency to operate in the same direction.

"(2.) The objection that 'Sunday drunkenness is small in amount, and less than on other days of the week,' is answered by the evidence cited above, as to the fractional proportion of public intemperance coming under the charge of the police. It may also be remarked that constables on night duty, taking drunken persons to the police station, would have to appear against them the following day, when off duty, and at the loss of time allowed for rest, an inconvenience which they are not likely to incur when it can possibly be avoided. It must likewise be remembered that as public-houses are now closed 16 hours out of the 24 on Sunday, no just comparison can be made between the cases of police-charged drunkenness on that day and on other days of the week.

Objection from the small extent of Sunday drunkenness.

Reply.

"(3.) The objection 'that great popular discontent would be excited by further limiting the sale of liquor on Sunday,' is opposed to ample evidence that such legislation would be received with general favour. Fears of tumult, founded on the Hyde Park riots of 1855, are purely chimerical, since it is known that those disorders arose, not out of the Wilson Patten Act of 1854, but Lord Robert Grosvenor's Sunday Trading Bill of 1855. If proof were wanting of this position, other than is provided by the newspapers of that date, it is furnished by the entire absence from the Evidence and Report of the Select Committee of 1855 of any allusion to the disturbances in Hyde Park as connected with the restrictions on Sunday drinking. That the class who would be most discontented by an earlier Sunday-evening closing would be the habitual frequenters of public-houses is the opinion of Major Greig; who says, speaking of Liverpool (1240), that it would be 'entirely confined to them.'

Objection from probable popular discontent.

Reply.

"(4.) The objection, 'that great public inconvenience would be occasioned,' relates to a number of particulars which must be separately examined.

Objections from public inconveniences that would be occasioned.

Replies.

"(a) Some witnesses were under a misapprehension as to the scope of the proposed changes, and others had not taken into account the facilities that would be permitted to bonâ fide travellers under the construction of that phrase by the Court of Common Pleas.

"(b) It was abundantly shown in evidence that the dinner and supper convenience of the working classes would be met by the permission to open between one and half-past two, and between 8 and 10 o'clock. Mr. Winterbotham, for London (6697), and Mr. Wilson, for Sheffield (7915), who were opposed to the Bill, admitted that the dinner wants of the working classes would be sufficiently provided for.

"(c) The opinion that persons taking short walks would be precluded from obtaining refreshments excludes from consideration the means that would exist, and would probably be increased, for procuring refreshments of a non-intoxicating character within the prohibited hours. No difficulty on this score is ever experienced in places of public resort on Sunday around the metropolis. Similar facilities are found in the parks near Birmingham, as appears from the evidence of Mr. Wadhams, who, though he thinks persons would be 'considerably inconvenienced,' immediately adds (7996), 'They go to one of those places which are open, and they walk about, and enjoy the fresh air there for two or three hours; and they necessarily want some refreshment. They can get tea and coffee at one of those places, because there is a refreshment-room provided in the park; but they sell neither ale, wine, nor spirits.'

"(d) The belief that the working classes could not easily obtain beer for Sunday use, if public houses were closed for a longer period, was satisfactorily refuted. Mr. Alderman Mackie, when asked (4395), 'Do many working men within your knowledge buy their beer on Saturday night and keep it for Sunday's dinner?' replied, 'I know of my own personal knowledge that hundreds and thousands in Manchester do.' The suggestion of one Honourable Member of the Select Committee, that beer on draught would not always be procurable by persons who might prefer it to bottled beer, was pertinently answered by the witness under examination, Mr. Bushell, J.P. (4735), who replied, 'If the whole legislation of this country is to be governed by the liking of a man, or his preference between bottled and draught beer, and all moral and religious considerations are to be set at naught for his sake, I have nothing to say. I should decline to legislate myself, if I were a legislator, at all in that point of view.'

"(e) The supposed grievances of excursionists were brought prominently under notice during the sittings of the Committee; but it was shown that such individuals would be entitled to be regarded as travellers, and that in very few towns and for a very short season in the year, excursion trains return at a later hour than from 9 to 10 o'clock. Excursionists from Sheffield 'do not, generally speaking, come home late in the evening,' Mr. Beal (7794). With regard to London, Sir Richard Mayne was not prepared to say that it was necessary to give excursionists the hour between 10 and 11 (71). Referring to this class, Archbishop Manning said (2438), 'When they return home, and the excursion is over, and the work of the day is done, I think to go to bed is the best thing, and I see no reason whatever for their going to a public-house.' The Rev. G. M. Murphy 'confirmed this opinion from observation (5472): 'I had for many years a place of worship next to the South Western Station, in Waterloo-road, in Hawkstone Hall, which was built to commemorate the memory of Rowland Hill. The hours of service were sometimes late, so that I had an opportunity of seeing the excursionists, and the great majority of them I know went right away home without drinking; and the people who had been drinking were for the most part quarrelling, as though they had been rather unrefreshed than anything else.' Mr. George Potter considered (5051) that the opposition supposed to exist against closing from 10 to 11 was 'imaginary rather than real.' Mr. Bigge, stipendiary magistrate of Brighton, believed (2171) that 'the people would acquiesce in the proposed restriction; they would take it as a matter of course.' Captain Palin (1290) thought 'that in a short time they would be reconciled to it, and would not care for it.' Mr. Elliott of Plymouth states (5341) 'I think the inconvenience would be very small compared with the great advantage that would be derived to the community generally.' The Rev. Newman Hall has put the case thus forcibly (2536): 'Of course there would be some inconvenience; but every useful law might be prevented if it is a valid argument that some inconvenience will result. The balance of benefit I can have no question of at all; and I believe that every class in the community would admit that, after it had been working a little while.' And again (2580), 'I think that the inconveniences would be very small; persons generally, who are desirous and respectable, are able on that day to have the drink at home, if they take it, and they would be very glad to have greater peace and quiet in the streets and neighbourhood, and diminished poor rates to pay.' Archbishop Manning (2480): "I do not think that those houses are to be treated as the supplement to bad dwellings; but I think they form a strong temptation to men whose dwellings are bad to leave them, and to leave their wives and children to inhabit them in their miserable poverty.' And further (2481), 'I would not use the word inconvenience; I would adhere to what I said at first; I think that they would be relieved of a temptation which is in a very great degree ruinous to their families and to themselves.'

Objection from supposed increase of illicit drinking.

Reply.

"(5.) The objection alleged by some witnesses 'that illicit drinking would be so much increased as to render further restrictions of comparatively little value,' was not sustained by reliable evidence, official or otherwise. Sir Richard Mayne appeared to labour under the impression that the Wilson Patten Act had led to great evasions and to a revival of Tom and Jerry shops, but was reminded (239) that he had given expressly opposite evidence before the Select Committee of 1855, when the facts were fresh in his mind. Mr. Woolrych, stipendiary magistrate of Lambeth, said (766), 'I think persons would get drink somehow, but not to the same extent that they can now get it.' Major Greig positively affirmed (1000), 'I do not think drinking in private houses would be increased.' Captain Palin (1413) remarked, 'It would be increased, but I do not know that it would be increased to any great extent.' Mr. M'Laren, M.P. (2722), did not think that, under the total Sunday closing in Edinburgh, the illicit drinking 'bears any comparison to the amount of drinking that is checked by restriction.' Mr. Enright of Southampton (4446) 'did not apprehend that there would be much illicit drinking; the houses are pretty well looked after.' The fear of one witness, Mr. Staton (7099), that 'persons would get a quantity of liquor in bottles in their houses, and that there would be, in consequence, what we call fireside fuddling going on much to the injury of the rising generation,' was opposed to the opinion of one witness who strongly objected to all restriction, Mr. Waygood (7033), that 'to such men children are such silent monitors they cannot go on with drinking,' that is, in their presence; and another witness, Mr. Freshwater (4926), deposed, 'I believe the working men generally have more love for their own honour than to take a lot of people to drink in their own homes amongst their wives and families; I mean the really respectable working men.' Mr. Johnes, county court judge, expresses himself confidently concerning the effect of further restriction in North Wales: 'If drinking on the premises were put an end to, there would be no secret drinking. I have known that from the experience of the parishes within a short distance of my home, where, by the energetic exertions of temperance societies, the people have become temperate, and the taverns have been got rid of in that way, by a kind of moral suasion. And, in another instance, the land proprietor, Lord Penrhyn, has put them down himself, by exercising his own rights. In neither of those cases have I ever heard of any secret drinking, and I do not believe that it occurs. The only way in which drinking occurs on the part of the inhabitants of those parishes is, when the people go to fairs and markets where there are taverns; they go into the public-houses and become excited with drink.'

"Archbishop Manning (2427) meets the objection in these words: 'I believe that granting great excess and even an abuse in evasions and exceptions, nevertheless, the substantive benefit extending over the whole population, would be sufficiently large to make this Bill, if carried into an Act, a great boon.'

"(6.) The objection of several witnesses had respect to supposed injury that would be inflicted on burial and friendly societies, the officers of which, in various Lancashire towns, meet on Sunday evenings to make up their accounts and pay over the balances to the treasurers, who are generally publicans. None of these witnesses, however, attempted to prove that this business could not be transacted in the time during which public-houses would remain open, nor did they assign any sufficient reason why at least the paying over the sums received should not be deferred till the following day. Mr. Candelet, when asked by Mr. Roebuck (8530), 'Why should not these institutions meet at a private house?' replied, 'I do not think that that plan would be so successful; I see no objection against their meeting in private houses.' And again (8688), 'If some plan could be propounded to carry out the idea of getting the money to be collected on some other day of the week, I do not mean to say that it is not necessary, or that it would not be useful.' An objection so feebly supported may be concluded to have answered itself, especially as the same witness, when asked concerning Mr. Tidd Pratt's advice to friendly societies not to use public-houses, had nothing better to reply than (8528), 'When his ability is tested, it is found that he knows really and truly nothing at all about the requirements or necessities of these institutions.'

Objections from inferred injury to Friendly Societies.
Reply.

"(7.) The objection to further restriction because of the pecuniary loss to the keepers of public-houses and beershops is, in effect, one of the strongest and most popular arguments advanced to show that great domestic benefit would arise from a different appropriation of the millions of pounds now expended in Sunday drinking. This objection, it may also be noticed, is fatal to the allegation that an equal or greater quantity of intoxicating liquor would be consumed in spite of further restrictions, though in a less public way. There is no question that very many publicans would willingly forego their Sunday profits in order to enjoy the privilege of a Sunday's rest like other tradesmen, if it did not expose them to disadvantage on other days; but, from striking cases of failure to carry out private agreements among themselves, Mr. Bushell (4661), and Mr. Johnes (8760), it is clear that a uniform practice prescribed by law is necessary, in order that publicans generally may be ensured the benefits of this course. To the servants of such persons any diminution of Sunday labour could not fail to be acceptable and advantageous.

Objection from the loss occasioned to publicans.
Reply.

"The conclusions arrived at, after a careful review of the evidence laid before the Committee, may be briefly summed up as follows:—

Conclusions.

"1st. That extended restrictions on the Sunday sale of alcoholic liquors would result in sensible public benefits, including a diminution of drunkenness and crime, and an improved condition of the homes of the people more directly affected by them.

"2ndly. That to realise these benefits no corresponding drawbacks would be incurred, and no serious inconvenience occasioned to the sober and respectable of all classes.

"3rdly. That the restrictions required to obtain these results would be in accordance with public sentiment, and, therefore, that nothing in the way of popular reaction may reasonably be feared.

"Your Committee therefore recommend that in the ensuing Session of Parliament a Bill should be introduced, with a view to legislation of the character here approved."

Recommendation.

Special Report proposed by Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen, read a first time, as follows:—

"1. Your Committee are agreed that in certain parts of the country, and especially in some of the large towns in the north of England, a considerable feeling exists in favour of further restriction upon the sale of intoxicating liquors on Sundays; that such feeling has been fostered and stimulated by the organization of temperance societies and by constant efforts on the part of the advocates of further restriction; that the existence of such feeling has been proved to your Committee by the evidence of witnesses conversant with the state of opinion in those communities, and claiming specially to represent the working classes, by the reports of various public meetings held upon the subject, and by the returns of many canvasses made in large towns with the view of ascertaining the sentiments of the inhabitants upon this question.

"2. Your Committee would, however, observe that great caution must be exercised in affixing a value to the results of any such canvass. Although no imputations of dishonesty rest upon the canvassers, it has been proved to your Committee that in many instances the canvass has been of a partial nature, and does not adequately convey the real sense of the community whose opinions it professes to represent. Moreover, it is evident that a canvass conducted by persons whose object it is to obtain a particular expression of opinion is not one of a character to command implicit confidence. Therefore, whilst so far admitting the value of such canvasses as to accept them as corroborative evidence of the existence of a feeling in favour of further restrictive legislation among a considerable portion of the community, your Committee are of opinion that no proof has been afforded of such a general demand of that nature as should induce Parliament to disregard those other considerations which lead to a different conclusion.

"3. It has been proved to your Committee that a very large number of persons make use of public-houses on Sunday against whom no complaint whatever is alleged, and to whom further restrictions in the direction contemplated by the Bill would be productive of serious inconvenience. And whilst this inconvenience would occasion great discontent among such persons, it by no means follows that a commensurate benefit would result with regard to the class against whom such restrictions would be especially directed. Those who drink to excess form a very small per-centage of the whole number of persons who make use of public-houses upon a Sunday, and it is probable that many of these persons, if deprived of their present facilities for obtaining liquor, would have recourse to drinking in private houses and to other methods of evading the law. For however beneficial may be the results of restriction within certain limits, its enforcement to such an extent as to cause any violent interference with the habits of the people has a tendency to create a discontent which is sure to be followed by evasion, the law is brought into disrepute, and effects are not unfrequently produced the very reverse and opposite of those intended by the Legislature.

"4. It is, moreover, clear to your Committee that there would be great difficulty in enforcing the restrictions proposed in the Bill. Not only would the duties of the police be materially increased, but the duties so imposed would be at once harassing to them and annoying to the public. To the vexed question of 'Who is a bonâ fide traveller?' the Bill would add the question, 'What is a bonâ fide meal?' and this is only a sample of the difficulties under which the publican would be obliged to carry on his business.

"5. Your Committee would further observe, that the proposed restrictions do not afford any hope of the settlement of the question upon a permanent basis. Most of the advocates of the measure openly avow that they would accept it only as an instalment, and many of them declare their desire to put a stop to the whole retail trade in exciseable liquors. In that trade a very large amount of capital is embarked; and so long as the licensed victuallers and keepers of beershops stand in the position of men carrying on a recognised and legitimate trade, and one moreover subjected to heavy and special taxation, it would be unjust that their operations should be embarrassed, and their property depreciated in value, by constant attempts to impose upon them restrictions which do not appear to be demanded by any urgent public necessity.

"6. Although it cannot be denied that drunkenness, to a considerable extent, both on Sundays and other days, is to be found in this country, yet the admission appears to be general that the present law is working well, and that under its operation a diminution of drunkenness has taken place. From this fact it has been argued that further restrictions would lead to further diminution, but, having regard to the experience of the past, and to the agitation consequent upon the passing of a less stringent measure than the present in 1854, which measure was repealed in the following year, your Committee are inclined to believe that the safe limit of restrictive legislation has been reached, and that further measures in the same direction would be unwise and injudicious. The praiseworthy exertions of the advocates of temperance must not be undervalued. These have, no doubt, materially contributed to the diminution of drunkenness, and simultaneously with these exertions, and the salutary influence exercised by the ministers of religion, the opening, in several of our large towns, of parks and other places wherein fresh air and innocent recreation may be obtained by the working classes upon Sunday, has drawn many of them from public-house associations, and induced them to spend their only leisure day in a manner more advantageous to themselves and to their families. Other causes have likewise contributed to this desirable result.

"7. The concurrent testimony of all the witnesses proves that for many years past there has been a steady, decided, and progressive improvement in the morals, habits, tastes, and manners of the people. The advance of education, the wider diffusion of knowledge, and the moral influences which have been brought to bear upon them, have doubtless all combined to produce this satisfactory result. Regarding, then, this general improvement, and at the same time bearing in mind the fact, that the habits of the upper and middle classes of society are far more temperate at the present day than was the case in the early part of the century, your Committee are of opinion that it is not too much to hope that as the working classes also advance in self-improvement, and are actuated by that self-respect which is engendered by improved education, the vice of drunkenness will gradually disappear without the necessity of coercive measures on the part of the Legislature. In this view your Committee cannot recommend the passing of the Bill referred to their consideration, and would rather trust to the progressive improvement discernible under the present law, and to the further development of those moral influences to which they have already referred.

Paragraph, as amended, agreed to.

Amendment proposed to insert the following paragraph:—“The beneficial working of the Public Houses, (Scotland) Acts, 1854-62, which has been declared by a Royal Commission, and of which evidence has been given before your Committee, does not, in their opinion, establish any proof that a law similar, or approaching it in strictness, would be either acceptable or expedient in England. For even those witnesses who spoke to the success of the Scotch law, admitted that there was so remarkable a difference between the habits of the English and those of the Scotch people in their use of public-houses, that your Committee are of opinion that no trustworthy inference could be drawn from the fact of that success.”—(The Chairman)—Question put, That this paragraph be inserted in the Special Report.—The Committee divided:

MINUTES OF EVIDENCE.

Wednesday, 22nd April 1868.

MEMBERS PRESENT:

Mr. Baines.
Colonel Fane.
Sir James Fergusson.
Mr. Hibbert.
Mr. Horsfall.

Mr. Locke.
Mr. Malcolm.
Mr. Roebuck.
Mr. John Abel Smith.
Mr. Frederick Stanley.

SIR JAMES FERGUSSON, BART., IN THE CHAIR.

Sir RICHARD MAYNE, K.C.B., called in; and Examined.

1. Chairman.] You are, as we know, Chief Commissioner of Police?—Yes.

2. Are you aware of the Order of Reference to this Committee?—Yes.

3. And that it is somewhat analogous to that on which you gave evidence in 1855 before this House?—Yes, and in 1853, and also in 1849, before a Committee of the House of Lords.

4. I will now call your attention to the evidence which you gave in 1855 before the Select Committee on the Sale of Beer Act; your evidence on that occasion was chiefly directed to the operation of the Act which had been passed in the previous year, which was called, I believe, “Colonel Wilson Patten’s Act”?—Yes; the Acts of the 17th and 18th, and the 18th and 19th of Victoria.

5. And in so giving evidence you expressed your opinion upon the results of the restrictive powers established by the Act of 1854?—Yes.

6. Generally speaking your opinion was favourable, was it not, to the removal of some of those restrictions?—It was.

7. The present Bill, in principle, is similar to the Act of 1854, is it not?—I think it goes further than that; I have not compared them exactly.

8. But the principle of the Bill, in restricting the hours during which public-houses may be open on Sunday, is similar, is it not, to that of the Act of 1854?—Yes.

9. Will you tell the Committee what has been your experience, since the year 1855, of the working of the law, which was changed after that year, reverting to the Act of George the 4th?—My opinion is that that Act has worked very favourably, and been useful in diminishing drunkenness, and the increase of order, generally, in consequence throughout the Sunday, especially 0.69.

Sunday evenings; I am referring to the Act of the 18th and 19th of Victoria, the existing Act.

10. Can you furnish the Committee with facts or statistics of the drunkenness occurring in the metropolis, similar to those with which you furnished the Committee of 1855?—I can. I have with me returns for each year from the year 1831, which was the first year when the returns were made in any regular form, one year after the establishment of the police up to the last year, 1867.

11. Will you be good enough to state the substance of those returns, and afterwards to put them in?—For the first three years, commencing in 1831, that is to say, 1831, 1832, and 1833, the superintendents were allowed, by a sort of regulation, to dismiss cases of merely drunkenness, without taking them before a magistrate; and it is so specified in the return; and the number of persons apprehended during those years, or rather, I should say, taken care of by the police, was much greater; in short, the number that the police interfered with was much larger in those years than in any subsequent year. Since that time the numbers were diminished considerably, but they were larger, and especially with reference to the increasing population, much larger than at present.

12. Since what year?—Since the year 1833; as for instance, in 1835, 1836, 1837, 1838, and 1839 they varied from nearly 22,000, with a few hundreds only of difference.

13. Mr. John Abel Smith.] Do you keep those returns in the form which you have adopted lately, distinguishing between drunkenness and drunkenness with violence, and do those returns include both, or are they separate?—They are given separately, and the totals as well.

Sir
R. Mayne,
 K.C.B.

14. Do the totals include both classes?—Yes, both; in the earlier returns they are shown year by year to vary, as I have said, from about 19,000 in the year 1834 to 20,000, and so on down to 16,000 in 1840. If we take the last 10 years, for instance in the year 1858, the total number of cases of drunkenness merely and drunk and disorderly was 20,829. In 1864 the numbers were 18,781, and in 1867, 16,941; there are occasional differences of the numbers that, perhaps, are not to be accounted for by any reason that occurs to me. I mention 1864 specially, because that was under the Act regulating the hours of closing public-houses at night, namely, one o'clock on five nights of the week, Monday, Tuesday, Wednesday, Thursday, and Friday; Saturday at 12 o'clock, and Sunday at 11 o'clock; and that is the present law as to the hours of closing at night. Since that Act was passed I think, certainly, looking to the increase of the population especially, the numbers have diminished, and still more the cases of disturbance, and the disorderly consequences of drunkenness.

15. Mr. Locke.] Could you give us the title of that Act?—It is the "Public-house Closing Act, 1864;" the first Act was passed the 25th of July 1864, the 27th and 28th of the Queen, chapter 64, entitled, "An Act for further Regulating the Closing of Public-houses and Refreshment-houses within the Metropolitan Police District, the City of London, and certain corporate towns, boroughs, and other places;" in the corporate towns, and boroughs, and other places, it was left optional to them to adopt the Act or not. That Act was amended in the following year, by the 28th and 29th of the Queen, chapter 27, and the principal alteration in that Act, I think, was that whereas the power to grant exceptional licenses had been given by the Act of 1864 to the superintendents of police in boroughs, it was taken from them, but within the metropolitan district it continues the same; that is to say, the power of granting exceptional licenses rests with the Commissioner, but in other places with the magistrates; and likewise in the second clause a power was given to the magistrates to grant to any licensed victualler or keeper of a refreshment house, whose place of business is in the immediate neighbourhood of such market or calling, or the place where persons follow such lawful trade or calling, a license exempting him from the provisions of the hereinbefore mentioned Act, between the hours of two and four o'clock in the morning; but that Act within the Metropolitan Police District has hardly had any operation. I think that in two cases only were licenses granted by the magistrates, and I believe at the present moment there is not any, but there never were more than two.

16. Chairman.] Was not that Act passed to relieve certain trades which required nightwork, and is it not taken advantage of in the case of printers?—As far as I remember, at this moment I do not believe that there is any exception, but I can ascertain that, certainly. I was told, in fact, that it was not necessary. I will give a return on that point, but I think there were never more than two cases of licenses granted in the metropolitan district; one of which was in the neighbourhood of Covent Garden; what may be the case within the City I do not know.

17. Within your jurisdiction it was not found necessary?—I think, practically, that was so;

there were not more than two licenses granted in any case, as far as I remember now; and I believe that at the present moment there is not any.

18. According to the figures which you have stated to the Committee, there had been a progressive diminution in drunkenness even down to the passing of the Act to which you are now referring?—Looking at the increase of the population, there has been; but the figures are curiously the same in the actual amount from the very first; at least, from the year 1833, when the alteration was made as to the discharging; for instance, in the year 1834 there were 19,000 persons, and in the year 1865 there were nearly 19,000. I omit some small numbers; but upon looking at the increase of the population, that may be taken, I think, to be a considerable decrease.

19. Mr. Roebuck.] You put it in this way, that the number of drunkards was the same, but the population that they came from was much larger?—Yes; a greater proportion of the population is sober. I beg leave to hand in those returns. (The same were delivered in. Vide Appendix.)

20. Chairman.] In the year 1855 you gave returns for the six months of each year, and the number of persons taken up for drunkenness at that time was about 13,000 in six months in a population of 2,500,000?—Yes.

21. That would show a greater actual number and a still greater relative number than what you have now given, would it not?—I forget at this moment why it was taken for six months; perhaps it was the time that the Committee was sitting; and having given it for that year, I took it for the corresponding periods for previous years.

22. Mr. John Abel Smith.] Thirteen thousand in six months would of course be more than 19,000 in the year?—Yes; I suppose they were the more drunken months; but I forget at this moment how it was, but I have no doubt that the returns were accurate.

23. Chairman.] The general returns which you put in you describe as showing a continuous decrease in drunkenness, having regard to the increase of the population?—Decidedly so; and I think most strikingly so since the Act of 1864.

24. Mr. Roebuck.] Can you tell us whether there is more tipsiness in the summer months than in the winter months, or vice versa?—I think it is more in the summer months; the hot weather perhaps has an influence in that respect.

25. Mr. Hibbert.] Is there any column in those returns showing the number of drunken cases on Sundays?—I have got another return which will show that.

26. Mr. John Abel Smith.] Have you drawn a distinction there, as you did in one of your other returns, between the men and the women?—Yes, there is a distinction between males and females in the return which I will put in; the females, I think, have been rather increasing in proportion.

27. Last year they were very nearly one half, were they not?—Last year they were much more than half the number of the males; there were 9,103 males, and 7,338 females.

28. Chairman.] You stated just now, did you not, in answer to one of the honourable Members, that you have separate returns relating to the cases of drunkenness, which would have especial reference reference to the subject of this Committee, namely, to those taken up for drunkenness on Sunday?—I have, and I will read them. I have a return with reference to Sunday made out for two different periods of hours, the one for 24 hours from 12 o'clock at midnight on Saturday to 12 o'clock at midnight on Sunday during the year 1866, and at that time the average on Sunday was far higher in that mode of taking the numbers from 12 at midnight on Saturday to 12 at midnight on Sunday; but I thought that it was not fair towards Sunday, inasmuch as a great many of the cases would be those of drunkenness on the Saturday night, and accordingly I had it taken out in another way.

29. Will you state the average in 1866, which you thought unfair?—I will state the figures; they are 97 on Sundays, on an average, against 42·6 on week-days, that is, from 12 o'clock, on Saturday night to 12 o'clock on Sunday night; but, as I said, I thought that that was not fair towards the Sunday, inasmuch as it would take in a great number of drunken cases on Saturday evening.

30. Mr. Locke.] You mean that they began to get drunk before 12 o'clock on Saturday night, and were taken into custody on Sunday morning?—Yes, and accordingly I had it made out in another return, which I will hand in, from four o'clock, a.m., on Sunday, so as to get clear of the cases of Saturday till four o'clock, a.m., on Monday, giving, in the same way, 24 hours. That return shows, as I believe is certainly the fact, very favourably, indeed so favourably for Sundays that there is not quite one-half the drunkenness on Sundays that there is on the other days; for instance, the average is 25 on Sundays, from four o'clock, a.m., to four o'clock, a.m., on Monday, and 50·1 on the week-days. It is an average of the whole number, as nearly as we can arrive at it. I will beg leave to hand in those returns (delivering in the same, vide Appendix).

31. What is the gross number of which that is the proportion?—16,941; that is, during the year 1867; the other number was 1866.

32. Do you mean that 16,941 was the total number of drunkards altogether in that year?—Yes.

33. That was the total number of cases of persons charged with drunkenness on Sunday?—I have not taken it in that way; but I have taken the proportion of them, deducting the six days for the whole number, and that gives an average for the Sunday of 25, and for the week days of 50·1; therefore the Sunday cases are rather less than one-half.

34. Mr. Horsfall.] Are those the cases of convictions for drunkenness?—No, of apprehensions, of persons in custody.

35. Chairman.] Can you state whether the numbers on Saturday vary from those on the other days in the week?—I have not got a return made out upon that point, but I believe there is no doubt whatsoever that the number is much larger on Saturday.

36. Mr. Roebuck.] That being the day when, in fact, the working men get their wages?—Yes, and they are idling; they have the day before them, when they are not required to work.

37. Have you ever heard whether there has been any increase of drunkenness since the prevalence of the half-holiday on Saturday?—I have not looked at it in that way.

38. Chairman.] Then it is not your opinion, 0.69.

is it, that drunkenness has increased at all in consequence of the extension of the hours in the Act of 1855, Mr. Berkeley's Act?—The previous Act having been in force only one year, it would not have been easy, or perhaps possible, to make any fair estimates of its effects; but taking the period now of 13 years since it was passed, it has, I think, worked beneficially, and it has been very considerably relaxed by the decisions of the courts as to travellers. For instance, everybody, I believe, who goes from one street to another is considered now a traveller.

39. Is the distinction virtually abolished as to bonâ fide traveller?—No, it is retained very extensively. In one case, where a man had been in the habit of going to Hampstead by omnibus for so many years and dining at "Jack Straw's Castle," the court held him to be a bonâ fide traveller; and I rather think there have been other cases which have gone further, where a person who has gone from one part of the town to another part of the town has been held to be a traveller.

40. Previous to that, some magistrates refused, did they not, to allow the claims of bonâ fide travellers even to persons who went a considerable way down or up the river?—Yes.

41. In the way you have mentioned the severe restriction in the sense of a man not being a bonâ fide traveller is greatly done away with?—That is so.

42. Can you state whether, in your opinion, the diminution of drunkenness in London has been much affected by the increase of the practice of taking excursions on the Sunday?—I have no reason to say that it has.

43. Mr. Roebuck.] Have you any reason to say that it has not?—My own impression is that it would have that effect; that it has diminished the drunkenness. A great number of persons that I think used to remain in public-houses drinking now go to Greenwich, Richmond, and other places. I know that it is the prevalent police belief, and it is my own, that that has tended to diminish drunkenness and also to create better conduct on the part of the people.

44. If the whole number has diminished in London, have you any reason to know whether it has increased in the suburbs to which people go in these excursions?—There is a division in our return which would include such places, for instance, as Islington, which would take in Highbury Barn. There were 71 cases in that year; and the Camberwell division will include Dulwich, for instance, and the Crystal Palace.

45. Are those places to which excursion trains run?—Yes, and likewise to Greenwich.

46. Have you any idea of the increased number of persons who are taken by excursion trains, say, for example, to Dulwich?—I have not got that return, but I dare say I could get it, or the railway authorities could give it.

47. Chairman.] Do your returns from the division in which Richmond is, show any increase of drunkenness or otherwise in that division?—The numbers, as I understand, are much smaller there than in the town: for instance, I will take Covent Garden, which includes Covent Garden properly so called, where the population is 92,000, as calculated in that division, and there the number of drunken cases are, 83 drunk and disorderly, 27 drunk and incapable, making 110 in that division. I will take a division including places where excursions go, for instance, Greenwich, 2 wich, which includes Woolwich, Blackheath, Lee, Lewisham, and such parts, where the population is 224,000 as against 92,000, more than double the population of Covent Garden, and I find that the drunken cases in Covent Garden being, as I said, 110, in Greenwich they are only 83. The number of public-houses in Covent Garden is 270, and 32 beershops; whereas in the Greenwich division there are 481 public-houses, and a very large proportion of beerhouses, namely, 313; so that the number of drunken cases is much less in proportion, in spite of the greater number of both the focuses of drunkenness, namely, beershops and public-houses.

48. Mr. Roebuck.] And in spite of the increase of their population by excursion trains?—Yes; that number includes every person found drunk there.

49. Mr. Horsfall.] Have you any means of knowing whether the greater number of cases of drunkenness originate in the beer-houses or in the public-houses?—I cannot say; I have not got that information here.

50. Mr. Locke.] Would the licensing magistrates have it, do you think?—I think not; it could be got from the police courts. It would be a return of a good deal of detail; but if the Committee wish it, I could have it made out.

51. Mr. Roebuck.] But I presume that in the case of every person who is taken up for drunkenness, a statement is made to the magistrate of whence he came and where he got drunk?—Yes.

52. Would not the records of their conviction or their trial tell whence the people came?—Yes, they would; but those are stated upon what we call the police charge sheets more collectively than at the magistrate's court, but either should give them, and if the Committee wish it I will have such a return made out.

53. Mr. Frederick Stanley.] Is it not possible that a person should go from one house to another, and that in such a case the name entered upon the charge sheet would probably be the last house at which the person was?—That might be so certainly; but I think it would be quite accurate as to the place where he was found drunk.

54. But that might have been the place where he did not get drunk, but where he was merely found drunk by the police?—That might be so.

55. Chairman.] Are the police now strict in enforcing conformity with the Act with reference to the hours for closing?—Quite so. Of course, there are continual evasions of the law, and continually cases before the magistrates; but I believe that the police honestly discharge their duty. I have complaints sometimes made that they do not, but I have never found any reason to believe that they do relax.

56. According to your orders they look closely into the observance of the law?—They do so.

57. Can you state to the Committee what has been the number of offences in that respect which have been brought before the magistrates?—I have not got a return here of offences against the Public House Closing Act, but I can make it out easily.

58. Will you give the Committee a return as well with reference to Saturday night as to Sunday night; because if they passed the hour of 12 on Saturday night the offence would be the same thing?—I will have a return made out for Saturday night and Sunday night.

59. Mr. Roebuck.] Could you also, without any great difficulty, have it for the middle of the week; we will say Wednesday?—Yes.

60. Chairman.] And will you procure for us the daily average for the whole week?—Yes.

61. Mr. Baines.] Will you have the goodness to state to the Committee what is the difference in the number of hours that the public-houses are open in those days which you compare together, namely, the number of hours from four o'clock on Sunday morning to four o'clock on Monday morning, that the public-houses are open, and from four o'clock on any other morning to four o'clock on the morning following?—On Sundays the public-houses are not open till one o'clock in the day; they are open from one till three, and then from five till eleven; that is to say, eight hours only on Sunday.

62. At what hour are they opened on Sunday morning?—At one o'clock. They are closed at 12 o'clock on Sunday night, and not opened till one on Saturday forenoon; then they are opened from one to three, and from five to eleven, making eight hours.

63. What number of hours does that compare with on the average of days from four o'clock in one morning to four o'clock in the following morning?—It compares with 24 hours on the other days, because on five days in the week they are closed from one till four, which takes three out of the 24 hours.

64. You have to deduct three hours from the 24, leaving 21 hours?—Yes; and on Saturday night four hours, leaving 20 hours.

65. So that you have to compare the eight hours of the public-houses being open on Sunday with the 21 hours of the public-houses being open on the other days?—Yes; with 21 on other days, and 20 on Saturday.

66. Chairman.] Do your returns show the number of persons taken up drunk in the fore part, and in the after part of the day?—These do not; but of course the time at which every man is brought to the station house is entered upon the charge sheet, so that I could show that.

67. Could you state from your knowledge whether the number of persons is very much greater in the after part than in the earlier part of the day?—I believe that the number is very much greater in the after part.

68. Is it the case that the portion of Sunday in which the public-houses are opened is that during which the greater number of drunken cases occur on the week day?—Yes; I think so; in the afternoon, or the evening, and in the night there are the greater number of drunken cases, both on Sundays and week days.

69. Practically you think that the hours for closing are generally observed, so that the result of the law may be fairly taken to correspond with the requirements of the law?—There is a continual struggle no doubt, to evade it, and to a certain degree successfully. Every Sunday it is necessary to have a number of police to watch the public-houses where it is known that the law is evaded; and the law is evaded also in this way, that they take beer into houses at the back, and into court yards and into small houses near; and to prevent evasions of the law in that way, if it were desirable to do it, I think that the law might be made more stringent.

70. Is it your opinion that the hours during which public-houses may be opened on Sunday might be shortened without inconvenience to the public?—That is a large question.

71. For

71. For example, might they close at 10 at night without serious inconvenience to the public; or is the hour from 10 to 11 taken advantage of to a great extent by persons who would not find the hours before 10 equally convenient?—It is, I think, considerably used; but looking at the privileges of the railway places of refreshment, and knowing that travellers coming by railway may get refreshments at any time, I am not prepared to say that it is necessary to give them that hour between 10 and 11.

72. In 1855 it was your opinion, was it not, that it would be for the convenience of those who had urgent occasion to resort to a public-house that the hours should be extended to 11, and you did not think that such a change would be objectionable?—I do not think that it produces very much effect, but I think that the necessity for that additional hour between 10 and 11 is not so great now as it was before the passing of the law which authorised the railways to supply refreshments. A great number of persons arrive by railway between 10 and 11 who could not have got refreshments at that time, and who can now, because in the Public-house Closing Act there is an exception of the railway refreshment rooms.

73. Is it your meaning that the persons arriving by railway would find the refreshment rooms on the lines open after 10, or do you mean that they would be able to refresh themselves before their return to town, and therefore they would not require to go to a public-house afterwards?—My meaning is this: that if they can get refreshment in the railway refreshment rooms on arriving in town, as well as at each station, the necessity for the public-houses generally being opened is not so great.

74. Mr. Locke.] When is the refreshment room at the railway closed; is it closed at the same time as the public-houses?—No, I think it is not closed at all, if I remember rightly.

75. Can they sell wines and spirits at any time?—Yes, there is an exception in their favour. In the Act of the 27 & 28 Vict. s. 64, the first Act, which is still in force, called the "Public-house Closing Act, 1864," there is this exceptional provision in Clause 10, "Nothing herein contained shall apply to the sale at a railway station between the hours of one and four in the morning" (which is the only time that the other public-houses are restricted from selling) "of excisable liquors or refreshments to persons arriving at or departing from such station by railroad."

76. How would it be in the case of a person arriving at 10 o'clock at night by railway on Sunday night, supposing you made the alteration restricting it to 10 instead of 11; would a person arriving at a station in London by a railway be entitled to ask for, or would the railway be enabled to give him refreshment in wines or spirits in that sense after 10 o'clock?—By the present law he may get refreshment on Sunday night at any public-house up to 11.

77. We will take it at 11, as it is now; how does this clause apply to a railway; can they give any refreshment at a railway station after 11?—I think not, according to this Act; there is no exception, I think, between eleven and one.

78. Is not the license to a station at a railway, precisely the same license as it is to a public-house?—Yes, but at the same time there is an exception between one and four in their favour.

79. Chairman.] How is it with regard to Sunday night?—With regard to Sunday night, 0.69.

it would appear that they are precluded from supplying between eleven and one. It never occurred to me before, but looking at this Act now, it seems to be so, because this exception, I see, is worded in this way. "Nothing herein contained shall apply to the sale at a railway station between the hours of one and four o'clock in the morning."

80. That is an exception on weekdays which is made in favour of persons travelling by railway, but on Sunday, precisely the same law applies to refreshment on a railway, as does to an ordinary public-house, does it not?—I should think not; it appears here that even between one and four o'clock on a Sunday night, or a Monday morning, they might sell. It seems to me now that between eleven and one on the Sunday night they are precluded equally with others, but that the other houses must not open till four, whereas the railway may open at one, as it appears to me from this.

81. Mr. Locke.] Supposing you altered it from 11 to 10, the same rule would apply after 10 as is now applied after 11, and therefore between ten and one; supposing the other Act remains in the same situation, no refreshment whatever could be given at the railway station?—Not unless to a bonâ fide traveller.

82. Chairman.] But no person is supposed to be on the station premises taking refreshment, except a traveller, is he?—That supposition is not correspondent with the fact; a great many are there.

83. Mr. Locke.] Then it must necessarily follow that the policeman or whoever it was that interfered, would have to establish the fact that the man did not come by railway, and if the policeman could show that the man had walked into the station merely to get refreshment, then the person who furnished him with it would be liable to a penalty, would he not, if he gave him refreshment after 11 or after 10, supposing the time was altered to 10 o'clock?—I believe so, according to the decision of the magistrates; and it would appear to me, looking at this Act now with that view for the first time, that anybody can get refreshments at a railway station beyond one and four in the morning.

84. That you say is specially provided for between the hours of one and four, but that does not apply to 11 o'clock on Sunday night, which is different legislation from that with respect to any other night; and what I want to know is this, taking it as the law at present exists, whether or not the person who keeps a refreshment room at a railway station is not precisely in the same position as a publican keeping a house outside it; that is to say, whether, if he gives refreshment in fermented liquors after 11 o'clock and before one, he would not be liable to a penalty?—It does appear to me to be so.

85. Therefore if you altered it to ten the consequence would be that the opportunity of obtaining any refreshment when they came to the end of their journey would be entirely debarred to any person travelling by railway?—Yes, between eleven and one now, or between ten and one in the case supposed.

86. Then all refreshment must cease at ten o'clock, whether it be upon a railway or whether it be at an ordinary public-house?—It appears to me to be so.

87. Chairman.] My question had not reference only to travellers; the Act of 1854 was repealed, repealed, and the hours were again extended to those provided for by the Act of 9 Geo. 4?—Yes.

88. Mr. Locke.] The Act of 1848, the 11 and 12 Vict., c. 49, s. 1, is still in force, is it not?—Yes, that section enacts, that no licensed victualler or other person shall open his house for the sale of wine, spirits, beer, or other fermented or distilled liquors, or sell the same on Sunday, Christmas-day, or Good Friday, or any day appointed for a public fast or thanksgiving, except as refreshment for travellers, before half-past 12 o'clock in the afternoon, or where the morning Divine service in the church or principal place of worship of the parish or place does not usually terminate by that time at an earlier hour than was then allowed by law, that was one o'clock, but it says that this shall not apply to the metropolitan police district.

89. Will you look at Section 2 of that Act and state what are its provisions?—That provides against keeping house open or selling beer, or suffering the same to be drunk before one o'clock on Sunday.

90. The 11 & 12 Vict. repealed that, and therefore the 11 & 12 Vict. brought it back to the same thing as the 9 Geo. 4, did it not?—I think so.

91. The 3 & 4 Vict. had altered it to that extent, fixing the hour to one o'clock, but it was brought back to the 9 Geo. 4 by the 11 & 12 Vict.?—I do not think that by the 9 Geo. 4 there was that prohibition.

92. The Licensing Act, the 9 Geo. 4, c. 61, made the time of opening eight hours, from one till three, and from five till eleven; that is precisely the same number of hours as it is under the 18 and 19 Vict.?—I do not remember any hour being mentioned.

93. It mentions public worship, does it not?—Yes, that was the law during the hours of public worship; but, in fact, that Act became impracticable in London for this reason, that a parish had one hour of divine service at one side of the street, and a different hour at the other side, and especially in the afternoon, so that virtually in the afternoon the Act of the 9 Geo. 4 was inoperative.

94. Chairman.] Then it was really the Act of 1855 that restored the law in principle to that of the 9 Geo. 4, and which defined it?—Very much so, covering the whole time till one o'clock in the forenoon of Sundays.

95. Mr. Locke.] That is covered by the 11 & 12 Vict., is it not?—Except that that was to half-past 12, and the 18 & 19 Vict. applied over the whole kingdom.

96. You see the 18 & 19 Vict. c. 118; only applies to the afternoon, but the law with respect to closing up to one o'clock on the Sunday is by a former Act, and I will refer you to the case of Taylor, appellant, and Humphries, respondent. You will find in that case that the 11 & 12 Vict. c. 49, is not repealed by the subsequent statutes, of the 17 & 18 Vict. c. 79, or the 18 & 19 Vict. c. 116, as was supposed in the case of the Queen v. Whiteley in 3 Hurlstone and Norman's Reports, page 143, but still regulates the closing of houses for the sale of wines, spirits, beer, or other fermented or distilled liquors during the morning service. The 18 & 19 Vict. c. 118, applies only to the afternoon service, and therefore the law as to closing during the morning service, which is usually said to be till half past 12, still applies, and therefore one o'clock is taken to be the hour that is provided for by the 11 & 12 Vict., but the 18 & 19 Vict. is now the Act in force with regard to the afternoon?—Yes.

97. Therefore you may take it that the hours are from one till three, and from five till eleven, during which the house may be open?—Yes.

98. The 17th and 18th of Victoria, chapter 79, section 1 (that is Mr. Wilson Patten's Act), made a restriction, and the restriction was this: that a house might be opened from one till half-past two, and from six to ten; therefore it took an hour off from five to six, and it left five and a half hours for the house to be open; and this Bill, which is before the Committee, would allow a house to be opened for three-and-a-half hours; is it correct that the period during which public-houses may be open by the last Act, is eight hours?—Yes; that is to say from one to three in the afternoon, and from five to eleven in the evening; but perhaps you will allow me to say that my law is confined to the metropolitan police district, and by that law the public-houses were closed until one o'clock. By the Police Act, the 2 & 3 Vict. c. 47, s. 42, no licensed victualler, or other person, shall open his house within the metropolitan police district for the sale of wine, beer, spirits, or other fermented or distilled liquors on Sunday, Christmas-day, and Good Friday, before the hour of one in the afternoon, except for the sale of refreshment for travellers.

99. That clears up the difficulty about the half-hour, namely, from half-past twelve till one, which in the country now I suppose is regulated by the morning service, which is taken to end at one; is not that so?—It is not in these words; it is until one now generally; it used to be until half-past 12.

100. But still, in the country, they are under the 11 & 12 Vict., are they not?—Yes; I believe so.

101. Under that Act the opening commences at half-past 12, but in London you say that the 2 & 3 Vict. enacts, distinctly, that the public-houses shall be closed till one o'clock?—Yes.

102. Mr. Hibbert.] Is it not the fact that, owing to the difficulty of divine service terminating at different times in London, that Act of 2 & 3 Vict. was obtained, and that Act required the public-houses to be kept closed till one o'clock in the metropolitan district?—Yes.

103. And was not an Act also passed for the City of London the year after, which closed the public-houses to the same hour?—Yes; the City Act was merely a transcript of this Act.

104. The following year, 1843, the Liverpool people came for an Act, and they also applied, did they not, the same hours as were applied in the metropolitan district; that is to say, the houses were closed in the morning until one o'clock?—I am not aware what was the case in Liverpool; I only know that the general law was, as Mr. Locke has stated, that in the country, out of the metropolitan district, the closing hour in the morning was until half-past 12; and that in the metropolitan district, since the 2 & 3 Vict., which was in the year 1839, they were not allowed to open until one o'clock.

105. The metropolitan district is under the Act of the 2 & 3 Vict. c. 47, is it not, with regard to the morning part of the day?—Yes.

106. And,

106. And, therefore, they close up to one o'clock?—Yes.

107. But the country districts are under the Act of the 11 & 12 Vict., by which they close up to half-past 12?—I am not so certain about that; but I believe that is so. But my knowledge upon these matters is principally confined to what is in operation in the metropolitan police district, and in that district the hour of closing is from 12 o'clock on Saturday night until one o'clock on Sunday mid-day, and then they open from one till three and from five till eleven.

108. Chairman.] It was not merely with reference to travellers that I asked you whether you thought that the hours of opening might be still further shortened without hardship, but with regard to the metropolitan district; is it your opinion that the law might now be again changed in the direction of restriction?—My general objection to restrictions of this nature is that they apply so partially to the different classes of the community; to the lower classes it is certainly a much greater privation to be unable at any time of the day to go into a public-house or a beerhouse, than it is to the middle or upper classes. We have houses, or clubs, or places where we can get what we want; but if the public-houses are closed, the people of what we may call generally the lower classes, have no places where they can get refreshment.

109. In your opinion, was the Act of 1854, Mr. Wilson Patten's Act, repealed because the restrictions imposed by that Act led to complaints?—I believe that was the fact; I heard it continually, and I remember that pieces of plate, and votes of approval were presented to Mr. Berkeley for his more liberal legislation.

110. Mr. Horsfall.] Were those complaints from the labouring classes, or from the licensed victuallers?—I have no very certain or specific grounds for the opinion, but my opinion generally is that there was a complaint made by licensed victuallers; I dare say principally and prominently by them, but also the law operated no doubt in depriving the more numerous of the lower classes of the means of getting what to many was a reasonable refreshment.

111. Mr. John Abel Smith.] Do you know anything about the complaints?—I could not give any specific instances now, but I understood generally that it was so; in fact, I understood that that was the foundation of the Committee being appointed.

112. Chairman.] You stated before the Committee of 1855, Mr. Berkeley's Committee, that you thought that the restriction to 10 o'clock at night was felt as a hardship, and that the hour might be extended to 11 without objection?—So I thought; between 10 and 11 is a time when many people are walking about and coming home, and they want refreshment, and I thought 11 was a more reasonable hour to go to bed. There is no specific line to be drawn; I could not give any very distinct reasons for its being 11 more than 10, except that generally people would be getting home to their beds, and would not want refreshment at 11, when they might want it between 10 and 11.

113. This is the evidence which you gave to the Committee in 1855, in answer to Question No. 1117: the question was, "You seem to recommend that the law should be so far relaxed that the hours should be extended from 10 to 11?" And your answer was, "11 or 12 o'clock;

I do not think it signifies very much which. My impression rather than opinion is, that closing between half-past two and six causes such an amount of inconvenience to a very numerous class, that the advantage is not an equivalent." What I ask you now is, whether you think that a similar restriction could be again imposed without causing a similar inconvenience to that which you at that time described?—I do not remember my answer, but it seems to apply rather to the afternoon than to the night; I think it would be inconvenient to impose a restriction closing the houses till six.

114. The Bill before the Committee proposes that the houses should be closed from half past two until eight in the afternoon, and from 10 until 11 in the afternoon; those restrictions at least correspond, do they not, to those to which you were referring in the answer which I have read?—Yes.

115. Is it your opinion that any part of those restrictions could be imposed without inflicting an inconvenience, which, as you said in 1855, would be more than equivalent to the advantage?—Really I think so, because I dislike restrictions to so great an extent; I should say again that I have a general impression that restrictions are evils, and I think that under the present law there has been a great improvement.

116. Mr. Roebuck.] Having in your mind the answer that you gave in 1855, has increased experience led you to change your opinion?—No, I am not aware of any sufficient ground to justify any additional restriction. One laments the number of drunken people that there are on Sundays, but I think the closing the houses against all for the sake of protecting those who might escape drunkenness thereby, would operate to produce a far greater amount of inconvenience.

117. Chairman.] You regarded the inconvenience to be chiefly felt on account of the restrictions on the afternoon hours which had been imposed in the previous year?—That was so.

118. The inconvenience from closing at 10 instead of 11 would be less, would it not?—Yes.

119. But do you think, from your experience, that the drunkenness on Sunday evening would be much diminished by closing at 10 instead of 11?—It is difficult to say; I should think that people who are sober up to 10 are not very apt to get drunk between 10 and 11 on Sunday; but if they are half drunk at 10 they might get more drunk between 10 and 11.

120. With regard to the facility of carrying out the law, is it your opinion that the placing any further restrictions upon the hours during which public-houses are open to the public on Sundays, would lead to serious discontent in the metropolis?—I think it would lead to a considerable amount of discontent; and there is also this to be considered with regard to all restrictions, that they lead to an evasion of the law in a way that it is almost impossible to prevent. People get the drink carried into houses near at hand, and they get into concealed places where it is extremely difficult to reach them; I have now a number of policemen who are employed every Sunday for the suppression of what is called Sunday trading, which certainly produces inconvenience in other ways; by Sunday trading I mean Sunday trading in intoxicating drinks. This requires a number of policemen to be employed now, first of all taking them from their very important duties, and I should say the more important duties of protecting property and life; property certainly; and likewise it requires them to act in a manner which very often places them in a very objectionable light before the public. There must be a certain degree of concealment which although for particular objects it may be quite legitimate, yet for others it is very much disliked by the public. Many magistrates, I know, strictly require proof that there was actual drinking going on; and of course people will not drink in the face of a policeman in his uniform, so that they are obliged, in order to effect any detection, to put on some dress which is called a disguise, and generally, also, they must say or do something which places them in a position of concealment of what they really are. These are objections, I think, and the greater the restrictions the greater the number of cases of that sort which must arise.

121. Are constables employed in plain clothes for the purpose of detecting illegal trading in liquors?—They are occasionally, but I dislike it so much that I generally decline to allow them, but in some cases it must be done. Those who evade the law have people who are called touters at a distance from the public-house to watch the police coming, and on the alarm being given they put away all their glasses, and when the police come in they merely find the people all sitting there. And also an evasion of the law takes place very largely from lodgers. A man says there are lodgers in my house, and where there are lodgers it is very difficult indeed very often to prove that they are not, even when they are not so. Sometimes the police know that they are not lodgers, and they say, we know this man; he is so and so, living in the neighbourhood, and we know that he is not a lodger; but in a great many cases in which the law is practically evaded detection does not follow, from the difficulty of proving that they are not lodgers.

122. But the restrictions imposed by the present law are acquiesced in with cheerfulness, are they not?—I think so; that is to say, a good many attempt to evade them, but I think by the public generally they are acquiesced in.

123. But is it your opinion that if Parliament were to consider that some further restriction might take place, it would be acquiesced in in a like spirit, or that it would lead to any great dissatisfaction?—I think that it would lead to dissatisfaction. I know that a great many most excellent persons think otherwise, but I certainly have no reason to suppose that the public at large demand a more restrictive law.

124. Mr. Roebuck.] The number of hours being made smaller on Sunday may probably diminish the number of cases of drunkards on that day, but have you any idea whether it increases the number of drunkards of the succeeding week days?—The number certainly remains curiously alike upon the whole number of the days of the week, but I have a return which I have not got here of the Mondays, showing that there was some increase on those days, but not very great; perhaps Wednesday, Thursday, and Friday are rather soberer days than either Saturday afternoon or Monday or Tuesday.

125. You stated that restriction led to evasion; what sort of mode does the evasion take; are there small shops in which people that wish to get drink can get drink?—That is done to some degree, but not much; it is principally done by having houses adjoining, or back yards and courts, and places where people assemble; a man gets some drink in on Saturday, or during the hours that the houses are open on Sunday, in the lower parts of the town, and the people assemble there and drink; but there is a considerable evasion in premises immediately adjoining the lower class of public-houses. I should, however, say that a large number obey the law strictly.

126. Then the mischief arising from evasion is created by the restriction?—Yes.

127. Therefore, does not it follow in your mind that we must take that element of evil in connection with any good that may happen from the restriction?—Undoubtedly it is a balance between the good and the evil.

128. Have you, in your own mind, weighed them together, so as to know whether, in your conception, the one is balanced by the other; whether the mischief arising from restriction is balanced by any marvellous good that is done by it?—I think that there has been good done by the present restrictive hours; but if you increase the restrictions you increase the danger of evasion, and all evasions are bad, and accustom people to disregard the law and give them a general disrespect for the observance of the law.

129. Supposing that the hours of opening were restricted to 10 instead of 11 o'clock, what amount of good do you imagine would arise from that restriction?—It is very difficult to form any opinion of that kind. I think it would probably reduce the number of cases of drunkenness.

130. What evidence have you that leads you to that "probably"?—From the general belief that a man who may have drunk a little too much at 10 may get more between 10 and 11; each hour that a public-house is open there is an opportunity for persons getting drunk if they are so disposed.

131. But would you carry it thus far. Supposing that you were to shut them up altogether, do you think that that would put an end to all drunkenness?—No, I do not, unless you could prevent them getting drink elsewhere, which I do not think you could. There used to be in former times what were called Tom-and-Jerry shops, which were in truth the results of the restrictive law at that time with regard to the consumption of drink upon the premises; it was always evaded in that way. People got beer and spirits and other things from a public-house, and took them to some place elsewhere which was not licensed, where the people got drunk, and not even with the control, so far as it went, of the order which the landlord was required to maintain within the public-house.

132. You say that the Tom-and-Jerry shops were the result of increased restriction; since that increased restriction has been taken off, have the Tom-and-Jerry shops disappeared?—Yes, in my district certainly; there may be some, but I am not aware of their existence.

133. Would not you draw from thence the conclusion that it would be a very dangerous thing to increase the restriction; is not that the logical consequence?—It is open to that conclusion, no doubt.

134. Is not that the logical consequence?—Yes, I think it is.

135. Mr. Horsfall.] You spoke, did you not, of the variation in the number of cases of drunkenness, from 14,000 to 20,000, and in one case to 22,000?—Yes; I do not know that it has ever been

Sir
R. Mayne,
K.C.B.

been so low as 14,000; 16,000 I think is the lowest.

136. Were the regulations of the police the same, during the whole of this period, as to reporting cases?—The regulations were just the same. The Sale of Beer Act of the 11 & 12 Vict. c. 49, gives power to the police to enter public-houses; and the fifth section says, that "It shall be lawful for any constable, at any time, to enter into any house or place of public resort for the sale of wines, spirits, or other fermented or distilled liquors; and every person who shall refuse to admit, or shall not admit such constable into such house or place shall be deemed guilty of an offence against this Act." I am not quite sure, at this moment, whether that was the first time such a power was given, but at all events since that time the police have had the power of demanding admission, which gives them, of course, much greater means of ascertaining what evasion of the law there may be; but nevertheless that even is evaded by the time that they take before they admit the police; they sometimes say that they are in bed, or that they cannot come down, and when the police are waiting outside they have frequently heard glasses ginging, and evidently put out of the way, so that the law is evaded in that way.

137. But irrespective of that law the instructions which you give to the police are substantially the same, are they not?—Just so.

138. When you spoke of public-houses being closed for a greater number of hours, being a privation to the lower class, or the labouring class, you spoke, of course, of a section of them, did you not?—It would in some degree apply to all.

139. I presume you have no means of ascertaining that the majority of the lower classes would wish those houses to be open?—No, I have not.

140. Mr. Baines.] Your returns of the number of cases of drunkenness extends, do they not, from the year 1831 to the present time?—Yes.

141. I want to know what changes have taken place in the number of hours that the public-houses are open on Sunday within that period; that is to say, at the first time, from 1831, what number of hours, from four o'clock on Sunday morning, to four o'clock on Monday morning, were the public-houses, by law, allowed to be open?—I think practically, between 1831 and 1839, the public-houses were not required to close at any hour on Sunday. There was a general law about closing during the hours of Divine service, morning and afternoon; but as I said that law was nearly inoperative, if not wholly so from the divisions of parishes, and the different hours of Divine service both morning and afternoon.

142. Then do you mean now to say that public-houses were open from four o'clock on Sunday morning, all the time, until four o'clock on Monday morning, 24 hours?—I think so far as the police were concerned, there was no restriction enforced.

143. When did the first practical restriction take place?—In 1839, by the 2nd and 3rd of Victoria, chapter 47.

144. For what number of hours then were the public-houses opened?—They were prevented opening until 1 o'clock on Sunday, from 12 o'clock on Saturday night, that is in the Metropolis. I confine my observation to what is called the Metropolitan Police District, which means about 15 or 16 miles round Charing Cross. The 42nd Clause of that Act says, "that no licensed victualler or other person shall open his house within the metropolitan police district for the sale of wine, spirits, beer, or other fermented or distilled liquors, on Sundays, Christmas-day, and Good Friday, between the hour of one in the afternoon, except refreshment for travellers;" so that from 12 o'clock on Saturday night, when the Sunday begins, until one o'clock on Sunday mid-day, the public-houses were closed within the metropolitan police district. I may add that the old law still remained in force about the afternoon Divine service, but as I have said it was not enforced, in truth it could not be, for the hour varied so much.

145. Then, having opened at one, at what hour were the public-houses again closed?—I say, as far as any steps by the police to restrict them were concerned, they were not closed at all, they remained open the whole time.

146. Were they not closed until four o'clock on Monday morning?—They might remain open without closing the whole night or morning, just as they were on other days.

147. Then from one o'clock on Sunday, to four o'clock on Monday, was 15 hours that they might be open?—Yes, but they might be open beyond four; there was no restriction then to four o'clock.

148. But you have given us the hours from four on Sunday morning to four on Monday morning, and I wish you to confine your answer to that; will you go on and state what was the next restriction that took place in the way of altering the time of being open on Sunday between those hours?—The next restriction was that of the 17 & 18 Vict. c. 79, which was repealed the following year by the 18 & 19 Vict. c. 188; Mr. Berkeley's Act, which is the law still in force.

149. Was the Act of 1848, Mr. Wilson Patten's Act?—No, the 17 & 18 Vict. was Mr. Wilson Patten's Act.

150. What number of hours were the public-houses allowed to be open by that Act of 1848?—I have not got that Act before me, but the 11th and 12th of Victoria, chap. 49, says, that no licensed victualler shall open his house for the sale of wine, spirits, beer, or other fermented or distilled liquors, or sell the same on Sunday before half-past 12 on Sunday afternoon; but that did not apply to the metropolitan district, and it remained until one in the metropolitan district. The next Act was, I think, that of Mr. Wilson Patten, the 17th and 18th of Victoria.

151. Then the Act of 1848 did not practically alter the hours?—No, it did not, within the metropolitan district.

152. By Mr. Wilson Patten's Act of 1854, the public-houses were required to be closed between half-past two and six, and they might remain open from six to 10?—Yes.

153. Mr. Locke.] Under that Act the houses were closed from half-past two to six, instead of to five as before, and were opened from six to 10, giving 5½ hours open?—Yes.

154. Mr. Baines.] How many hours by the Act of 1855, are they allowed to be open?—They are open from one until three, closed between three and five, and then open from five to 11.

155. Then are we to understand that from

Sir
R. Mayne,
K.C.B.

1831 to 1839 the public-houses were open for 24 hours of the Sunday?—Practically that was so; or rather I should say that might be so, because I believe that a great number of publicans did close. As far as any law was enforced they might be open; the law required them to close during the hours of Divine service, morning and afternoon.

156. Then from 1839 to 1854 practically they might have been open 15 hours; by the law of 1854 they were reduced to the period of 5½ hours during which they might be open, and then by the Act of 1855 the period was enlarged again to eight hours during which they might be open?—Yes, that is so.

157. Then these being the facts it would appear that the reduction in the number of cases of drunkenness to which you have alluded, and which may be taken either as a positive or as a comparative reduction has corresponded with the reduction in the number of hours that the public-houses have been open on Sunday?—I do not know that it quite leads to that.

158. I am simply saying that the two things have occurred at the same time; that the reduction is greater under the state of the law in which public-houses are open a much shorter time than under the old state of the law?—Yes.

159. Would you draw the deduction from that, that the gradual progress of restriction has been beneficial to the public morals or otherwise?—I have said that that is my opinion, but still I couple with that the opinion that there is a limit. I think that when you come to a certain amount of restriction, you come to a certain amount of evasion, and the law is in fact not operative, as it were, that is to say, it is so much evaded; and besides that there is the inconvenience, which is perhaps not a question of morals, but there is a great inconvenience in the fact that people who should legitimately get drink are not allowed to get it.

160. You have no doubt that the practice of drunkenness is highly injurious to the men themselves, and to their wives and children?—None whatever.

161. And that the more drunkenness can be diminished, the more beneficial it will be for the wives and children, as well as for the working men themselves, both in their character and in their industry?—I think that if you could improve the morals of everybody, and could make everybody in the community sober, it would be far better for everybody in the community.

162. Colonel Fane.] You have mentioned that one great source of difficulty which the police have is the lodgers; is there any restriction on the part of the police, or have they any power to prevent a lodger taking any quantity of liquor during the permitted hours, seeing that he is a lodger, and carrying it into his own room?—There is no power of that sort.

163. Would it be possible to make any alteration in the word "lodger," so as to catch hold of such people as act in that way?—I have not thought of how such a clause should be worded, but no doubt there is very great evasion caused by that word "lodger."

164. And the police have found very great difficulty in bringing them under the law, in consequence of lodgers acting in this way?—That is so.

165. Mr. John Abel Smith.] Will you have the goodness to refer to the returns which you gave in the beginning of your examination, as to the division of time which you stated as regards the drunken cases. You took a period between 1831 and the present moment, but as I understand you made a separate classification?—I think I took the period from 1831 to 1861. The number of drunken cases, including disorderly cases from 1831 to 1833, I excluded for this reason, that the superintendents then discharged a number of cases of mere drunkenness, and I believe a much greater proportion of cases were taken by the police then than subsequently; so that I begin from the year 1834, when the mode of enforcing the law by taking cases before the magistrates has been the same.

166. What are the instructions given to policemen with regard to drunken cases?—That if a person is merely drunk, and not exposed to danger either of person or property, he should be got home if his home is known.

167. The fact is that the policeman directs his attention rather to the security of the individual than the notice or the punishment of the offence?—It is so.

168. Now will you go on with those returns?—The number of cases in 1834 of all sorts, male and female, orderly and disorderly was 19,779, the population being as we then estimated it 1,607,350.

169. Now will you go to 1848?—In 1848 the number of male and female cases, orderly and disorderly, drunk only, and drunk and disorderly, was 20,829, the population being then 2,952,000.

170. That practically was a great diminution?—Yes, looking at the population it was so. Then last year, which was 1867, nine years afterwards, the numbers were 16,941, the population being 3,452,000; so that that makes a very remarkable diminution with reference to the population. I should state however that 16,941 or nearly 17,000 is rather an unusually low number, because in the previous year it was 18,000, and the year before that 19,000; so that 16,000 for some reason or other is an exceptional year.

171. You stated, did you not, in answer to Mr. Baines, that up to a certain period, there was practically no restriction on a publican from keeping his house open all night?—I think it amounted to that; certainly by the police there was not any. I found it so difficult and in truth impossible to enforce the law that I desired the police not to attempt to do it.

172. Have you any doubt whatever that the restriction is a large portion of the cause of the diminished drunkenness?—I think it has been a cause.

173. Have you any doubt as to the large share which drunkenness takes in the production of crime?—None whatsoever. I am sure that it produces a great deal of crime, both directly and indirectly. It leads directly to crime, disorder, assaults, and violence, and it also leads to the commission of offences against property, immediately and indirectly by poverty, and it leads to a reckless, dissolute state of morals.

174. Then your conclusion probably would be that restriction, though in itself an evil, may be necessary to meet so great an evil as drunkenness?—I think so; perhaps I may add that the restriction with regard to the closing on Saturday nights, I think, has had a remarkable effect in that respect. Many men that were drunk, or nearly drunk, or having drunk more than they ought, ought, at 11 o'clock on Saturday night, remained in the public-house through the whole Sunday morning, as it were, till the following day. They were then drunk, and ready to begin to drink more; but the closing now at 11 o'clock necessarily gives them time to get sober before they can begin to drink again. Being closed at 11 o'clock, the public-house is not open till one the following day, and men not being able to get drink after 11 on Saturday night, necessarily get sober, as far as public-house drinking is concerned, between that and 1 o'clock the next day, when for the first time they can begin again to drink in a public-house.

175. Then your limit to the restriction would be simply this one; namely, that it is good up to the point at which it excites so much inconvenience and general dissatisfaction that it leads to an evasion which renders the restriction practically useless?—Yes, I think that that is a fair statement of the case.

176. Have you turned your attention at all to the working first of all of the Sunday Closing Act of 1848?—Yes, that was the closing from 12 o'clock on Saturday night till one o'clock on Sunday. The Act that I specially alluded to was the 2nd & 3rd of Victoria, which was passed in the year 1839, which operated most usefully in closing the public-houses for so long a period.

177. With regard to the returns which you have laid before the Committee as to drunkenness in London, although it may give an accurate idea as to the amount of drunkenness with violence, it gives no correct idea whatever of the real amount of drunkenness?—Drunkenness is a vague word in police understanding; they have a variety of expressions, such as the worse for liquor, intoxicated, and having drunk too much, and various other expressions; but the term includes all cases of persons who are actually drunk, reeling, and so drunk as to be incapable of taking care of themselves, as well as those who are only what we may call forward in liquor (there are all sorts of expressions for it), and those who being in that state commit some assault or disorder.

178. Has there ever been any notice taken of the number of persons visiting public-houses during the Sunday?—Not that I am aware of; at least not by me.

179. Have you any return showing the number of suicides on Sunday or Saturday night?—No, I have not.

180. With regard to the operation of the Act, 1854, Mr. Wilson Patten's Act; it was in existence so short a time that you declined to give any opinion upon it?—Yes, that is so.

181. But you did state that it was altered by Mr. Berkeley's Act in consequence of the objections that were made to it?—So I understood.

182. Can you give the Committee any facts or definite information with reference to that?—I am not able.

183. Have you any reason, in your situation as Chief Commissioner of Police, to believe that Mr. Wilson Patten's Act had anything to do with the disorders which took place in London in the winter of 1854-55?—Yes, I think so.

184. You think you know that?—Yes, that was with regard to the Sunday Trading Act generally, I think.

185. No, it was not. The Sunday Trading Act was Lord Robert Grosvenor's?—That was the Act which I thought you meant.

186. That was not Mr. Wilson Patten's Act, 0.69.

and I want to draw a distinction between Mr. Wilson Patten's Act and Lord Robert Grosvenor's Act?—Lord Robert Grosvenor's was only a Bill, it never became an Act.

187. You think that Lord Robert Grosvenor's Bill was the cause of the disorders in Hyde Park?—It was the immediate cause, but I understood and believed that the great excitement was in consequence of the restrictions of the Public House Act, which they said would be carried further if the Bill of Lord Robert Grosvenor's became law, I know that they were mixed up; it was considered by us at the time that the one was considered in connection with the other; that if Lord Robert Grosvenor's Bill became law, it would be a precedent to carry the Public House Act still further, and in that way they raised a general clamour; and a very strong feeling was excited which was expressed in a very noisy way and a very troublesome way for the police by the Hyde Park disturbances of that day.

188. I will ask you about the Act of 1864, Sir George Grey's Early Closing Act; I think I understood you to have expressed a very strong opinion of the usefulness of that Act with regard to drunkenness on Saturday night?—I have done so; and I may add that whatever merit or otherwise there may be in that clause I may claim it, for I had for several years been urging such a clause, in communication with some of the vestrys, especially the vestry of St. James's parish; I told them that I saw no other way to the prevention of such disorders as there were in the Haymarket especially, which was the most conspicuous place, but in other places likewise, except by closing the public-houses at that hour, and I urged that very much upon Sir George Grey, who considered it greatly, and at length acted upon it.

189. Drawing your attention to the fact that in 1848 (I leave out Mr. Wilson Patten's Act as too short a one), in 1855, and in 1864 there were in each of those three years restraining Acts passed, do not you think that it is a fair conclusion that the diminished drunkenness in proportion to the population is to be attributed to the working of those Acts?—To some degree; I cannot distinguish to what, but to some degree, I do not hesitate to express my opinion that those restrictions have been useful.

190. You have read some returns with reference to the drinking on Sunday, and I think I understood you to say this, that finding the return which at first was presented to you, namely, from 12 o'clock on Saturday night, to 12 o'clock on Sunday night, to be not a fair one, you directed a return to be taken from 4 o'clock on Sunday morning to 4 o'clock on Monday morning?—Just so, taking the 24 hours from 4 o'clock on Sunday morning, instead of from 12 o'clock on Saturday night.

191. And I think I understood you to say that the return gave you the number of 25 drunk on the Sunday as against 50 on the working days?—That is so.

192. Do you not believe that the main drunkenness does exist between the hours of giving up working on the Saturday and the closing of the public-house at night?—It would be a very large proportion. It will appear, I think, in some degree from this that the difference between 12 o'clock on Saturday night and 4 o'clock on what we may call Sunday morning or Saturday night, is as between 97 and 50, nearly double, you will observe.

Sir
R. Mayne,
 K.C.B.

193. Therefore it shows, does it not, that the larger amount of drunkenness is on the Saturday night?—There is a very large amount. The men receive their wages on that day. Just to show from the first what was our view upon that point, on the first establishment of the police we made our pay-day Wednesday instead of Saturday, feeling that it was advisable to pay them in the sober part of the week, the police being wanted very much upon the Saturday, when the rest of the community were more addicted to drinking.

194. Do you know at all what is the number of public-houses and beer shops in London now?—Yes, I have got a return for the year 1866. The number of public-houses within the metropolitan district is 6,479, and the number of beer-houses is 4,207, making a total of 10,686; that was for the year ending 1866, and I do not think that there is much difference now.

195. Can you compare that with any former period?—I have not got it here, but I can give it for any period.

196. Has there been a great increase?—I am not aware that there has in proportion to the population. My impression is that there has not, but I can give a return on that point.

197. Could you give a return with regard to that for 10 or 20 years ago?—Yes, I will do so.

198. From the persons under your command, do you know anything at all of the feelings of the working men in London with regard to the restrictions on drinking?—I think they are unfavourable to them generally.

199. Have you ever heard that expressed?—Yes. I think if you were to poll the working people they would be found unfavourable.

200. Do you think that the majority would be against the restrictions?—I think so.

201. Have you ever turned your attention to that point, or have you ever made inquiries upon it?—Only in this way, that I have found that at the period of Lord Robert Grosvenor's Bill, which has been spoken of, there certainly was a strong feeling connected with the closing of the public-houses, they felt that it was a restriction. The opposition was said to have been got up very much by the publicans themselves, but I think that it was excited by a general feeling against the restriction.

202. With regard to the evasions of the restrictions, assuming them to be very considerable, still the drinking is very much less under the restrictions in spite of the evasions, compared to what it would be without the restrictions?—It is in fact so, looking at the population, and I think it would be still more so. There would be greater drunkenness if there were no restrictions.

203. With respect to the success of evasions, do the evasions bear any proportion to that state of drunkenness which would exist if there were no restrictions?—No, I think not. A very large class, indeed, of publicans and licensed victuallers, I believe, observe the law most strictly. It is principally, I think, in what you may call the low neighbourhoods of the town that the evasions take place; for instance, parts of Whitechapel, parts of the Mint, Lisson Grove, Gray's-inn-lane, and what the police generally would call a low neighbourhood.

204. With regard to the effect of the restrictions proposed in the Bill now under the notice of the Committee, what would be the amount of inconvenience that would be caused by limiting the hours to 10 instead of 11 at night?—I cannot form more than a vague opinion upon that; but in fine summer weather when people are walking about to a late hour, a great many people are out between 10 and 11 who would reasonably desire to get drink, for refreshment properly speaking, who would be prevented. As to what the number of those would be I can form no opinion, but I think there is a large proportion.

205. Do you know anything of the habits of England generally with regard to Sunday excursions as compared with London?—No, I have not the means of knowing. In London I know it is very extensively done, and I think most beneficially so, notwithstanding all the evils connected with it. I hear people at Richmond complaining of Sunday disorder, and in the neighbourhood of the Crystal Palace, and at other places they complain also, but still I think, taking them as a whole, they are most beneficial.

206. Do you know whether there is any one place in England or Wales in which the habit of Sunday excursions prevails at all to the same degree that it does in London?—I am not able to say, but I believe that it does prevail largely; I happen sometimes to visit near Liverpool, and I have heard that it does there prevail very largely, and at Manchester I have heard that it is so, but I have only casual means of information; I do not know anything positive about it.

207. With regard to the inconvenience on account of the restriction imposed by this Bill, you attach considerable importance in the metropolitan district to the hour between 10 and 11 on Sunday night?—Yes, I do.

208. With regard to the metropolitan district, the inconvenience of taking away that hour would be in proportion to the number of excursion travellers, would it not?—No; I should not quite restrict it to that; I think that a great number of persons walking about the parks and the streets would desire to have refreshments; people going out in little taxed carts and such things, and coming home and wanting refreshments.

209. But that is all a part and parcel of the great desire prevailing so largely in London of a visit to the country on Sunday whether they go in carts or in trains?—I think that that is very considerable; many go little distances; many go to Battersea Park and walk about there.

210. Do you think that those are not home by 10 o'clock?—I think not, looking at the distances from which they come; sometimes when I have been there I have noticed with pleasure people coming there after their dinner hour, between 3 and 4 o'clock, and staying there late and going home to their distant places of abode afterwards.

211. Have you any idea at all as to the amount of diminution of drinking which has been produced by the distress in London of late years?—I have no means of judging.

212. You do not know how far it would operate in the direction of the reduction of drunkenness which has taken place?—I do not.

213. Have you any doubt that it has operated in that direction?—It reduces the number of drinkers certainly, but drunkards are very often a wretched class, who will drink although they starve themselves; it must have had an effect, I should think, but I have no means officially of judging of that effect.

214. With regard to the railway refreshment rooms, they are shut up by law now, are they not, from 11 till 1 on Sunday nights?—Yes, so it appears; pears; I never looked at the Act with that view before, but so it appears.

215. Would the removal of the restriction upon the railway refreshment rooms from 10 to 11 diminish to any great extent your objection to the limitation of the hours?—It is, perhaps, only a guess, but I believe that there is no distinction made, and that at the railway they would supply you with refreshments at any time; I mean that they make practically no distinction between 11 and 1 on Sundays, and I imagine that they would give you refreshment if you required it.

216. That is the law as you state, and as I believe justly state it; but if that restriction with regard to the railway refreshment rooms were taken off would not that powerfully affect your objection to the limitation of the hours as proposed in the Bill?—It would do so to a certain degree, certainly; at the same time, if one is correct in believing that they serve between those hours it could not have much effect; but if it were enforced it would.

217. Then I collect as the general result of your opinion this, that you are generally averse to restriction?—I am.

218. But that you believe that the effect of restriction with reference to drunkenness has been beneficial?—I am equally of that opinion.

219. And further, that the limit to that restriction ought to be one, and one only, namely, the discontent produced by the restriction and the evasion being beyond control?—I do not speak quite so decidedly upon that; but those are certainly very important ingredients in considering the question. It is a very important ingredient in objecting to restrictions that you get an amount of discontent, and an amount of evasion, and above all an evasion which of itself defeats the law.

220. Assuming that restriction has been beneficial, is there any other limit to that restriction than its effect in producing discontent and evasion?—Those are the general heads, I think, and even without discontent I should use that rather large word "inconvenience."

221. Mr. Hibbert.] If I correctly understood you, you stated in reply to one of the Honourable Members, that previous to 1839, when the London Police Act was obtained, the public-houses and beer-houses in London might remain open; at least there was no police regulation to prevent them remaining open the whole of the day?—That was practically so. I should state that the police were in existence from 1829, 10 years before that, but such was the state of the law that that was the first law, which as a police law gave any direct power to the police to require the houses to be closed.

222. Was not it the fact that in every license that was granted by the magistrates, there was a condition that the houses should be closed during the hours of Divine Service?—Yes, that was so since the 9th of Geo. 4.

223. Therefore if the police had been authorised to watch those houses, perhaps they might have been closed during the hours of Divine Service, and ought to have been closed during the hours of Divine Service?—If you will allow me to say so as to the word "ought," I would rather deal with it in this way: I found that it produced such extraordinary results and such a state of things that I thought that the police ought not to attempt to enforce such a law; as for instance, on the one side of Oxford-street, a public-house was closed for an afternoon service, and on the other side a public-house was thronged with people, there not being an afternoon service in that district then, so that the publicans naturally complained of it, and no good whatsoever was done in checking drunkenness, because the people who could not get drink at one place could get it at another just across the street.

224. On those grounds I presume the police authorities of London recommended the insertion of that clause in the Act of the 2nd and 3rd of Victoria?—That was done, I believe, upon my own recommendation.

225. After that, the City of London followed your example, and the same year they obtained a similar clause in their Act?—Yes, later in the year.

226. Then two years later, was not a clause put into an Act, with reference to steamboats on the river?—Yes, there was.

227. Do you know what restriction was imposed by the 5 & 6 Vict. c. 44, s. 5?—It was this: "No wines, spirits, or other exciseable liquors shall be sold by retail on board of any boat, steamboat, or other vessel which shall be moored or lying at anchor" (that was only when they were moored or at anchor) "within the metropolitan police district, during the hours and times on Sundays, Good Friday, and Christmas-day on which licensed victuallers are by law obliged to keep their houses closed."

228. Then I understand that the next Act which was passed with reference to the restrictions on the hours of sale, was in the year 1848, when a general Act was passed with respect to England and Wales?—Yes.

229. Therefore it would seem that instead of there being great difficulties in dealing with the question of restriction in London, London actually took the lead for nine years in closing the public-houses on Sunday?—Yes, it did so, and also for half an hour longer, because when the general Act was passed I have heard that the Act required them only to close till half-past 12.

230. Are the public-houses in London now closed half an hour longer than the houses in the country?—I think that under Mr. Berkeley's Act they are all closed at 1 o'clock.

231. It used to be 1 in London and half-past 12 in the country?—That is so, I think, out of the metropolitan district.

232. Is it your opinion that there is any greater difficulty in dealing with the question of restriction in the metropolitan district, than in large towns in the country?—Yes; I think so; London is so immense, and there are such a number of persons to deal with in any restriction, that I think the difficulties are greater.

233. But how do you account for the fact that the London people were satisfied to have this restriction for nine years before it was applied in the country?—I do not think that they cared about it; there was no objection made; perhaps they thought that they could not help themselves.

234. Then we come to Mr. Wilson Patten's Act of 1854. You have not given the Committee any return as to the cases of drunkenness during that time, but I have here a return which you gave before the Committee of 1855, for the six months of the year 1854, which was the year before Mr. Wilson Patten's Act was passed, and for the six months after that Act was passed; can you call to recollection that that return showed a large decrease in the number of drunken cases during during the six months after Mr. Wilson Patten's Act was passed?—I have not that in my memory; I had forgotten to refer to that Act before this examination.

235. You perhaps cannot remember that, for the first six months in the year 1854, the number of drunken cases on Sunday were 3,224, and for six months in the year 1865 there were 2,076, or a decrease of 1,148?—I am quite sure that that return was correct, and I am ready to adopt it now; but what explanatory circumstances there may have been or might be, I do not know; I believe that the six months were taken because that Act had only been in operation six months; so that I took a corresponding period of the previous year.

236. Perhaps you could not speak with respect to a return made from the City of London of a similar decrease made by Mr. Whittle Harvey to this effect: that in the 11 months preceding Mr. Wilson Patten's Act the number of committals for drunkenness on Sunday were 314, and for the 11 months succeeding the Act they were 178, or a decrease of 136?—I cannot speak to that.

237. It would be quite possible, would it not, to give a return of the six months during the following year, when you were under the operation of Mr. Berkeley's Act?—I can do so.

238. You stated with respect to the restrictions imposed by Mr. Wilson Patten's Act, that it led to great evasions, and also that it led to Tom and Jerry shops being revived?—Yes.

239. Did not you say this before the Committee, that the opinion of the superintendents is that there is not more drinking in unlicensed houses than there was formerly?—If I said so I thought so at the time, but I do not remember it now.

240. Therefore at that time it was probably your opinion that there had not been any increased drinking in unlicensed houses during that one year?—No doubt I thought so at that time; I adopted the opinion, whatever it was then; but whether, on further inquiries, I might alter it I cannot say; I have no doubt that that was the opinion which I then held.

241. Is there any great attempt at drinking in unlicensed houses at the present time?—No, I think not any great attempt. They sometimes get near the public-houses, and here and there there are a few people who assemble for the purpose of drinking, but I should not say that there was any great attempt, and those are principally cases in connection with the lower class of houses in the back premises, and also where there is an evasion as to the interior communication.

242. Can you say whether there was any greater evasion during the time that Mr. Wilson Patten's Act was in operation, than there has been under Mr. Berkeley's Act?—I am unable to say that.

243. With respect to the excitement which was caused about Mr. Wilson Patten's Act, you stated that you thought that the riots in Hyde Park had some connection with the working of that Act?—Yes, I thought so at the time.

244. Was not it the fact that the riots in Hyde Park ceased the moment Lord Robert Grosvenor's Bill was withdrawn?—Yes.

245. And Mr. Berkeley's Act was not passed until the close of the Session?—No; I think that the public feeling, or rather the drinking feeling, was a fear of still further restrictions being imposed. It was the first Act which restricted the afternoon facilities for getting drink; there was a certain amount of irritation, I think, caused by that, and then when Lord Robert Grosvenor's Bill with regard to the general Sunday trading was introduced they felt that to be a still further step, and I think the traders and those who were opposed to the Sunday Trading Bill generally took advantage of that feeling, and got a number of persons together who added to the number of disturbers and rioters.

246. Can you say whether any evidence was given before the Committee of 1855 to connect those riots in any manner with Mr. Wilson Patten's Act?—I do not remember that.

247. With respect to the returns which you have given of Sunday drunkenness, you say that between four a.m. on Sunday and four a.m. on the Monday there are on the average 25 cases, and 50 on a week-day?—Yes.

248. Is it not the fact that those 25 cases arise during the time that the public-houses are open eight hours, and that the 50 cases arise during the time of opening 20 hours?—Yes.

249. Therefore does not it show a much larger proportion of drunkenness on the Sunday during the limited number of hours in which the houses are open?—That would have some influence, but not much, because I think in the earlier hours of the day there are not many drunken cases.

250. You have 25 cases to eight hours opening, and 50 cases to 20 hours opening?—Yes; but then I have said that during the greater part of that time I do not think people get drunk; for instance, say from four o'clock in the morning until one o'clock in the day or so, comparatively very few persons get drunk; the greater proportion of the drunkenness takes place in the afternoon, and evening, and night.

251. Do not you think that that is an argument for closing earlier on Sunday evening?—If you take it like a rule of three sum it would be.

252. Take the case of the winter months. You say that, in summer, excursionists are put to very great inconvenience; but excursionists do not go about in winter, and what inconvenience would there be in closing earlier during the winter months?—I think some people would want to drink in winter; not so many, certainly, as in summer. That class that I speak of, who are rambling about the streets, and crowding the streets on Sundays, up to 10 or 11 o'clock, would, of course, be much reduced.

253. Do not you think that by closing at nine o'clock on Sundays you would prevent a vast amount of drunkenness?—There would be the evil, as I stated before, of evasion, and there would be a strong feeling of discontent; that is my belief.

254. Do not you think that before nine o'clock, in winter, the greatest number of excursionists would have returned home?—Yes; but then there are many others who want drink besides the excursionists.

255. Would not it be possible for those who wanted to drink in their homes to buy it before nine o'clock at night?—I think not. The great masses of what are called the lower classes have no means of getting it before that time.

256. But, carrying on the opinion you have just expressed, you say, do you not, that the greatest amount of drunkenness takes place at the later hours of the evening?—I think so.

257. Do you not think you would get rid of a great amount of drunkenness by closing at an earlier earlier hour?—If they knew that they could not get the drink later they would get the drink earlier.

258. For instance, take the gin-shops: would it not prevent a vast amount of drunkenness if those were closed at an earlier hour on Sunday?—It is just a balance of the evasion and the discontent. In all legislation you must consider some evasion.

259. With respect to Mr. Wilson Patten's Act, can you say whether great inconvenience arose from the houses being closed between 10 and 11, or from the houses being closed from five to six?—I cannot distinguish now; it is a good many years ago, and I have only a general recollection and belief; from recollection, I know I thought then that there was a general feeling of dissatisfaction; people thought it was an interference; it was the first Act, and we know people become accustomed to a state of things after some time which they thought at first a grievance. At that time there was discontent; perhaps it might not be so now; but I think it is to be expected that there should be, more or less.

260. Was not a great amount of inconvenience felt by excursionists, or rather that was made the ground of the change in the law, was it not?—It was very considerably so; but I think that would apply mostly to the late hours.

261. Do you think that closing at nine o'clock, or 10 o'clock, would inconvenience excursionists more than closing from five to six?—Yes, I think so.

262. Would not it be an advantage to excursionists that the houses should be opened at half-past four after the evening service, and remain open until 9 o'clock, and be then closed?—In what I may call the country towns and rural parts of the metropolitan district, and I confine my observations specially to that district, one series of hours would be felt a grievance much greater in one part than in another. For instance, in the country parts the earlier hours would be the great grievance, and in town on the return it would be the later hours.

263. Do you think, having that view, that there would be any advantage in leaving it to the authorities of each town to open or close the public-houses during certain hours?—I think that that had better be done by legislation; it would be a very invidious office. I should be very sorry to have to exercise such a discretion; I should be besieged with applications of all sorts, and it would be very often very difficult to draw the line, to say that one house should be opened and the other closed, or one district closed and another kept open. It seems to me to be a fit subject for legislation rather than an administrative question.

264. With regard to the advantage of granting a six days' license; that is to say, allowing a publican to take out a license for six days and closing on the Sunday, do you think that there would be any inconvenience in carrying out such a change in the law?—There are many places where I dare say a publican would rather have his holiday than serve at all on a Sunday; and there would be an advantage of course in those cases in allowing him to close; but there would be the great objection to which I have already referred.

265. Mr. John Abel Smith.] Do you know anything with regard to the number of publicans who want to close on Sunday?—I do not; but with regard to Sunday trading, I have often said to people, "Why do you not agree to close; you are not forced to keep open your shop." And they say "No; but if we do not keep open on Sunday, we shall lose our custom on other days." And I imagine that that would be felt very much by publicans.

266. Mr. Hibbert.] But supposing the publican got an advantage in his license; that is to say, if he did not pay so much for his license for six days as for seven, would not that affect the question?—I am hardly able to form an opinion about that. There is some such provision with regard to cabs, but even that I find is a good deal evaded; although they paint the Stamp Office plates of a different colour, they are not very distinct in colour; and, in fact, there are cases (perhaps I should not say a considerable number, but there are cases) in which men who only have a 6s.-license take advantage of a 7s.-license; the license being 1s. a-day for a cab.

267. You say that the police are strict in looking after public-houses on Sunday to prevent evasion of the law; do they find any difficulty in proving those cases when they take them before the magistrate?—Very great. Some magistrates, in my humble judgment, require a proof that is unreasonable. If the police see drink and glasses upon a table, and smell the drink, and there is even a wet counter, the magistrates say, "Did you see anybody drink?" and if the answer is "No," the magistrates say that there is no proof, and they dismiss the case.

268. Is it not the case that some magistrates require the sale of drink to be proved?—They do.

269. Do not you think that in that respect the law requires amending?—It would be very difficult to convict under the present state of things.

270. I ask you whether you think the law could be amended in respect to that point?—The difficulty is, that it is a matter of evidence; and with regard to what a magistrate may consider evidence, although I may think it is unreasonable he may think otherwise. For instance, to take an illustration, the Act of last Session made it penal for men to assemble for the purpose of betting, and a case was lately brought before a magistrate, in which a number of men, who assembled weekly outside Tattersall's, who were betting men, and known to live by betting, and who were seen making entries in their books, and seen paying and receiving money, were charged with the offence. The magistrate asked, "Did you hear any of them bet?" The police said, "No;" and then the magistrate said, "There is no proof of betting," and he dismissed the case. It is very difficult, however reasonable I might think it, to constrain a magistrate to form an opinion upon evidence.

271. Would not it be possible to have an amendment of the wording of the Act?—Some dexterous framers of Acts of Parliament might do it, but it is very difficult indeed to get clauses framed so that the practised ingenuity of lawyers may not evade them.

272. You stated in a former part of your examination, that the police are taken away from their other duties to watch public-houses on Sunday, of course those other duties are the protection of life and property?—Yes.

273. If drunkenness occurs, does it not lead to assaults upon life, and, therefore, give increased work to the police?—Not upon life, or rarely so at least; it leads to a certain amount of assaults, of course.

274. If drunkenness occurs through Sunday drinking, does not it increase the work of the police?—Yes.

275. Is it not better to prevent that drunkenness than to punish it?—Yes; but in preventing it they are neglecting other duties. There is a class of duties which arise on Sunday from the habits of people going away and leaving their houses unoccupied on the Sunday; that imposes a very heavy duty upon the police, and they are taken away from that duty, in order to watch public-houses, which after all is only an incidental and a police sort of crime.

276. Are we to understand that you look upon that part of the duty of the police as not being properly within their province?—No; I did not mean to go so far as that; I said that it took them from their other duties; but I quite admit that it is a duty.

277. Has your attention been drawn to the Bill which the Committee are appointed to consider; that is to say the Sale of Liquors on Sunday Bill?—Not very much.

278. Has your attention been called to the entirely different principle which this Bill seeks to establish from the principles which have been established previously?—I cannot say that it has.

279. You perhaps have not noticed that this Bill seeks to close all public-houses for the sale of liquors on the premises with the exception of the proviso with respect to the metropolitan district?—Yes.

280. Is not that a very great change in principle, from the principle which had been established previously with respect to restriction?—It is so to a considerable extent; but still that is a law which is very easy to evade with regard to drinking upon the premises; you may drink beer or spirits a very little way off from the premises; I have done so myself in days gone by; I remember when I was walking in the country, I got some ale and took it away to a little distance from the house and drank it.

281. Would it not put the public to greater inconvenience if a Bill of this kind were passed, than if you increased the restriction upon the old plan, that is to say, a restriction upon the sale of liquor, both off the premises and on the premises, to a shorter number of hours?—No doubt that would supply a want which has been found to be a necessity, looking to the habits of the people in getting beer for dinner or supper; the prohibition of drinking on the premises would supply that want which would otherwise arise with respect to getting drink for dinner and supper.

282. From your own experience do you think that if this Bill were passed in its present form, that is to say, prohibiting the sale of liquors on the premises, it would lead to very bad results, in the way of increasing the drinking in private houses?—I think it is calculated to lead to that; you may get any amount of drink away from a public-house, and there certainly was very often a direct evasion of the law as long as the distinction between licenses to be drunk on the premises and off the premises existed.

283. Do you think it would be more easily evaded than the restrictions in Mr. Berkeley's Bill?—Yes; if you got the drink away you might get a gallon of gin and drink it in a house a little way off; there would be a difficulty about the selling.

284. My question is this, whether, in carrying out a system of restriction, there would not be more difficulty in carrying it out upon the plan of this Bill—that is to say, that you shall sell nothing on the premises, but only sell off—than if you carry out a system of restriction for closing the public-houses altogether?—I meant to answer that by saying that it would be easy to evade it by taking a gallon of gin to any house at a little distance, merely evading the provisions of the excise against selling. If you agreed beforehand to meet and drink and subscribe, or arrange in any other way so as not to pay at the time, you might get any quantity of drink into a house in the neighbourhood, and drink it there, although you might not drink it within the premises of the public-house.

285. Entertaining that opinion, do you think that if you wish to carry out a further system of restriction it would be better to carry it out on the old plan than to carry it out on the new plan proposed by this Bill?—I think it would be better; I think it would certainly lead to less evasion, but at the same time it would supply a want which I said was almost a necessity, namely, with regard to people getting beer for their suppers.

286. I do not mean the total closing of public-houses, but supposing you were to close at nine o'clock, and cut off two hours in the evening, do not you think that that would be an easier method of carrying out the restriction than carrying it out upon the plan in this Bill, which prohibits consumption altogether upon the premises?—I think it would; from knowing what the operation of it was before, I have a great dislike to the distinction between drinking on the premises and off the premises; it is so very easily evaded.

287. In what way?—People could go a very little way off the premises, and drink what they wished.

288. Has your attention been drawn to the proviso, with respect to the metropolitan district, allowing persons in the metropolitan district who take a bonâ fide meal to consume liquors on the premises, and therefore dealing with the metropolis differently from other parts of the country?—It would be extremely difficult, if not impossible, to enforce a law of that kind, unless you watched the people whether they were eating, or saw that they ordered or paid for beef-steaks or mutton-chops.

289. Do not you think, considering the difficulties which have already occurred with respect to bonâ fide travellers, it would be much more difficult to say what a bonâ fide meal was?—I think it would.

290. Mr. John Abel Smith.] Do not you think, on the other hand, that the habits of London, with respect to Sunday excursions, make it utterly impossible to impose upon them a restriction which would hardly be felt as a restraint in any other part of the kingdom?—I think so.

291. Mr. Hibbert.] Do you think it necessary in dealing with this question of restriction on the sale of liquors on Sunday, to deal with the metropolis differently to other parts of the country?—There are particular circumstances to be considered in the case of London; I suppose, for instance, the practice of excursion trains is much much greater in and out of London than in any other town or in any other part of the country.

292. Mr. John Abel Smith.] Is not the necessity for Sunday relaxation also greater?—Yes.

293. Mr. Roebuck.] Do you know the number of excursion trains, say from Sheffield, on a Sunday?—I do not.

294. You have no reason to know, and cannot tell whether, proportionately, the number is as great as it is in London?—I have not.

295. Therefore you can give no opinion upon the matter?—No.

296. Mr. Hibbert.] And you have no knowledge with respect to Liverpool or Manchester, or other large towns in Lancashire?—Only so far as I mentioned, that I have staid sometimes at a friend's house in Lancashire, near Preston, and I know that the practice of having excursion trains is considerable there; but still, I should think, not upon any data, but merely as an opinion, that it is greater out of London than any other place, both greater in the number of trains and the number of people going by trains. What I mean is this, there may be an excursion train with 10 carriages, or with 50, or with 100, but I am speaking loosely, and have no means of forming an accurate opinion.

297. With respect to the Act which Sir George Grey introduced in 1864, you say that since that Act has been applied there has been a great diminution in the cases of drunkenness in the metropolitan district?—I think so.

298. Can you tell me the number in the two years before it was put in operation and in the two years after?—I can give the numbers, which do not show so strikingly as I have stated, but one must, in truth, take them a good deal with reference to the increase of population.

299. Do you know when the Act was put in operation?—In 1864; it was passed on the 25th of July, and came into operation immediately, but not so effectively as afterwards.

300. Could you give the number for the years 1862 and 1863, and for the years 1865 and 1866?—In 1862 the whole number was 18,312, and in 1863 it was 17,651. Then in 1865 there was an increase, it being 19,257, and in 1866 it was 18,383. It is very difficult to take the whole number of the cases in the year between one and four o'clock in the morning, and compare it with that of any particular period. I own that I was surprised at those numbers, but I feel no doubt that there has been a diminution of those persons who would have got drunk during the night, and have committed great disorders during the early part of the morning or late at night.

301. Mr. John Abel Smith.] There has been no increase of vigilance or strictness on the part of the police officers to account for that, has there?—No, certainly not. There has been greatly increased vigilance as to requiring the closing, and that is a very difficult part of the duty of the police.

302. Have you any idea how many towns have embraced Sir George Grey's closing Act?—I do not know, but it could easily be given.

303. Have you personally any opinion as to the advisability of increased punishment for drunkenness?—I have no opinion as to deterring by punishment for such an offence.

304. Do you think that the punishment is severe enough?—I do not think that any increase of punishment which could be enforced would have the effect of preventing drunkenness. With regard to that again, I venture to say that sometimes I presume that the London magistrates might apply heavier punishments than they do; they discharge great numbers.

305. Mr. F. Stanley.] With reference to Sir George Grey's Act, the 27th and 28th of Vict., 1864, you mentioned that the clause with reference to closing at 12 o'clock on Saturday night, and at one o'clock on the five other nights of the week, was attributable in some degree to a suggestion of your own, and that you had reason subsequently to be pleased with the working of it; was it not the case that the object which you had in view was the suppression of houses in the parish of St. James, in the neighbourhood of the Haymarket, rather than the closing of public-houses generally at that hour?—No doubt the immediate cause and that which excited the feelings of people, without which probably the Act would not have been passed, was the Haymarket, and the locality immediately surrounding it.

306. But that was the object which rather prompted your suggestion, was it not?—Yes, but I claim so far to have suggested the whole; the one o'clock as well as the 12. I had repeated depositions from the parish of St. James especially, complaining very often of the police for the disorders that were occurring in the Haymarket. I pointed out to them, both verbally and by letter, that those were evils that could not be prevented so long as the public-houses were open, and that the only mode that I could see of preventing them was by closing the public-houses, and the closing of public-houses has had a great effect in that respect in the prevention of disorder in the streets as well as of drunkenness.

307. My question was whether that restriction was not rather with a view to suppressing those disorderly houses, than with a view to the restriction of closing public-houses generally at an earlier hour than heretofore?—I think there were two objects in view, but the immediate moving cause was the disorder arising in those places where there were a number of public-houses, and especially the Haymarket; but there were many other places, parts of Oxford-street, for instance, parts of Whitechapel, and parts of the Borough of Southwark, where there were great complaints by the neighbourhood of the disorder which was necessarily incidental to the public-houses being open. For instance, in the case of people who sleep in the Haymarket and such parts of the town, the number of cabs driving about and women getting out, and the loud talking, was a great grievance; the talking was mere loud talking, which the police could not prevent, but no doubt its amount was so great as to cause very great disturbance to the neighbourhood, and people complained that they were unable to sleep. That was true, but it was the combination of noises, which in themselves were nothing more than loud talking.

308. Then your suggestion was rather with a view to the restriction of those places as centres of disorder than as centres of drunkenness?—Yes, that was the principal object, I think.

309. Mr. Locke.] With respect to the Bill now before the Committee, which you say you have not read very attentively, it consists chiefly of one clause, and by that clause you will observe that where liquor is sold for consumption on the premises the public-houses are to be shut up for the whole of the Sunday?—Yes.

310. Then there comes a proviso making an exception

Sir
R. Mayne,

ception to a certain extent in the metropolis; but in that proviso respecting the metropolis it is enacted—"Provided always, that the Act shall not preclude a person licensed to sell any fermented or distilled liquor to be consumed on the premises within the metropolitan police district from selling the same to a person lodging in his house, or to travellers, or to persons bonâ fide taking a meal at his house during the time of such meal." In your opinion would not that exclude all those different persons from any such privilege in the country?—I suppose so.

311. In the country, at the present moment, under the law as it exists, not only during the hours in which public-houses are open, but during church time, or any other time during the Sunday, does not a person who is a traveller enjoy the privilege of going into a public-house to obtain refreshment?—He does so.

312. Under this Bill, though probably it does not mean it, might not a court of law rule, and probably would do so, that every privilege that a traveller now has under the present law would be taken away from him unless he went into the public-house, bought an article, and took it off the premises, though probably he had no premises to take it to when off the publican's premises?—It appears to me to be so.

313. In your opinion, has very extensive forethought been given to this Bill?—I hardly presume to give an opinion upon that.

314. Are you not of opinion that it requires, at all events, some revision, by taking out the clause altogether; perhaps that would be the best revision that it would undergo?—I certainly admit that I have not given much consideration to it myself.

315. You are aware that at the present time, under the statute of the 11th & 12th of Victoria, even during church time, a traveller can go into a public-house in the country and obtain refreshment?—Yes.

316. Has your attention ever been drawn to the case which was decided before Chief Justice Erle of Taylor v. Humphries, in the 17th volume of the Common Bench Reports, New Series, at page 547; there was the judgment of the whole Court given by Mr. Justice Erle; and are you aware that in that judgment, speaking of the provisions of the 11th & 12th Vict., which restrict persons unless they are travellers from going into public-houses up to the hour of one o'clock on a Sunday, his Lordship states that that Act reserves the privilege of the traveller, and the decision in that case was a very wide one indeed as to the traveller?—Yes, I am aware of that.

317. And it decided this, that persons walking from their residences in a town to enjoy the country air on a Sunday morning, and in the course of such walk resorting to an inn for refreshment, are travellers within the exception of the 11th & 12th Vict. c. 49, s. 1, although they should be within two miles of their places of abode, provided they do not go abroad for the mere purpose of indulging their propensity for drink; and it then goes on to say that as the exception of refreshment for travellers is contained in the clause creating the prohibition the burden of showing that the prohibition has been infringed, and that the case is not within the exception is cast upon the informer; and if the innkeeper believes and has reason to believe, of which the magistrates are the judges, when he supplies the liquor that he is supplying refreshment to a traveller, he ought not to be convicted?—I believe that is the law.

318. That is the marginal note of that case; but all those privileges would be swept away, would they not, in your opinion, by this Bill, and no traveller would be allowed to go into a house and have refreshment unless he took it away with him out into the street, and that only for three and a half hours during the day?—I see that the other Acts are not repealed, and how far they might still remain in force I do not know.

319. But would not there be a question whether it would not repeal them?—I really do not claim to be an authority upon that matter.

320. I merely say with regard to this Bill, does not it require a good deal of consideration even with regard to that matter?—The Committee are here giving it a good deal of consideration.

321. Are you aware that Chief Justice Erle expressed this opinion: "These provisions are very stringent" (that is the provisions of the 11th & 12th Vict.); "for example, this appellant might have been fined 160*l.*, that is 5*l.* for each guest. They do not bear upon the rich who have refreshment at their command, but they coerce the poorer classes throughout the Island; salutary where they check the disorderly, and pernicious where they molest the discreet; and we consider that by construing the exception in a wide sense we save from vexatious restriction many who have a right to be trusted with self-control, and at the same time leave the prohibition in force as far as the interests of real piety are concerned"?—I am sure that that is very high authority, and I bow most readily to it.

322. You have stated your opinion, have you not, that under the law as it at present exists, drunkenness has diminished, as you have shown from statistics?—Yes, I think so.

323. Do you not therefore agree with Chief Justice Erle, that it is inconvenient to interfere with persons who have a right to be trusted with their self-control?—I am sure that is a very sound principle, but still a good many people have very little self-control.

324. But when you pass a Bill of this sort, whether men have self-control, or whether they have not, they both would be put in precisely the same category?—Yes.

325. And although you might prevent some drunken man from getting drunk in a public-house, who in all probability if he did not get drunk there would get drunk somewhere else, do you think it right for the purpose of preventing that man from getting drunk in a public-house, that those who have self-control should under this Bill be prevented from enjoying themselves in the way they desire?—I see there are these words in the clause, "sold for consumption," and I can imagine the ingenuity of lawyers and judges in deciding the question, whether this enactment with that in another statute does not apply to the case of innkeepers who gratuitously entertain guests with wine, beer, and spirits, so that they would be continually putting forward cases that they were making presents of those things, and it would be very difficult to prove that they were sold.

326. The Honourable Member for Oldham has asked you with regard to the six days' licenses; can you tell us what the price of a license is?—About 17*l.*

327. What would be the diminution in price for for a six days' license?—I suppose it would be one-seventh, or about 2*l.* 8*s.* 6*d.*

328. Would that amount, if a person were excused from paying, be any inducement to him to take out only a six days' license?—I should think it would operate to a very limited extent indeed, from the reason especially which I mentioned before, that people would be afraid of losing their customers if persons went away to other houses on a Sunday.

329. And at the same time do you not think it would cause great inconvenience in having two sets of licenses?—That might be obviated by some sign, I think.

330. But at the present time is it not the law that a publican must supply within the regular hours, whether he likes it or not; he is bound to do so?—Yes. I would exempt a man who had only a six days' license from being obliged to sell upon a Sunday. Of course he must be open to render it obligatory upon him; you could not compel him to open his house to supply, I should think.

331. Supposing a publican chose to shut up his house on a Sunday, how is the law now with respect to that?—I believe he may do so. I never heard the question raised. I should think that you could not compel a publican to get up in the middle of the night to serve.

332. Mr. Roebuck.] If I came into a town and wanted a bed, and saw a public-house with a sign, and I rapped at the door, would not it be imperative upon the master of that house to give me a bed if he had one?—A public-house is not an inn; that law would apply to an inn, where they are bound to receive travellers, and in the case of an inn I suppose he would be obliged.

333. Mr. Locke.] What is the difference between a license to an inn and a license to a public-house; are they not the same?—Yes; but the common law obligation, I take it, is not the same. The common law would require you to supply accommodation to a traveller if you had a bed and held yourself out as an innkeeper. I am rather going out of my depth, but I imagine that it would compel you to get up and supply him with a bed. Almost every innkeeper has a victualler's license, but not of necessity, I believe.

334. Mr. Roebuck.] Is not this the difference between an inn and a public-house, that an inn you may inhabit, but you do not inhabit a public-house?—Just so; a public-house may be merely a place where you would walk in and get a glass of beer or gin whilst you stand at the counter.

335. Mr. Locke.] Is not that merely because there is accommodation in the one case and not in the other?—There are the sleeping accommodation and other arrangements which I take it constitute an inn.

336. However, the license given to each is given by the magistrates?—Yes; the license for the sale of exciseable liquor is.

337. And that license is taken out when granted by the magistrate from the excise?—Yes.

Sir THOMAS HENRY, called in; and Examined.

338. Chairman.] You are the Chief Magistrate of the metropolis?—Yes, of the metropolitan police courts.

339. Your attention has no doubt been much directed to the administration of the law respecting the sale of liquors?—It has.

340. How many years have you been a magistrate?—I have been 28 years magistrate of the metropolitan police courts, and for the last four years chief magistrate.

341. Will you state to the Committee what is your opinion as to the amount of offences arising out of breaches of the liquor law with regard to the cases of persons charged with drunkenness?—I think that the numbers have decreased; I have no doubt that they have.

342. Your court being in the centre of the metropolis, and comprising some of the most crowded portions, you would consider it, would you not, to be a fair specimen of the cases in the metropolis?—I think it would be, but I have also the means of knowing what takes place at the other courts.

343. Does what you have said hold good all over the whole of the metropolis?—I think that it does.

344. Mr. John Abel Smith.] Have you any returns?—No, I have no returns; and I would beg leave to say that it is dangerous to trust to mere returns.

345. Chairman.] Along with the diminution of the actual cases coming before the magistrates, there has been also, has there not, increased strength in the police, and increased efficiency in the means of bringing the cases to justice?—Yes, but I think that there is less occasion to bring them. If you mean the infringement of the law with reference to public-houses, there has been less occasion of late years, because I believe that the publicans obey the law with regard to the prohibition as to hours.

346. My question had reference to this; that whilst fewer cases come before you, you would probably consider it to be the fact that the police are able to enforce the law more efficiently now than they were a good many years ago?—Yes; I believe that the police force is more efficient now than it was many years ago.

347. In fact, you consider that there is much less drunkenness and excess in the metropolis at the present day than there used to be?—Yes, I think that the habits of the people have greatly improved; I do not think that that depends upon law or upon restrictive laws; but that the education, the habits, and the tastes of the people have vastly improved.

348. The law has been practically the same with regard to this question, has it not, excepting in the short period of the operation of Colonel Wilson Patten's Act, during the whole time that you have been magistrate?—Yes; the law has been the same practically.

349. Then the diminution which you describe has been taking place under virtually a uniform law?—It has.

350. Should you say that the amount of drunkenness is much regulated by the limitation of the hours?—I think not.

351. In fact, supposing the public-houses were open on Sunday morning instead of Sunday afternoon only, do you think that drinking to excess would not be greatly increased?—I think that there is not much drunkenness arising in the day time; it arises chiefly at late hours of the night,

Sir
R. Mayne,

Sir

and I think that it is very right to have a restriction as far as regards those hours, and therefore I think that the Act of 1864 was the most useful Act that ever was passed for the purpose of preventing drunkenness.

352. But as the inquiry of the Committee has reference particularly to the laws as regards Sunday, do you think that the practice of drinking to excess has been restrained by the limitation of the hours as at present permitted by the law?—Of course all restraining laws to a certain extent have an effect, but I do not think that the diminution has depended upon them; I think that the diminution has depended more upon the improved feelings and tastes of the people.

353. Mr. John Abel Smith.] Why do you think the Act of 1864 so good?—Because the Act of 1864 applied to the hours of the night at which what I might call almost professional drunkards get drunk, and it was very important to restrain them. They have no good feeling or taste, and therefore it was right to have the houses closed altogether so that they should not enter.

354. Chairman.] The hours of sale prohibited in the Act of 1864 were not those at which many respectable persons would have occasion to purchase drinks?—No; there was no occasion for a house to be open at such hours.

355. Do you think that the restrictions which are proposed to be increased by this Bill could be so increased without inconvenience to the respectable classes of the people?—I think not; I think that it would be very inexpedient to pass this Bill.

356. For example, what do you think would be the effect of closing the public-houses between half-past two and eight in the evening, upon persons who may be said to have a legitimate occasion for liquors?—I think that it would be very oppressive, and it would cause great dissatisfaction. It must be remembered that there are an immense number of people in this town who have no sitting rooms, who have no cellars, who have no places where they can keep beer, and who are obliged to go to a public-house for every glass of beer that they want, and if the public-houses were to be closed on Sunday to the extent which this Bill exacts, I think it would cause the greatest inconvenience and would give rise to very just dissatisfaction.

357. During the hours of 10 and 11 at night, do you think that it would make a great difference?—I think it would; I think that 11 o'clock is not an unreasonable hour to have a public-house kept open to. Many persons come home as late as 11 o'clock, and they want some supper before they go to bed; they have no means of getting any supper at home, and they must go to a public-house for it. A great number of people in the districts which I am acquainted with have really no place where they can sit at home; they have merely sleeping places of a very miserable kind, and therefore they are really obliged to go to a public-house to eat or drink.

358. But there are parts of London, are there not, where during the portions of Sunday when the public-houses are open, there are still scenes of drunkenness to a great extent?—I do not think there are; I think that there are more drunken charges on the Tuesday morning than on the Monday morning. Tuesday morning is a busier morning at the police court generally than Monday, although there have been two nights intervening before the Monday morning.

359. You do not think that the disorders still existing from the drunken habits of certain classes of the people are so great an evil as to justify additional restrictions being placed upon the whole of the community?—I do not think that this Bill would diminish the evil, but on the contrary, perhaps, it might increase drunkenness; because, I think that if this Bill were passed, a great number of people would go and buy their gin at the public-house and carry it home, and then there would be drunkenness at home; whereas under the present law the landlords of public-houses may restrain drunkenness; they supply drink to people to a certain extent, but my experience of them is that they do not encourage drunkenness.

360. Now that the houses are closed after a certain hour, is it uncommon for persons to buy more liquor than they want to consume at the moment and take it away with them, because they know that they will not be able to sit drinking in a public-house?—I think that it is not common, because they get all that they want now.

361. But you think that they would do so if the public-houses were closed during by far the greater part of the day?—I think they would not have an opportunity of getting what they wanted, and this evil would arise, that men would go to a public-house, and would club together, and buy, say a gallon of beer, and would carry it into the street, and would drink it in the street; and there would be no law to prevent them.

362. What do you suppose would be the effect upon the state of feeling in London of placing additional restrictions; do you think it would be possible to increase the present restrictions without causing any great amount of discontent?—I think that there would be a very great amount of discontent produced if this Bill were passed.

363. But without saying that the whole of this Bill should pass, supposing the restriction were extended by one or two, or three hours, what would be your opinion?—I think that the present prohibition ought not to be extended; I think that the number of hours during which the public-houses are now open are sufficiently few for the wants of that class of people who must resort to them.

364. Mr. Roebuck.] Do you think that there is any call by necessity, or by public opinion, or by the state of public morality for any increased restriction upon the sale of liquor?—I think that there is not, because, as I have already stated, I think that the public feeling is improving so much without any legislation, that it would be better not to interfere by putting on restrictions that would be deemed harsh and oppressive by a great many.

365. I may put it in this way; do you think that the restriction by law has already gone far enough?—That is the opinion at which I have arrived.

366. And that any attempt by further legislation would be only mischievous meddling?—I think that it would be inexpedient.

367. Do you fancy that any possible good could arise from altering the time at which a public-house might now be opened from 11 to 10 o'clock?—I really do not see that any good could arise from it. It is a matter of speculation whether there might be a few drunken charges less; but, on the other hand, it would certainly give rise to great inconvenience to persons returning turning home between 10 and 11, and wanting, as I stated, to get some beer for their supper before they go to bed.

368. So that the possible good that might be done would, in your mind, be overbalanced by the real evil which would arise?—That is what I wish to convey; I think that 11 o'clock is not an unseasonable hour, but beyond 11 would be so.

369. With regard to an opinion which was put forward by Sir Richard Mayne, do you think that drunkenness is repressed by wretchedness or increased by it?—When there is great distress, as there was at the commencement of this winter in the eastern part of the town, there certainly were fewer cases of drunkenness. There is no doubt that people had not the money to go to the public-house with, and there certainly was less drunkenness. We know, on the other hand, that many of the poor, when they are under any troubles, are very apt to give way to drink in order to drown their grief as they call it; more especially with women. We find that that is the case very often with women who are suffering from many causes; that they are very apt to leave their wretched homes and resort to the public-house to get some gin, even although, as it very often happens, they have to pledge their shawl to obtain the price of their gin.

370. So that wretchedness, if it be not carried to the extent of absolute pauperism, would tend to increase drunkenness, by increasing that desire to drown care which you have spoken of?—That does not apply to all people. I do not think it applies to men, especially; poor men who are out of work do not get drunk so much. I can say that of my own knowledge. We find that when men are out of work there are certainly fewer cases of drunkenness.

371. In considering restriction itself to be an evil, do you think that restriction has been already carried far enough to do all the possible good that restriction can do, and that further carrying it on would be merely to increase the mischief?—I think that to carry it further would be inexpedient. That is the best word that I think I can use.

372. Mr. Horsfall.] You spoke of a decrease in the number of cases of drunkenness; do you think that that arises from any alteration in the system of reporting the cases on the part of the police?—No, I think not, because we should hear of it in various ways quite apart from the returns. We hear of drunkenness in various ways; and I have no doubt that it has diminished. I attribute that chiefly to the improved education and good feeling of the people generally; not to restrictive laws.

373. Chairman.] You think that men are more ashamed of being drunk?—Yes, they are.

374. Mr. Roebuck.] In fact you think that there is a higher morality?—Yes, there is.

375. Mr. Baines.] Do you think that prolonged hours of opportunity of drinking lead to intoxication more than short hours?—I think not; I think that there is a certain class of drunkards that will get drunk whether he has three hours to do it in or one.

376. Then do you think that the diminution of the hours of the opening of public-houses, from 24 hours to 8 hours, has not been attended with a considerable increase in sobriety or a diminution of drunkenness?—I do not think that it has; for example, as the Honourable Chairman put to me whether, if the public-houses were open on Sunday morning, I thought drunkenness would be increased; I do not think it would, because, as I said, people are not disposed to get drunk during the day-time. It is very seldom that we have a charge of drunkenness brought while the court is sitting during the day; the drunkenness arises at night, and the worst class of drunkenness arises after 1 o'clock in the morning, or used to do before 1864.

377. Do you think that the condition of the working classes, including the condition of their wives and their children, including food, lodging, clothing, and education, would be improved or not improved, by diminishing the hours of opening the public-houses from 11 to 10 at night?—If I thought that it would be improved, I should be very glad to see the hours shortened, but I think that it would not improve it; I think that what is wanted is better places for them to sleep and live in.

378. Then you do not agree with Sir Richard Mayne in his opinion, that the restrictions which have taken place hitherto have operated in the direction of virtue and comfort amongst the working classes?—I do not say the contrary of that, but I perhaps have more opportunities of seeing the people than Sir Richard Mayne.

379. And, as far as your opportunity goes, as I understand you, you express a diametrically opposite opinion to Sir Richard Mayne upon that subject?—I do not say a diametrically opposite opinion.

380. That is the bearing of your evidence, is it not?—I say that sobriety has been brought about, not by restrictive laws, but by improved education and feeling.

381. May it not have been by both; is it not probable, looking in the larger view at what has taken place in the country, that the improved education and improved feeling have been aided by the great diminution of temptations?—It is a matter of opinion upon which I can only give you mine.

382. And that is, that the great diminution of temptation has had no effect whatever?—I think that it has been more from the people seeing the advantage of not giving way to drink so much as they used to do.

383. Mr. John Abel Smith.] What is your observation as regards the drunkenness of women?—It varies in different districts; in the Bow-street district there is almost as much drunkenness among women as there is among men; and a worse kind very often, for they resort to that habit of going to the public-house, and getting gin in a bottle, and going home and drinking it in a miserable bed-room, three or four of them together; and then some or all of them are brought to the court in a state of drunkenness.

384. Do you think that the non-drinking on the premises conduces to drunkenness in the case of women?—Very often it does; they resort to that practice.

385. Is that the rule?—It is not the rule; the majority of them drink at the bar; but I merely mention that fact to show that it would be open to them under this Bill to resort to that practice generally of going and buying gin, and then drinking it either outside the door or in their own lodgings.

386. As chief magistrate of London, what is your opinion with regard to the arrangement or preparation of crime by people associating together ther in public-houses?—I do not think that they prepare for crime in public-houses; they are too clever for that. Quarrels arise in public-houses and outside public-houses, but they do not meet to combine or conspire to commit crime in public-houses.

387. What is the ground upon which you form your opinion that drunkenness has diminished?—From my opportunity of seeing and remembering what has taken place at my own court for the last 28 years, sitting almost every day.

388. Have you brought any returns with you?—I have not; I knew that Sir Richard Mayne was to be examined, and he told me that he would bring all the returns that could be necessary; he has the means of presenting more complete returns than I have, because he has the whole of the metropolitan district under his control, and he can therefore give you the returns from every district. But, as I said, I think it is dangerous to rely too much upon returns as to drunkenness in this year or another year, because drunkenness depends very often upon the condition of the people during a certain year; for instance, if there is very great distress there is less drunkenness; and there are drunken seasons of the year; we know very well that June, July, and August are months when there are more drunkards than in the winter months. There are more robberies in the winter months, but more drunkenness and more assaults during the hot weather.

389. You expressed a very strong sense of benefit that has been conferred upon society by the Act of 1864?—I do; I think that that Act was most beneficial; but then that Act restrained at the hours when I say public-houses ought to be restrained; that is, during the unseasonable hours between one and four in the morning.

390. At what hour do you think the restraint ought to begin?—I think that it ought to begin at 12; I was anxious when that Bill was brought in, that it should have been twelve instead of one; but there were reasons which rendered it desirable, perhaps, not to have it at 12; people do not get home from the theatres, and so on, until that time, and therefore one o'clock was fixed; but I should think that the greater the number of people that are in bed by 12 o'clock the better. I should think it would be a good thing if most people endeavoured to be in bed by 12 o'clock, especially those who have to get their living the next day.

391. And you would legislate, would you, upon that foundation?—I should like, if I were fixing the hours at all, to be guided by that.

392. Then if you would interfere as much as that, the mere fact of restriction has no terrors to you?—Not to me, but it has an effect upon that class of persons that I say particularly require restraint; namely, a certain class of persons who will stay out all night if they have an opportunity of going into the public-houses; therefore it becomes necessary to restrain that class of persons; they are the most troublesome class of persons that we have to deal with in this town, and they have been greatly restrained by that Act.

393. Is not the distinction between them and the less drinking class a very indefinite one?—No, I think it is a very marked one.

394. What is that distinction?—I could easily point out the line; I know a certain class of persons that begin, I may say, their day at 12 o'clock at night.

395. Have you ever turned your attention to the practical working of the Act of 1864?—Yes.

396. What do you think it has been?—It rendered it impossible for that class of persons to get drunk during those hours, and therefore the charges which used to arise from their misconduct were at once diminished; I may say, cut away. The very week after that Bill came into force we saw the change in all our courts, especially at the west end of the town.

397. Could you give the Committee any return showing that?—I could not, for, as I said before, I have never attached such importance to returns as to induce me to keep returns of that kind.

398. Do not your clerks keep returns?—There are returns of the number of drunken cases, but there is this difficulty with regard to returns, and you will find that difficulty with regard to the returns put in by Sir Richard Mayne. There is what we call simple drunkenness, "drunk and incapable," as it is entered on the charge sheet, and there is "drunk and disorderly," and it is very difficult to know exactly where disorderly conduct begins. There is a difference as to the fine for drunkenness; a man who is simply drunk and incapable is only liable to a 5 s. fine, and a man who is drunk and also disorderly is liable to a 40 s. fine, and the magistrate has to determine whether in addition to his drunkenness he was also disorderly; or rather, to use the words of the Act of Parliament, guilty of indecent or riotous conduct. It is commonly called disorderly, but these are the correct words: "who, while drunk, shall be guilty of indecent or riotous behaviour."

399. Are you personally in favour of an increased punishment for drunkenness?—Yes, I think it would be desirable that the magistrates should have discretionary power to inflict a larger fine than 5 s. upon persons who are in the habit of getting drunk. We sometimes have persons who make a habit of getting drunk, and who are brought to the police court sometimes three or four times in the month, what I call habitual drunkards, yet they are always quiet while drunk, and therefore no greater fine than 5 s. can be inflicted upon any of them.

400. Mr. Hibbert.] Cannot you send them to prison under the new Act?—No, not when they are simply drunk. I am aware that some magistrates think that under the Small Penalties Act there is that power, but I should be very sorry to try that question.

401. Colonel Fane.] If he cannot pay the fine of 5 s. you can send him to prison, can you not?—I think not, and the majority of my colleagues are of that opinion also; but it has never been tested in the Court of Queen's Bench.

402. Mr. John Abel Smith.] Is not a fine a restraint?—Yes. I think it ought to be a restraint; but a man that gets drunk is not restrained merely by punishment.

403. Then you do not see any advantage in restraining men from getting drunk?—I do, if I was certain that it would have that effect without putting other people to inconvenience; but I think it would be wrong to close the public-houses during the afternoon of Sunday for the sake of preventing, we will say, 20 people from having an opportunity of getting drunk, and putting 5,000 or 10,000 people to inconvenience.

404. Then if the community were in favour of further restriction, you would think that desirable?

able?—I must bow to that; but the question is how that is to be tested.

405. How is the other to be tested equally; how is your opinion to be tested?—It is for the Committee to judge whether it is worth anything or not.

406. I mean that in both cases it is a mere matter of opinion?—Yes, I admit that.

407. You say that drunkards begin to drink, or ought to begin, at 12 o'clock at night?—No, I say that they generally do, especially the worst class of drunkards.

408. But they now are unable to find the means of drinking after one o'clock in the morning?—Yes, that is so.

409. Do you think that that is a wholesome restriction?—Most wholesome. I am most favourable to a restriction of that kind.

410. Still you are against that restriction beginning at 10?—Because I think that it would put too many people to inconvenience up to 11 o'clock; after that, I think it ought not to put anyone to inconvenience.

411. Those gentlemen did not want to drink much before 12?—Just so; that class of persons did not want to drink much before 12.

412. Upon general grounds, have you any reason to give to the Committee for the opinion you have expressed as to the great general improvement which you think you have noticed?—I am in the habit of observing all persons that come before me, and I have an opportunity of course, in a police court like Bow-street, of knowing what the habits of the people are, and hearing what they are, and I found my opinion upon that observation.

413. Do you think that crime has diminished generally?—I think that it has.

414. Have crimes with violence increased or diminished?—I should say, considering the great increase of population, I do not think that they have increased in proportion. There are certainly, or there have been, some very bad cases of violence and garrotte robberies at times, but, generally speaking, I think that crime has diminished.

415. And you doubt altogether whether public-houses and beershops are used as places where crime is concocted?—I very much doubt it indeed. There are some very low beershops and places where occasionally thieves do meet, but I do not think that they concoct their plans much there, because they would be found out if they did; they go to more private places.

416. Is there any difference in the habit of people between London and the rest of England, or do you know anything of the other districts of England?—I was on the northern circuit for 10 years before I was made a magistrate, and I went to all the assize towns, but as that was 28 years ago I cannot speak so confidently as to what the habits of people are now; but I recollect of course what the habits were at Leeds and York, and other places, upon that circuit.

417. Their habits are much the same as in London, are they not?—In all large towns, I believe, there is no very great difference. I dare say that there is not much difference between the habits of London and those of Sheffield or Leeds.

418. And you are not prepared to accept as a correct statement of the present state of things in England, that in the large towns the majority of the working men are in favour of further restraint?—I must ask you to define what you mean by further restraint.

419. I mean further restraint as regards the hours and facilities of obtaining drink?—I should be surprised to hear that there was a majority in any town in favour of restraining to a greater extent than the prohibition now extends.

420. You do not believe that it is so?—No, I do not believe that it is so. I think it would be very difficult to poll any town to test that feeling.

421. Then you do not believe it exists in London?—No, I do not believe that it exists in London.

422. Have you ever had any intercourse with any large bodies or classes of working men in London upon that subject, or upon any other, either by meeting them, or talking to them, or hearing of their wishes and aspirations?—I hear their wishes and sentiments very often, but I have never had express meetings with them.

423. Have you ever heard anything about those meetings?—I think if you will observe the number of people who are waiting for a public-house to open at one o'clock every Sunday afternoon, you will see at once what great inconvenience would be felt if the hour were retarded until two.

424. Why would they necessarily be inconvenienced?—You see well-behaved and respectable people waiting at one o'clock every Sunday afternoon outside every public-house almost in the metropolis to get their beer, and the men start off from the different public-houses with their cans of beer to supply all their customers within a minute after one o'clock, and if that were deferred until half-past two, I believe they would be put to very great inconvenience indeed, and would be very apt to cry out.

425. Chairman.] You have not quite apprehended the proposal in the Bill; it means that they are only to be open from one until half-past two, and then from eight to 10 in the evening?—Then it is not worded so as to convey that meaning. If that is the meaning of it, of course my observation would not apply; but any restriction of the present hours, I should think would be attended with inconvenience.

426. Mr. John Abel Smith.] Are you aware what the principal object of the Bill is?—To diminish drunkenness on Sunday; I infer that that is the object. I have never had any communication with any Member of the Committee as to what it is.

427. Have you read the Bill?—Yes, I have read it, but I did not know with what object I was to be examined as a witness. I inferred that the object of this Bill was to diminish drunkenness on a Sunday.

428. Supposing you were told that the object of the Bill was to prevent drinking on the premises on Sundays, would that affect your conclusion?—I think that it would be very wrong to prevent drinking on the premises on a Sunday, and for this reason, that there are an immense number of persons in this town who have no other place where they could drink; they must either drink in the public-house or else drink in the street or in some miserable bedroom, where there would be six or eight of them perhaps sleeping together at night. And then, I say, that it is better that they should drink at the bar of a public-house, under the eye of the landlord, who is amenable to the magistrates if he suffers drunkenness in his house; and I say, again, that the majority of landlords of public-houses in this town do not encourage drunkenness, but, on the contrary, I believe they discourage it; they wish to keep their houses in a respectable manner and to insure the renewal of their licenses every year.

429. I presume there is no question whatever that drunkenness is worse under evasion than without it?—That is so, and I think it would be the effect of this Bill that you would have drunkenness under evasion, and you would have the inconvenience of men drinking actually in the street, because it would be legal, under this Bill, for a landlord to give a pot of beer to a man in his house and to let that man walk outside, within half a yard of the house, to drink that pot of beer.

430. And do you think that the drinking under evasion would be carried to such an extent that it would be larger than the drinking now without any restriction?—I am afraid it would, because they would not know exactly what quantity to ask for; two or three of them perhaps would club together and would ask for a gallon of beer and carry it off to some place, and so women would ask for gin in larger quantities perhaps than they would take if they had an opportunity of taking it by the glass at the bar of a public-house.

431. Mr. Hibbert.] Did you give evidence before Mr. Berkeley's Committee?—No, I never gave evidence upon this subject before.

432. Were you a police magistrate at the time when Mr. Wilson Patten's Act was passed?—Yes, I have been a magistrate since 1840, but I have never been examined as a witness upon the subject of licenses or public-house trading by any Committee before.

433. Can you call to remembrance at all the effect which that Act had upon drunkenness upon the Sunday?—No, it was a very short time in force, and I do not think that we noticed any great change. I never recollect that it was the subject of conversation among the magistrates. We meet quarterly, and talk these things over very often, and I have returns from all the courts, and if there had been any very great change I think I should have heard of it.

434. Would you believe that this was a true account of the state of things, which was printed in July 1855, when the Act was in operation: "At the Bow-street court, the operation of the new Act had a marked effect upon the business of the court on Mondays; before, the proceedings of Monday were almost exclusively confined to drunken charges; frequently as many as 70 cases were heard in succession, and generally about two-thirds of the offenders were women, while more than half the entire number were taken to the police stations after 10 o'clock on the night of the Lord's Day. On the first Monday subsequent to the passing of the Act, however, only one drunken charge was received in the district after 10 o'clock; on the following Monday there was not a single case received; and the prison vans left Bow-street, for the first time within the experience of the magistrate, without conveying a prisoner of any kind from the court. On the following Monday again there was only one case of drunkenness, which had been received after 10 o'clock the previous night." This is taken from a paper published, in July 1855, by the Society for Promoting the due Observance of the Lord's Day?—That is what I call a sensational article. It is unfair to judge of the state of drunkenness from the number of charges on any one day at a police court. For example, if it is a very wet night we have very few charges the next morning; people do not go out.

435. Do you believe in those returns which were given by Sir Richard Mayne with respect to the working of that Act during the first six months after it was in operation?—I have ventured to say, once or twice, in giving my evidence to-day, that I would almost warn the Committee against attaching too much importance to returns; I could not assist the Committee in any way by returns; the same person is frequently charged with drunkenness 30 or 40 times in a year, and the returns would lead to the supposition that there were 30 or 40 different persons, whereas there was only one person.

436. Do you know that Mr. Hall, who was the magistrate of Bow-street at the time, gave evidence before Mr. Berkeley's Committee to show that drunkenness on Sunday had been very much decreased by the operation of Mr. Wilson Patten's Act?—I was not aware that he had given evidence to that effect.

437. Will you allow me to call your attention to this remark. He was asked, "Do you consider that drunkenness on Sunday has been checked, or the contrary, by this Act?" To which he replied, "I think it has been checked; there are fewer charges at Bow-street than we used to have before the Act came into operation." He was then asked, "Do you consider that entirely attributable to the operation of this Act?" And his answer was, "I can assign no other reason; I am strongly impressed with the notion that it is attributable to the Act, for I perceive that very shortly after the Act came into operation a check was given to the number of the charges which were brought before me on Mondays?"—If the Committee had asked Mr. Hall whether the number of charges on Tuesday morning were not greater than on Monday morning, I think he would have been obliged to say that the charges were greater on Tuesday than on Monday.

438. You do not think it is necessary to treat the Metropolis in a different manner from the country in respect to the restriction on Sunday trading?—No; if the law be good for the Metropolis, it ought to be good for the whole country.

439. You have referred to Sir George Grey's Act of 1864, and you spoke very favourably with respect to the operation of that Act; that Act, I believe, is put into operation in the country by the local authorities; it is not made compulsory?—I am aware of that.

440. Would you think that the same power could be given to the local authorities to deal with the closing of public-houses on Sunday?—I would not give that power to the local authorities. I think it would be invidious to throw upon the mayor, or any local authority, the power of fixing the hours for closing public-houses. I think it is better that the Legislature should do that.

441. I presume you are aware that that power was given to the local authorities, in the Act of 1864?—Yes, but I think that it was an invidious power to give; and I should think that all the local authorities would be very glad not to have that power.

442. Mr. John Abel Smith.] Do you know how many many local authorities exercise that power?—I do not know exactly. There was a very great difference of opinion, when the Act was passed, amongst the local authorities, whether they would adopt it or not; but I understand that it was adopted in most of the large towns, and that it gave great satisfaction. I have not followed that up by inquiring whether more towns have adopted it or not.

443. Mr. Hibbert.] Do you remember whether there were not greater objections to the operation of Mr. Wilson Patten's Act, as to closing the public-houses between five and six, than to closing them between 10 and 11?—Yes. That was found to be inconvenient, and I fancy that was one of the reasons; but I do not like to speak positively upon that point now, because it is a long time ago, and I do not know exactly what reasons may have operated.

444. Do you think that if public-houses were closed at an earlier hour, say at nine or ten o'clock in the evening, without interfering in any other way, that would inconvenience any very large number of people?—I am certain it would inconvenience a very large number.

445. What particular class do you allude to?—All the working people who lodge in the poorer parts of the town, who, as I said before, have no means of having cellars or having any stock to draw from, and are obliged to go to the public-house for every drop of beer they want to drink, and of course the Committee know that the working classes are a beer-drinking population.

446. You refer to drawing beer for supper?—Yes.

447. Would not that be over before nine o'clock in the evening?—Not at all; there are many people who sup much later than that, and they are very fond of having their beer just before going to bed.

448. Have you found any difficulty in carrying out the present restrictive system in the metropolis?—None at all.

449. Is there a difficulty in proving cases?—No, the law is very well observed. I have had no difficulty with regard to the difficulty which Sir Richard Mayne alluded to in proving the actual sale; he seemed to throw some blame upon some of the magistrates, but that is hardly just, because the magistrates are regulated by the decisions of the Court of Queen's Bench, and in one of the decisions that Court held that there ought to be proof of the sale. Of course we must bow to those decisions; I do not mean to say that we may not infer that there was a sale if we found that there were persons drinking at, we will say, two o'clock in the morning, that is, two hours after the house ought to have been closed, then we may infer that the beer was sold after 12 o'clock.

450. Are not many cases dismissed owing to the difficulty of proving the sale?—I think not.

451. Do you think it desirable to alter the law in that respect?—I think there is no occasion. I think it would be difficult to frame the law so as to obviate that difficulty, and I do not think there is any great occasion for it.

452. Mr. John Abel Smith.] Do not you think that people, when they go in to drink in a public-house drink very often more than they intended to do when they went in?—I dare say they do; but I have always observed that in the cases that have come before me that the landlords are in the habit of saying, "Now, my man, you have had 0.69.

enough." When a man is getting half drunk and asks for another glass, respectable landlords of this town say, "No, you have had enough, you will render me liable to a penalty if you get drunk upon the premises, and I recommend you not to have any more, but to go away." Sometimes disputes arise because the people are refused by the landlords; a man that is getting a little the worse for drink, and wants more, is not satisfied with that answer, he goes outside and breaks a window; but if that man had an opportunity of drinking at home I have no doubt he would drink much more; the class of persons addicted to drink is, to a certain extent, controlled by the landlord; and, therefore, drinking at the bar is preferable to drinking off the premises.

453. Mr. Locke.] Have you looked at the first clause in this Bill?—Yes, I have read it.

454. What is your opinion as to the construction of that clause with reference to its restriction to bonâ fide travellers; in the first place, would the proviso apply to public-houses in the country?—No, as the Bill is drawn, it would not.

455. What do you think would be the effect of the Bill upon public-houses in the country?—It would be for the court to say whether that is what is called an implied repeal of the previous Acts; the other Acts are not expressly repealed; but the question is, whether it would amount to an implied repeal; I am inclined to think that the Court of Queen's Bench would say that it did not; but it is open to an argument; and no doubt, if the Bill goes on, it would be very desirable to cure that, because undoubtedly it is open to argument.

456. As I understand the honourable Member for Chichester, it is not intended to interfere with travellers in the country; but your opinion is that it would be open to argument?—Yes, it would be open to grave argument; and it might be put that it is impliedly a repeal of the previous Acts, though not expressly so.

457. Seeing that the words are "to the whole of the said days"?—Yes, and you know, of course, the doctrine of implied repeal.

458. You have been asked whether there ought not to be a restraint upon the person who gets drunk on Sunday; do you think there ought to be a restraint upon the person who does not get drunk on Sunday?—I do not know what sort of restraint the honourable Member alludes to.

459. The restraint that this Bill would give, saying that the public-houses should be shut up all day on Sunday?—I think that I have already sufficiently intimated my opinion.

460. You think that such restraint should not be put upon an innocent person for the sake of a few guilty persons?—Yes, that is the foundation of my opinion.

461. You observe that the restriction under this Bill would be so extensive that beer from a refreshment bar or anything else could not be taken, to be consumed off the premises, after half-past two o'clock until eight o'clock at night, and then the house would be open again from eight until ten: do you, or do you not think that in the case of persons who wanted to get beer, because being in draught it cannot be kept in a house for any length of time without getting flat, and people must have it fresh from the public-house, a great number would be very much inconvenienced if they were obliged to take their meal at home, when they have beer with with it, either before half-past two or between eight and ten o'clock at night?—The hours are too limited, I think.

462. You say that a great number of people are to be seen outside the public-house at one o'clock every Sunday waiting to get their beer; that is as soon as they could go there, is it not?—Yes, they are anxious to have their luncheon or their dinner immediately after church.

463. And would not they likewise be desirous of getting their beer between half-past two and eight; are there not a great many people who dine between half-past two and eight?—Of course, from various causes the hours of dining and supping vary very much, and, therefore, there ought to be a greater opportunity of getting beer than there would be under this Bill.

464. Under this Bill everybody would be compelled either to dine before half past two if he wanted to get any beer from the public-house for his dinner, or after eight o'clock at night?—Yes; I can only repeat that I think the hours are too limited.

465. You think that the hours, as at present fixed, answer the purpose in a reasonable manner?—I do; and I think they are not too liberal.

466. Mr. John Abel Smith.] Have you ever taken any trouble to make yourself acquainted by personal inspection, with what goes on in the public-houses on Sunday evening?—Yes, when I was first appointed a magistrate, I visited almost every public-house in the district, and also the pawnbrokers' shops, and all other shops and all other places that were likely to become the subject of any discussion in the cases that arose before me; therefore I know the habits of the people who frequent such places.

467. Have you ever been in those public-houses on Sunday evening?—Yes.

468. And you never saw anything objectionable?—Very seldom indeed; the police are watching the conduct of all the public-houses, and very ready to take out summonses if there is anything like disorderly conduct apparent.

469. Mr. Locke.] You state that on Tuesday mornings there are more cases of drunkenness than on Mondays; how do you account for that?—Because the Monday is made a great holiday by several trades in London. There are a great many tailors and a great many shoemakers who do not work at all on Monday.

470. Does that arise, in a measure, in consequence of their not being able to take such recreation as they please on the Sunday?—No, it does not; they like to have another holiday, but they insist upon the masters giving them the same wages. They make a holiday of the Monday, and go out of town; no doubt the facilities for getting out of town, going down to Gravesend and other places, have increased so much, that the men are very apt to spend Monday as a holiday. The love for holiday making is increasing.

471. Do you think it would be a good thing that if public-houses are opened on the Sunday, persons should be allowed to go into a place of innocent recreation on the Sunday?—I think it would be a very good thing.

472. I mean, places where there is no drinking at all?—Yes, a very good thing.

473. That they should have an opportunity of going into gardens and so forth, where they might walk about and enjoy themselves?—Yes. Unfortunately, there are very few such places. Although that does not bear upon this Bill, I think it would undoubtedly be a good thing; I am in favour of permitting all that sort of amusement as much as possible.

474. But such facilities, you think, would not increase drinking?—No.

475. On the contrary, they would tend to do away with it?—Yes, certainly.

SIR JAMES FERGUSSON, BART., IN THE CHAIR.

THOMAS BORROW BURCHAM, Esq., called in; and Examined.

476. Chairman.] You are a Magistrate of the Southwark Police Court?—Yes.

477. How many years have you been a police magistrate?—Twelve; I was appointed 11 years last October.

478. You are aware of the subject of consideration by this Committee, namely, the Sale of Fermented Liquors on Sunday Bill?—Yes.

479. You have no doubt often had occasion to consider the laws relating to the sale of liquor?—Undoubtedly, in the course of my practice as a magistrate.

480. In your experience of late years, is it your opinion that the number of offences against the liquor laws has been on the increase or the decrease?—My impression is, that at least during the last two years the number of cases of drunkenness brought before me has considerably diminished.

481. And is it your opinion that that indicates, or that it is also accompanied by, a diminution in the number of actual offences?—I have reason to believe so.

482. Mr. John Abel Smith.] Have you any returns of cases with you?—No.

483. Chairman.] Would the observation which you have just made, apply to cases arising on Sunday as well as those on other days; for instance, as regards the business occurring in your court on Monday?—Yes.

484. You are of opinion that the offences connected with drunkenness arising out of or connected with drunkenness, are diminishing upon Sundays?—Undoubtedly.

485. Do you think that that reduction is in consequence of the restrictions of the law, that is to say, that the cases of drunkenness on Sunday are fewer in consequence of the smaller number of hours during which public-houses may be open?—That is a question which I am not prepared to answer. The reduction may be owing to other circumstances, for what I know. I have no reason for believing either one way or the other that the diminution is owing to the restrictions in the trade in liquor.

486. Have you formed any opinion as to whether drunkenness might be further diminished by further restrictions being placed upon the sale of liquor on Sunday?—As far as my own private opinion goes, I do not think that it would.

487. What in your experience has been the result of the Act of 1864, Sir George Grey's Act?—I believe that the better condition of the lower classes in that respect, is not owing so much to any legislative enactment as to other causes which may be operating upon them.

488. What are those causes to which you refer?—I think an improved state of morality, and a great increase of education among the lower classes.

489. Do you think that there is more shame felt amongst the working classes at drunkenness than there used to be?—That is a question which it would be very difficult to answer; but with respect to the classes that may properly be considered the working classes, as far as my own experience goes, I do not think that drunkenness to any extent does prevail among them.

490. Can you not state whether in your opinion the Act of 1864, which compelled the earlier closing of public-houses particularly on Saturday night, has or has not diminished the number of cases coming before you?—That really is a question to which I could not give any answer which would be satisfactory to my mind. Even supposing that such a fact exists as that which I have mentioned, it would be very difficult to ascertain the especial cause to which that fact is due. That may be one, and there may be other causes as well as that which are in operation, and are likely to produce such an effect.

491. You have no opinion as to, whether the provisions of this Bill, or some of them, by means of which the hours during which public-houses may be open on Sunday may be restricted, would be likely to diminish drinking to excess?—No, I do not think I have sufficient data upon which I could form an opinion; at least, not data sufficiently certain.

492. Is it your opinion that putting restrictions on the sale of liquor has the effect of diminishing the practice of drinking, or do you think that the hours at which the sale is still lawful would be only taken advantage of more greedily?

greedily?—As I stated before, I have my doubts whether those restrictions with respect to the hours have so much effect as many persons believe.

493. Do you think that the placing of heavy restrictions upon the lawful sale of liquor would tend to encourage illicit sale on Sunday, or do you think that the police regulations are sufficiently strong to guard against that?—I think that the police regulations are sufficiently strong to guard against any such contingency.

494. Then you would not be afraid that the placing of additional restrictions upon the hours of sale would tend to encourage illicit sale, and such evasions of the law?—I am not in favour of imposing greater restrictions than what exist at the present moment.

495. Mr. Roebuck.] During the time that you have been a police magistrate, there have been changes in the law respecting the opening of shops for the sale of liquor; as for example, in the year 1864 the hours were restricted on Saturday night; directing your recollection to that, are you at all aware, in your own mind, of having found a diminution of crime of that sort resulting from that Act?—I think I have stated that within the last two years there seems to me to have been a considerable diminution in the cases of drunkenness.

496. But that you attribute, do you not, in a great measure to other causes than mere restriction, namely, an improved morality of the people, improved education, and better habits generally amongst the working classes?—Those are causes undoubtedly to which I attribute it; there may be other causes, and the Act of Parliament may also have had that operation.

497. In your own mind can you trace any connection between that improved morality and general character of the people and any specific legislation concerning the Sunday?—Certainly not; not as acting directly as a cause, and not in conjunction with others.

498. You say that within the last two years there has been, using the general word, an improved morality amongst the people?—Yes.

499. During that time has there been any change in the law?—There has not, I think, been any change in the law since 1864.

500. But the time which you pick out as a time of improvement has been since the passing of that law, two years ago?—Yes.

501. So that, that being the case, you cannot in your own mind, I presume, attribute any great effect to the operation of the law in bringing about that change in the people?—No. It may be a little more than two years, but certainly not much more, that I have remarked that diminution in the cases which have been brought before me as a magistrate at the police court of Southwark.

502. Within the area of your district of the town, is there much Sunday trading?—I think not; I am not quite sure whether I am to understand the question to refer to Sunday trading in beer and other liquor, or Sunday trading generally.

503. To what is called Sunday trading generally?—There are, in certain districts, shops open on Sunday morning; for instance, in the New Cut, for the sale of vegetables, and, generally speaking, for necessaries; but, with those exceptions, I do not think that Sunday trading is at all common.

504. So that, in fact, so far as your district is concerned, there is no necessity for further legislation even upon Sunday trading?—No.

505. And therefore I think, a fortiori, we may conclude, as far as your district is concerned, there is no necessity for further legislation regarding trading in drink?—That is my opinion.

506. I presume you have very large experience; all cases of drunkenness which take place on the Sunday I suppose come before you on Monday morning?—I have sat in the course of my time a great many times on the Monday morning, but I do not always sit on the Monday morning; perhaps during the time that I have been at the Southwark police court, I may have sat one-third at least of the Mondays which have happened in that period.

507. Has it occurred to you, in your experience as a magistrate, to find that there has been a greater amount of drunkenness brought before you on the Tuesday morning than on the Monday morning?—On the Monday morning there are the cases brought of two nights, the Saturday and the Sunday, on the Tuesday morning, of course there are only the cases of the night before, but taking the two nights, Saturday night and Sunday night, and comparing them with any other two days in the week I do not believe that there is a larger number of cases brought forward on Monday morning than would be brought forward in the case which I have supposed.

508. And that, notwithstanding that the working man generally receives his wages on Saturday night and Sunday, is an idle day?—Yes, certainly.

509. Both which circumstances would have a tendency, would they not, to increase drunkenness if that tendency were in the people's mind?—Yes; I may say, with respect to the opinion which I have just expressed, that it is an opinion which I have frequently expressed during the last year and more.

510. Taking your view of what morality ought to be, would you say that there was anything disgraceful in the habits and manners of the working classes in your district on the Sunday?—No.

511. And therefore putting it in a short compass, in your view there is no necessity for further restraining laws to endeavour to put restraints upon the people under the notion that thereby you are about to increase their morality?—That is my opinion.

512. Mr. Horsfall.] I think you stated, did you not, that it was your opinion that drunkenness did not prevail among the working classes to the extent to which some people suppose?—Yes, that is my opinion.

513. Do you make that statement from your own observation or from what you have heard?—I make it from my own observation principally.

514. From going into those parts of your district where drunken persons would be likely to be seen?—From what I have observed in London and other places, but more especially in London on a Sunday.

515. How many cases of drunkenness on an average are brought before you daily?—That I cannot answer; I have not ascertained it.

516. Do you know the number brought before you in the course of a year?—No, I do not.

517. Do you know the number of public-houses

*T. B.
Burcham,
Esq.*

houses in your district?—No; it is a very large district, containing, I suppose, nearly 250,000 people.

518. Can you give anything like an opinion as to the number?—No, I could not; it would be quite a venture.

519. And you cannot tell, of course, the number of persons employed in those public-houses?—No.

520. But I presume you would be of opinion that if those persons could have more of the day of rest to which they are entitled (I speak of Sunday as a day of rest), it would be a very desirable thing?—Undoubtedly, cessation from labour and a day of rest is very desirable to all classes.

521. When asked about Sunday trading, you stated, I think, that there was no amount of Sunday trading in your district?—No considerable amount of Sunday trading; at least, I think not.

522. Only for what you call the necessaries of life?—Only for what I would call the necessaries of life.

523. When you speak of the necessaries of life, do you speak of what you consider the necessaries of life, or what the law considers the necessaries of life?—I speak not of what I consider to be the necessaries of life, but I speak in reference to what I suppose to be the common acceptance of the term.

524. There is a legal term, that is to say, there are certain articles defined by law as necessaries of life, and which are allowed to be sold; do you speak of those necessaries, or of those which you consider to be necessaries of life?—I do not know of any legal definition of necessaries of life.

525. There are certain articles specified by law which are allowed to be sold on Sunday?—I do not know whether the honourable Member means the Act of Charles the Second.

526. I do not know what the Act is; but the articles are defined which are now allowed to be sold by law; do you speak of those articles which are allowed to be sold by law, or which you yourself consider the necessaries of life?—I am not aware of any particular articles which are laid down by law as being necessaries of life.

527. For instance, milk and fish are both allowed by law to be sold on Sundays?—Yes; those would be included in the general term which I used.

528. Then you speak of what you consider to be necessaries of life?—When I spoke of necessaries of life, perhaps I ought to have added such articles as fish and milk, that require early consumption.

529. Then I understand that you do not confine yourself to the legal definition of the term?—No.

530. But to the definition of articles which you think ought to be sold on Sunday?—I would add to what I stated with respect to the necessaries of life such articles as fish, and others which may not be considered necessaries of life, but which are made exceptions in the Act to which I have alluded, and which can be legally sold on Sundays.

531. Mr. John Abel Smith.] How long ago is it since you were in the New Cut on Sunday?—I do not know that ever I was in the New Cut on Sunday.

532. Then how do you speak as to what goes on there on the Sunday?—From information which has come to me from the police and other persons belonging to the district.

533. If you were told that the street was so crowded on the Sunday morning with people buying and selling as to render it very difficult to get through, should you doubt the accuracy of that statement?—I have already stated that I believed that the trading on the Sunday morning was chiefly confined to the necessaries of life, to which I afterwards added, and also to such articles as fish; and I believe that, in the New Cut, from the information which I have received, the Sunday trading is confined to the articles which I have mentioned.

534. Do you still retain your impression that it is a decent and orderly street on Sunday morning?—That I cannot answer; I have not been there.

535. Did not you express an opinion that there was an absence of disorder in your district, on Sunday morning?—No; I am not aware that I said that there was an absence of disorder in my district on Sunday morning.

536. It is very desirable that you should give us what is really your opinion?—I am very desirous to express what is really my opinion.

537. I do not wish to misrepresent you, but I understood you to say so?—I am not aware that I said so.

538. Then I will ask you, is there any disorder from the Sunday sales, in your district?—Not that I am aware of; I am not aware, at the present moment, of any instances where parties have been brought before me for having caused obstruction, or for disorderly conduct at the time mentioned.

539. Are you aware of the fact of the large trade which takes place on Sunday morning, in the New Cut?—I have stated before, that from the information which I have received, I believe that considerable trading with respect to what I call the necessaries of life, and other articles which I afterwards added, is carried on in the New Cut, on Sunday morning.

540. Have you ever been in the public-houses in the New Cut on the Sunday morning?—No; it is not my duty to go there.

541. Have you any personal knowledge of what goes on as regards drinking on Sunday, in the New Cut?—No.

542. You draw your conclusions simply from the fact, that there are not cases of violence or drunkenness brought up from thence before you as a magistrate?—My duties are simply judicial as a magistrate; I have nothing to do with the police.

543. I am not asking you what your duties are, I am asking what your knowledge is; have you any knowledge upon the fact, for the information of the Committee?—Knowledge of what fact?

544. The fact as to the practices that are going on in the New Cut on Sunday morning, or on Sunday evening?—Not more than what I have already stated.

545. That is from hearsay only, and from the absence of charges?—From the absence of charges and from the information which I have received.

546. You have stated a strong opinion as to the diminution of the charges of drunkenness. I believe you have in your district a very large number of persons employed in trade on the wharves of the river?—Yes.

T. B.
Burcham,
Esq.
1868.

547. Do you know anything of the habits of those men?—I know nothing of the habits of them, except so far as they may have been brought under my observation in my judicial capacity.

548. They earn considerable daily wages, but you have no means of forming an opinion as to their providence or improvidence?—No.

549. But they form a very large class of the labouring community under your jurisdiction, do they not?—They form a very considerable class, undoubtedly. The jurisdiction of my court extends, on the river side, from Waterloo Bridge nearly to Deptford; therefore there are a great number of persons either working or living within that district who come within that jurisdiction.

550. There are a great number of persons, are there not, also, who are employed there daily, who do not live in the district?—Yes, undoubtedly; but I think I may say this, that I have not observed a greater amount of drunkenness among the classes who are employed upon works upon the river than among other classes of a similar status and in a similar position in life.

551. Do you think that that is the general opinion?—That I cannot say.

552. You have given evidence to the Committee as to the fact of there being a diminution in the amount of drunkenness within the last two or three years, which would be shortly after the passing of Sir George Grey's Act of 1864?—Within a year and a half of the passing of that Act.

553. How did that Act affect the public-houses in your district?—In what way, do you mean?

554. That Act I understand to be one which limited the closing of the public-houses at a certain hour, 1 o'clock in the morning; were they before that kept open all night or did that Act introduce a restriction as to their mode of carrying on their business?—I believe that previous to the passing of that Act the public-houses in general were not kept open all night, but that there were only a few in different districts which were kept open during the night.

555. Do not you think that a portion of the improved habits of the people to which you have alluded might be attributable to the operation of that Act?—I cannot say whether it is attributable to the operation of that Act, nor would I say that it is not attributable to it; I have stated that I have not sufficient data with regard to that Act, at least data sufficiently certain, to enable me to pronounce a definite and certain opinion upon the question.

556. Am I accurate in giving this as the general purport and meaning of your evidence; first of all that you are generally against restriction; secondly, that you think that there is a marked improvement in the habits and manners of the people; and thirdly, as a conclusion from those two, that you are adverse to increased restriction now?—With regard to the first point I do not go so far as to say that I am against all restriction, because certain restrictions are reasonable, and I think necessary; but certainly I am opposed to any further restrictions in addition to those which already exist.

557. Why are you of that opinion?—Because I do not think that they would be of any service.

558. Do you think that there is any other measure of restriction in reference to drink than the discontent of the population, such as would make evasion of the law impossible to prevent?—

That is a question which I am not prepared to answer.

559. Have you no opinion upon the subject?—I am very loth to express an opinion, unless I have good and certain grounds upon which that opinion rests; at least, what I consider to be sound grounds.

560. I should like to know the grounds upon which you do rest your opinions; can you give us any number of cases, or anything upon which you found an opinion?—It is more upon general observation than upon any particular details. It is upon a number of particulars remembered and brought together in my own mind rather than upon any definite cases.

561. Would you mind applying to my question the same principle of general observation, and telling me what your opinion would be with regard to restrictions generally?—With regard to restrictions generally, in producing what effect, may I ask?

562. What do you think has been the effect upon drinking, of restrictive laws which now exist; first of all, what is the law now with regard to the limitation of hours on Sunday?—The law is different with respect to public-houses and with respect to beer-houses, and the law is different also in different districts, in towns of large population and towns of small population.

563. We will take London, which is known to you best; what is the law in London with respect to the opening of public-houses on Sunday?

They must be closed at 12 o'clock on the Saturday night, and they must not be opened until 1 o'clock on the Sunday morning; they can open from 1 o'clock to 3, and then in the evening from 5 to 11.

564. What do you think has been the effect of that restrictive law on the sale of liquors?—Do you mean as to whether a greater quantity was sold before the law existed?

565. Not only with regard to the quantities sold, but with regard to its effect upon the population?—That is a question which I cannot answer.

566. You cannot give the Committee any information as to whether the past restrictive law has tended to limit the sale of spirituous liquors?—I have no information which I can give the Committee upon that point.

567. Have you paid any particular attention to this subject?—I cannot say that I have paid more particular attention to it than to other matters which come within my magisterial observation.

568. Have you any other facts to lay before the Committee in corroboration or in support of your opinion as to the improved habits and morals of the people of Southwark during the last two years?—I am not speaking from any particular facts which I may have collected myself; I am speaking from my own observation, and from information derived from others, and also from opinions expressed by other persons in whose judgment I place some reliance.

569. Do you think that any returns from your office would confirm that view?—I think they would.

570. Would you have any objection to let the Committee have the returns upon which you form your opinion?—The returns I think are sent from the office monthly; if there are any returns at the office they would be gladly made available to the Committee.

571. If there is an increased morality and an increase of improvement in the habits of the people, I presume it would be marked by a diminution in the charges?—I should think so.

572. What I want to know is whether the returns from your court will confirm that view?—I think they would.

573. Should you have any objection to append them to your evidence?—I must see the returns first before I can express an objection or not; the returns in my particular district may or may not bear out my evidence.

574. Would not it be an important thing that the Committee should know whether you do or do not support by your facts the opinions which you have expressed?—You must take the returns not only for the last two years but for a great number of years; at least for nine or ten years previously to that.

575. Say the last five years and the preceding five years, or the last three years and the preceding three years; have you any objection to give us such returns?—I do not speak from an examination of these returns.

576. So I collect; but I am desirous to know whether the actual cases in court will bear out the opinion which you express as to the improvement of the habits of the people?—I believe they would; if there are those returns at the court, as I said before, they would be gladly made available to the Committee, but I do not know whether there are such returns; returns are sent from the court, but whether those returns are kept I am not aware.

577. But you have always kept a record of the number of cases, and of the class of cases that come before you as a magistrate?—No.

578. I want to know whether the number of cases for the last three years are diminished as compared with the preceding three years. I will take five years or three years as you please, but I want to fix the period, and compare the two in order that I may test your opinion?—I cannot speak without returns. I am very desirous to give the Committee all the information that I can. I should be very sorry if it should be thought that I am reluctant to give the Committee any information that I can give them.

579. So I imagine, and I do not wish to imagine anything else; but it does appear to me that it is quite clear that you can confirm your evidence, by showing to the Committee that the number of cases brought before you within a certain period are less than in the preceding period?—That I might be able to do if I were to look over the returns.

580. I do not know whether there are returns, but you have got a register, have you not, of the cases which come before you?—I do not know whether such a register is kept at the court.

581. Do you mean as a magistrate sitting in Southwark, to tell me that you do not know whether there is a book which contains the number of cases which come before you?—I do not know whether there is or not. I have nothing to do with that; there are returns which are made for the police, but the magistrates have nothing whatever to do with them. I make no return myself; returns are periodically sent to the Government offices, which are signed by the magistrate to authenticate them.

582. Do you ever look at them and read them before you sign them?—I look at the number; 0.69.

I do not take the trouble to look over the whole of them; that is for the clerks to do.

583. What are those returns taken from?—Those returns would be taken, I suppose, from the charge sheets and the books kept by the clerks.

584. Do you never look at those books?—No, it is not a part of my duty.

585. Then the opinion which you have expressed with regard to the improvement is merely a personal opinion, without reference to the details which those books might furnish?—Without reference to a particular inspection or examination of the details.

586. Going back, just for a moment, to the question of restrictions, do you believe, or do you not believe, that the restrictions on the sale of drink on Sunday have been beneficial or injurious?—As I said before it is a question upon which I do not wish to give any definite opinion. I do not think that restrictions are injurious unless they be carried too far.

587. What is the limit?—That I really cannot say.

588. Why are you not now in favour of further restriction?—Because I do not believe that it would have any beneficial effect.

589. Why do you think so if you do not look at the past and compare it with the present?—I do look at the past, and I form that opinion upon a general observation made upon the past; upon observation extending not only over the time during which I have been a police magistrate, but over a great number of years.

590. I want to know your reasons for that opinion?—Opinions are frequently formed, especially upon matters of this kind, by gradual observation from facts which one has observed.

591. May I, without offence, ask you again what that conclusion so formed is, as regards the effect of restriction?—I do not think that there is anything like the beneficial effect arising from restrictions that many persons are inclined to think. I do not think that legislative enactments have so great an effect upon the morality of the people as some persons imagine.

592. But you still think that the past restrictions have been beneficial?—I should think most probably they have.

593. Then why should not further restrictions be beneficial?—That by no means follows.

594. I do not say it does, but I ask you why it is so?—That really is a question which it is very difficult to answer; there are a great number of questions which almost seem to answer themselves, and it seems to me that it is one of that class.

595. May I call to your recollection that you are invited to come here for the purpose of giving information to the Committee and counsel as to the wisdom or impropriety of passing a certain Bill; that clearly opens the door to me to ask you, as you have expressed a very strong opinion against further restriction, and as you admit that past restrictions have been beneficial, what you think is the limit of that restriction, and what would be the effect of further restrictions?—That really is a question which I cannot answer.

596. Mr. Baines.] Were you preceded in the office of police magistrate at Southwark by Mr. A'Becket?—I was.

597. Would you have respect for the opinion of Mr. A'Becket, from his experience and his knowledge acquired in the same way as your own in in that district?—I had not the pleasure of knowing Mr. A'Becket, and Mr. A'Becket was only, I think, two or three years a magistrate before he died.

598. Are you aware that he expressed a strong opinion of the effect which had been produced by the passing of Mr. Wilson Patten's Act in 1854?—No.

599. I will read you a passage from a letter which Mr. A'Becket addressed to the "Times" newspaper, dated the 8th of January 1855, from the Police Court: he says, "previous to the Bill coming into operation, the business of this court was not only considerably greater on Monday than on any other day in the week, but it consisted chiefly of cases of drunkenness, and of assaults more or less violent that had been committed under its influence. From the day when the Act came into operation, I have kept an account of the number of charges of Sunday drunkenness which have been brought before me on every Monday on which I have sat here, and I furnish you with the result;" then he gives the results of each day, and the summary is this: that there were 37 cases of drunkenness in 19 days, a fraction less than two on an average for each Sunday; would you attach weight to the opinion of Mr. A'Becket as showing that there had been an immense reduction in the amount of Sunday drinking, and therefore disorderliness in consequence of the passing of that Act?—I should attach weight to the opinion, so far as it is founded upon his own observation, and especially as he, at the time, had his attention directed particularly to the question.

600. Then that obviously is the result of most careful observation and recorded experience from week to week?—You will see it is only for a short period; it is 19 Mondays, which is a short period compared with 11 years.

601. Are you aware that the public-houses were by law permitted to be open the whole 24 hours on Sunday, from 1831 to 1839, that is to say, from 4 o'clock on Sunday morning to 4 o'clock on Monday morning?—No, I did not know that that was so.

602. Are you aware that, from the year 1839 to the year 1854, which brings it down to the date of Mr. A'Becket's experience, the number of hours which public-houses were open on Sunday was 15 hours out of the 24?—Yes.

603. You are probably aware that since, I do not say Mr. Wilson Patten's Act, because that was repealed in a year, but since 1855, the number of hours during which public-houses have been open have been eight on the Sunday, that is one-third of the length of time that they might by law be open in the year 1831. Those being the facts, I wish to ask you whether that improvement in the morals of the people, especially with reference to drunkenness which you have observed, would be likely to be caused by that restriction in the number of hours that public-houses were open?—I think that may be the case; I would not undertake to say that it was.

604. You have said that the general improvement in the morality and the education of the people, you think, has tended to the diminution of Sunday drunkenness?—Are you aware that every lodging-house in the Mint, which is, I believe, close to your office and in Kent-street, is visited by the Christian Instruction Society of Surrey Chapel every Sunday evening?—No.

605. Are you aware that that Society has opened a reading-room for the public in the Mint?—No.

606. Are you aware that the Mint was formerly a district in which there was the greatest amount of violence and disorder generally?—Yes; it is a historical place for it.

607. It was there that the garotting commenced, was it not?—Yes.

608. Now, I am sure you will be happy to tell us that it is no longer celebrated in that infamous way?—I cannot say much in favour of the Mint or Kent-street, which you have mentioned. There are more thieves brought before me from the Mint and from Kent-street, than from almost the whole of the rest of the district.

609. And that, I believe, has been the immemorial state of the case; but, on the whole, are you unable to report a better state of things?—No, I do not say that the Mint is as bad as it used to be; but it is bad enough; and Kent-street also. They are the home of thieves in the Borough at the present day.

610. Mr. F. Stanley.] At the present time a landlord can refuse, can he not, to serve a man with drink in a public-house if he thinks that he has had enough?—Yes.

611. And do not cases come before you which prove that that does occur?—Yes, sometimes.

612. So that, to a certain extent, a landlord exercises control in his house?—Yes.

613. And is assisted by the law in so doing?—Undoubtedly.

614. And for the most part, as far as it has come under your observation, speaking as a matter of opinion, it is the landlord's wish to keep his house in good order?—Yes, certainly.

615. It has been stated that one effect of the proposed Bill might be to encourage the consumption of drink off the premises; that a number of persons could club together for the purpose of buying drink at a public-house, out of the hours prescribed in the Bill, and taking it away for consumption elsewhere; do you think as a matter of opinion that that is likely to occur?—I think it is not unlikely, but at the same time it must be taken into consideration that they would have a difficulty in finding any decent place where they could go and sit down comfortably and partake of what they had procured.

616. Do you imagine that they would always be particular as to the place that they would select?—Their rooms are small and dirty, and the rooms themselves would not afford them any attraction.

617. But you admit that in the drinking off the premises there would not be the same control that there is at the present time in a public-house?—Of course not.

618. Do you think that that would be a state of things which would be desirable?—If the effect of it was to increase the drinking in private houses, undoubtedly that would not be an effect to be desired.

619. With reference to the opinion which you expressed, that drunkenness had diminished within the last two years, that was shortly after the passing of Sir George Grey's Act, and do you think that you can reasonably connect the two facts?—I can only state what is the result of my own observation with respect to that particular question, extending over a period of about two-and-a-half years, and during that two-and-a-half years my impression has been very strong that the amount of drunkenness has very much diminished. Whether it is connected with Sir George Grey's Act Act or not I cannot undertake to say. I think it not unlikely that that may be one of the causes which have produced that effect; but if you ask me whether I think it is the sole cause, I should say no.

620. You would rather be disposed to attribute the improvement to the general improvement of morality?—I should attribute it to that and to education; and there are other little causes of which we have perhaps but little notion, but which would be taken into consideration if they were known in producing those effects.

621. Mr. Locke.] Who is your colleague?—Mr. Partridge.

622. You have been asked questions with respect to Sunday trading in the New Cut, and you say that that trading is carried on for the purpose of supplying necessities?—Yes.

EDMUND HUMPHRY WOOLRYCH, Esq., called in; and Examined.

628. Chairman.] You are Magistrate of the Lambeth Police Court, are you not?—I am.

629. How many years have you been a police magistrate?—Seven years.

630. Are you aware of the subject of inquiry before this Committee?—I am.

631. Have you read the Bill?—Yes, I have.

632. You are aware that its principal object is to further limit the hours during which public-houses may be open on Sunday; limiting those hours, in fact, to between one and half-past two, and between eight and ten on Sunday?—Yes.

633. What is your experience of the growth or diminution of offences connected with drunkenness, especially on Sundays?—I think that they have in a certain degree diminished for several years past.

634. Do you think that they are in course of progressive diminution?—I think so, in a slight ratio.

635. Do you find particularly, that the number of cases of that kind which come before you on Mondays have decreased?—There has been some diminution latterly, speaking now of Lambeth. I was for three years at the Thames Police Court, and I was afterwards at the Southwark Police Court for two years and a half. I cannot say what the facts may be at the other two courts, but in Lambeth there has been some sensible diminution.

636. Has there also been a diminution in the number of cases on the other days of the week?—There has been some little decrease; there is a great fluctuation from time to time, but still I think there has been a general diminution.

637. Do you think that there has been a diminution of the like cases since the passing of Sir George Grey's Act?—Yes; I think that that Act has had some effect.

638. You think that the shutting of public-houses at one in the morning has kept out a class who are more likely to create disorder?—I think it has placed them under a certain restraint, and has in some degree diminished the number of charges of, and connected with, drunkenness.

639. Do you think that the hours during which liquors may be sold could be restricted, in part or in whole, as proposed by this Bill, with beneficial effect as regards the diminution of drunkenness?—I think that if the hours were restricted in the manner proposed, it possibly

623. Are there any cases brought before you of public-houses being open on the Sunday during prohibited hours?—Sometimes.

624. But I mean more especially in that part of the town?—I have not observed that they are more in that part of the town than in any other.

625. Then, in point of fact, with regard to the Sunday trading question, that has nothing whatever to do with the public-houses?—I think not.

626. And probably you would say that it is not exactly relevant to the inquiry with respect to this Bill to mix up the two questions together, namely, the sale of meat and vegetables, and so forth, on the Sunday, and the public-house question?—I do not think that they are at all connected.

627. Have you looked at this Bill?—No; I have not had a copy of it.

T. B.
Burcham,

might diminish the number of cases of drunkenness; but at the same time I think there might be compensating evils which would make the adoption of those restrictions undesirable.

640. What sort of evils do you think might flow from increased restriction?—In the first place, I think that it would be placing an undue restraint upon a particular branch of trade in which there is a large capital invested. Secondly, I think it would be subjecting a very large class of the Queen's subjects to great inconvenience in obtaining meals, and in obtaining refreshment. Thirdly, I think it might have the effect of considerably increasing the consumption of drink out of doors, and possibly lead to evasions of the law, which might be attended with mischief.

641. Are you generally conversant with the habits of the kind of people who live in your district?—I see them in the last resort.

642. But do you think that your general acquaintance with them enables you to express an opinion upon their habits, and upon how those habits might be affected?—Yes, to a certain extent; probably as much as most persons not immediately of their own class.

643. Which class should you say would be most inconvenienced by closing the public-houses all day, excepting the 3½ hours named in the Bill?—I think a large class of workmen, and possibly small tradesmen, journeymen, and also a number of persons not being in any mechanical trade, a smaller class of clerks and persons having no regular home, or possibly nothing further than the accommodation of a bedroom, and perhaps some others might be suggested.

644. The hours would be restricted during which they could possibly take their meals, accompanied with drink?—The hours would be entirely prohibited, if the Bill is granted in its full extent, during which they can consume anything on the premises, and they would be considerably diminished during which they could obtain anything out of the house. In the Bill I observe a reservation of the right of taking a meal at certain times, and drinking liquor served with it during that meal. There is that saving, but I think it might be very difficult in practice to work it, and to know what was taking a meal under those circumstances, and what was a supplying of liquor during the meal.

645. You think there might always be a legal question as to whether a man had eaten enough to constitute a meal?—That might be one question which might arise, and it might be excessively difficult to determine what was a meal.

646. Do you think that the lower middle classes, for instance the tradesmen of the district, would feel inconvenienced in not being able to procure their liquor except at certain hours of the day?—I think they would be subject to inconvenience in a certain degree.

647. You spoke also, did you not, of evils in the way of evasion of the law which might arise?—I heard the question put by an honourable Member to one of my colleagues just now as to the possibility of people confederating together with a view of supplying themselves.

648. Do you think that the evils in the way of evasion of the law and illicit sale would be likely to occur?—Yes; there would be an attempt, at any rate, and possibly for a time with success.

649. Do you think that private drinking would be likely to follow?—I think there would be some increase of it, seeing that drinking in public-houses would be restricted.

650. Is it your opinion, as was asked by an honourable Member just now of your colleague, that more disorder would be likely to occur from drinking in private houses than now takes place under the eye of the landlord?—I think cases of disorder would arise, as they now arise, from private drinking; there is a great deal of private drinking carried on now, and a number of cases which come before me as a magistrate are, in consequence of drunkenness which has taken place in private dwelling-houses, and I think that those cases would probably increase.

651. Is it your opinion that we could hope to produce a diminution of drunkenness altogether, and of the evils arising out of it, to an extent commensurate with any of the inconveniences which you have referred to?—I think not.

652. Do you think that there would be a practical difficulty in carrying out a law of greater stringency owing to the unpopularity of it?—That depends upon the degree of vigour which might be exercised; it might be carried out, but it is quite certain that it would be opposed.

653. Of course I assume that the Government has power to enforce any law that Parliament enacts, but do you think that practically it would be impossible, on account of the unpopularity which it would cause?—I think it would be extremely unpopular; it might be followed by agitation, and eventually by modification, like other measures.

654. Mr. Bright.] Would you confine that observation to your own district of London or to London generally, or would you extend it to the country, or have you any means of knowing as to any other part of the country than that in which you perform your own duties as magistrate?—Latterly I have had no opportunity of judging as to the country, but I was 10 years in practice as a barrister in Staffordshire.

655. But with regard to the probability of agitation, and so forth, do you wish to confine that observation to London, or would you extend it to the country?—I was applying myself directly to my own district, namely, the metropolitan district.

656. And with regard to the infraction of the law, I presume if all the laws were strictly obeyed your office would not be required?—

Yes, it would for taking declarations, oaths, affidavits, and a variety of other purposes.

657. But in the punishment of offences you would not be required if all laws were strictly obeyed?—If no offences were committed the people would not require to be punished.

658. Then if this law were in some cases to be infringed or violated, it would be very much in the same condition as other laws that are passed by Parliament?—Yes, with this difference namely, that oppressive laws frequently are laxly administered.

659. Mr. Roebuck.] I presume that you believe that restriction has hitherto been beneficial in keeping down drunkenness?—Yes, I do believe so.

660. And that the law as it now stands is a beneficial law?—I think per se, it is to a certain extent beneficial with reference to its immediate and direct object.

661. From your experience as a magistrate do you believe that that law could be beneficially improved by increasing the restrictions?—That is a question of degree. It would be exceedingly difficult to justify an opinion pledging oneself to a particular number of hours; I think that a decrease in the number of hours during which parties could obtain liquor would possibly tend to preserve sobriety to a certain extent, but I have said, on the other hand, that the question is whether there might not be inconveniences which would preponderate.

662. You put it thus, that there would be a certain degree of benefit resulting from a change in the law by an increase of restriction, but that that would be balanced—I do not say over-balanced, but balanced—to a certain extent by the mischiefs resulting from the very restriction?—Yes.

663. The evil that exists at present is confined, is it not, to a few persons; that is to say, a small proportion of the whole population get drunk?—It is so, I believe.

664. But the mischiefs that you speak of, resulting from further restriction, would extend to a very large number of the population?—They would extend to other sections of the community.

665. For example, we will take the working-class; generally speaking, I fear that their houses are not such, at least in a very large number of cases, that they would willingly be confined to them rather than be allowed to go to a public-house to obtain their drink?—I think that their houses are of such a nature that they would be unwilling to be confined to them.

666. The proposed Bill would do this: it would say to a working man, who had not that comfortable house in which he would like to drink his liquor, that he should not be able to drink anything like liquor on Sunday, except during three hours, in that better room which a public-house would afford?—It would say to him that he should not drink his liquor, except during three hours, in a better room than in his own habitation; in fact, it says to him that he shall not drink it at all in a better room; that he is not to be able to drink it in a public-house in London the whole of Sunday unless he gets a meal; and in the country not at all. It also says further, that he shall not take liquor out of the public-house except during three hours.

667. Turning your attention to those three hours during which he is to be allowed to get drink drink out of the public-house, do you think it likely that this might arise, that two or three people might combine together and buy a large quantity of drink and take it out of the public-house and drink it in some room or other which was open to them, and thereby contribute to an increase of drunkenness?—I have no doubt that that might be done; it probably would be done, and would be followed by drunkenness in many instances.

668. Confining yourself to your own district, have you any idea of the relative proportion that the workmen whom you mentioned, small traders and small clerks, bear to the whole population?—No; I cannot tell that exactly.

669. I presume that they form a very large proportion?—Very large, no doubt.

670. And therefore, what affects them, though the evil itself may be small, yet affecting a great number of persons, in the aggregate becomes a large evil?—Yes.

671. And, therefore, the mischief that would result from this Bill is a large mischief, and the benefit a small one?—I think that a great deal of public inconvenience would be incurred to bring about a limited degree of good.

672. Mr. Horsfall.] You stated, did you not, that drunkenness had considerably diminished latterly?—Yes, it has diminished.

673. And on Sunday has there been a diminution?—There has been a diminution also on Sunday; but I was going to say that the cases that come before the magistrates on Monday morning are not all attributable to the Sunday; some of them are due to the Saturday night.

674. Have you any returns that will show the Committee the extent of the diminution in the number of cases of drunkenness?—I have none, nor do I think that any could be prepared in my district; I know the number of summonses which are issued in my district of Lambeth for illegal Sunday trading in liquor, but I cannot say more.

675. You stated, did you not, that in your opinion a further limitation of the hours might possibly further diminish the drunkenness?—I think it would; it might certainly do so.

676. And that you would consider a very great advantage?—I should consider that in itself an advantage. I say that upon the whole I think there would be a diminution. Even allowing that there might be private drinking, drinking by associated bodies, and so on, on the whole I think that probably there would be a diminution.

677. And there would be other advantages, would there not, such as these: for instance, a number of persons who are employed in public-houses would have a further rest on Sunday if the number of hours of their attendance were diminished?—Yes, they would be released from working at that time.

678. You stated that a Bill containing those further restrictions would probably be opposed; by whom do you imagine that it would be opposed?—I think by what has been described as the lower middle classes, and the working classes generally.

679. There are certain portions of this Bill which apply only to the country, are there not?—That is so.

680. Your experience having been exclusively in London, I presume you would not offer an opinion as to the working of this Bill in the country?—I had considerable business at the Staffordshire sessions; that is a county in which there are several industries, and I saw a great part of the criminal population there; and I did not see a very great difference between the two classes in that respect. The parties given to drunkenness and outrage are much the same in the county of Middlesex as in the county of Stafford.

681. What position did you hold in Staffordshire?—I was a barrister, having a considerable practice at the Staffordshire sessions and assizes.

682. But that would not give you an opportunity, would it, of judging as regards drunkenness?—I had a great number of cases of outrage arising out of drunkenness; I could observe the periods when money was rife among a certain class of men, and when drunkenness was the consequence, and when various outrages were committed as a consequence of that; of course not to the same extent that I have now; I was not in an official position then.

683. Colonel Fane.] I think I understood you to say, that if liquor is allowed to be sold on Sunday at all, you are of opinion that to a certain extent the supervision of the landlord is desirable, as the law makes him more or less responsible and amenable to other people?—I should under any circumstances bind over the landlord to keep order in his house; in fact, the landlord of a public-house is so now, but not the landlord of a beer-house to the same extent.

684. So that, on the whole, you would think it more desirable that, if a man is to be allowed to drink on Sunday, he should do it in a public-house, in preference to taking liquor out of the house in a large quantity, and drinking it in his own private house?—One would like that that particular supervision, such as it is, should exist.

685. Mr. John Abel Smith.] I think I understood you to say, in answer to the honourable Member for Sheffield, that there are a large proportion of the persons who inhabit your district who are connected with what might be called the working classes?—There are a good many, not so many as there were in Southwark or in the Thames district, where I was before.

686. And with their families they make up a large proportion of the whole of the population?—Yes, they do.

687. Therefore, anything that affects their comfort or well-being would affect a majority of the population?—Yes.

688. Do you doubt that a large number of those persons every Sunday consume a portion of their weekly wages in drink?—They do no doubt consume some portion of it on the Sunday.

689. So far as they do so, they interfere, do they not, with the comfort of their families; and, therefore, with the comfort of a large majority of the population?—Not if they take drink in moderation.

690. Do they not sit and drink in public-houses?—Some of them do; but in my district it is not so to any appreciable extent.

691. Where does your district begin?—It runs from a point a little above Vauxhall Bridge down the river as far as to Waterloo Bridge, then along the Waterloo, London, and New and Old Kent-roads, as far as Hatcham, round Peckham, Camberwell and Brixton, and back again to the river Thames.

692. Is the New Cut in your district?—No; that is in the Southwark district.

693. What is the population in the area of your district?—I cannot tell that exactly; but it is a very large population.

694. You think that drunkenness has diminished during the last few years?—There has been a diminution.

695. Can you fix any period for that diminution?—No, I cannot; I have only been a little more than a year in Lambeth. I say that latterly, during the last three or four months, I have seen that drunkenness has decreased.

696. Did you hear the evidence given by Mr. Burcham?—The latter portion of it.

697. He expressed a very strong opinion that there has been a great improvement in the morals and habits of the people within the last two and a half or three years; do you confirm that?—I think that there has been some improvement; I should hesitate to say a great improvement.

698. Has there been a marked improvement?—There has been a perceptible improvement.

699. To what do you attribute that improvement?—Partly possibly to the effect of the restrictive laws which have been in force; but more to the progress of general intelligence, education, and well-being. There has been a general progress, subject to fluctuation.

700. You do not think that any considerable amount of the wages earned in your district are spent on Saturday night and Sunday in intoxicating liquors?—I should think not a considerable portion; possibly a considerable portion of the wages of individuals might be so consumed, but, taking the whole population, I should say that it was not a very considerable portion.

701. Have you any means of forming a judgment as to the feeling of the working classes in your district with regard to the laws restrictive of drink?—Incidentally I may have observed some feeling of opposition, but I should not profess to express their opinions with any confidence.

702. You do not think it would be a true picture of the bettermost working men of your district to state that they were in favour of further restriction?—Taking the whole class, I should think not.

703. Do you think that any large number of them are in favour of it?—I think there are some of them who are in favour of it.

704. Do you think that, up to the point to which legislation has now gone, restriction has been attended with benefit?—Yes, it has been attended with benefit with a view to this particular object,—the diminution of excessive drinking.

705. But you do not approve of its going further?—I think not, on the whole.

706. Do you not think that extending it would diminish drinking?—It might to a certain extent diminish excessive drinking, but I think it would be an interference with the rights of individuals, and would be attended by compensating mischief in other respects, so as to render it undesirable.

707. Do you think that there is any other limit to the principle of the restrictions which you admit, as I understand you, to be in their nature beneficial to a certain extent, and in one particular direction, than the limit of the inconvenience produced being too great to be borne?—I think there are other questions that enter into a consideration of the question which you have put to me; I think that the question of intolerable inconvenience is a very material one, but I also think that people would look upon it, to use the jargon of the day, as class legislation.

708. If the majority of working men were in favour of restriction, that would alter your view as to its advisability, would it not?—Before I could pledge myself to that opinion, I should examine the other sections of the population, to see to what extent they represent the general view.

709. Do you know anything extensively of the habits of country towns and other places besides London?—To a certain extent I do.

710. Do you know how far in other places the habit of holiday making on Sunday is carried on, as compared with London?—It exists and increases now, but not to the same extent as in London.

711. What places do you allude to?—I know Stafford, Bishop Stortford, Hereford, Gloucester, Worcester, Shrewsbury, in fact, a great number of country towns.

712. Do you think that the habit of Sunday holiday making is increasing in those towns?—I do.

713. Do you know at all the habits of those towns as to public-houses, are they largely frequented on Sundays?—I think they are; but from what I have seen, I think they adhere to the law more closely than is done in London upon the whole, that is to say, with regard to not opening during the prohibited hours.

714. Do I rightly collect your opinion generally to be this, that although you approve of class legislation as to restriction, and although you think that further restriction would tend to limit and restrain drunkenness, and although you think that the consumption of the wages of the working classes is carried on largely in the purchase of drink on Sunday, you still are against any further restriction?—Although I hold opinions substantially in accordance with those which you have just now put (perhaps not identically the same—I should express them with some qualification), nevertheless, holding those opinions, I still think that it is undesirable that further restriction should be imposed.

715. Mr. Baines.] Were you a police magistrate at the same time as Mr. A'Beckett?—I was not.

716. I think you were in the room, and heard the opinion which I read from a letter from Mr. A'Beckett to the "Times," in the course of the examination of Mr. Burcham?—Yes, I heard it; he had observed during a short period, and made a return.

717. He had observed during 37 Mondays that the number of cases of drunkenness brought up upon Monday morning, which had taken place on the Sunday, diminished to two. May I ask whether you have any opinion or any knowledge as to the number of cases that used before that to occur in that same office of Southwark?—I cannot say that I have.

718. If you saw it stated in a London paper of that date that the number taken into custody on Sunday amounted before that time to between 30 and 40 persons on Monday morning who had been taken up on Sunday, would you think it at all probable that there had been such a number before before the year 1864, when Mr. Wilson Patten's Act was passed?—It is possible; but I should be slightly surprised at the number.

719. If the number was reduced to an average in 37 weeks of less than two, is not that an improvement of public morals upon a very broad scale?—Yes, no doubt of it.

720. You would therefore attach weight to the fact, and weight to the authority of the man who gave that fact?—I should look at the authority of the man, and being satisfied with that, I should attach weight to the fact.

721. May I ask how long you have been in Lambeth?—Only a little more than a year.

722. So that you were not aware that open-air meetings were held on the subject of temperance, and especially of Sunday closing in Kennington-park in the years 1863, 1864, and 1865?—No, I was not.

723. Mr. Bright.] The honourable Member for Sheffield asked you about the hardships by closing the public-houses for a longer time on Sunday, in preventing working men from going from their uncomfortable homes to comfortable, and, I presume, well lighted and well warmed rooms, where they could take their liquor; you appear to think that a hardship?—I think in many cases where a man wanted legitimately to consume his drink in a comfortable room, and leave a very uncomfortable one, it would be a benefit to him to have that opportunity.

724. I presume, looking at the general comfort of everybody, you would see with satisfaction that his wife and family went with him?—A discreet wife and well conducted children might occasionally accompany him with advantage; and she does so very frequently.

725. Do you think it a fair argument against restriction that those houses should offer special inducements or temptations for men to leave their own homes and their families during Sunday?—No, I do not think it would be a fair argument that they should offer special inducements and meretricious attractions to take a man from a comfortable home.

726. The object of going to those houses must be for the liquor that they sell; is not that so?—I do not think wholly so; sometimes people eat and drink there, and I think that they seek a sort of society; it is the poor man's club occasionally.

727. In the opinions which you have expressed with regard to the population of your district, you would give them, I presume, with great hesitation, seeing that you have been amongst that population so short a time?—Yes; and I expressed myself with some qualification.

728. And perhaps as in the course of your professional duties you come most in contact with the worst specimens, that would also cast a little shadow of doubt upon your opinions with regard to the population in general; for but a very small minority must come before you?—I can hardly say that. In the dock, as criminals, there come before me a large and a varying class of persons; but there are a great number of others who come before me as prosecutors and witnesses, and for a variety of other purposes, which might enable me to speak about their opinions.

sumption of those intoxicating drinks, would not that wonderfully diminish the labours of your office; I mean in the punishment of crime. Do not you believe it to be the unanimous opinion of all the magistrates of London that a very large proportion, probably the majority, of cases that come before them of violence, and poverty, and all that makes the heart sick, arise from drunkenness, or are connected with drink?—I believe, and I agree with the opinion, that a large proportion is attributable to drink.

730. Having admitted that, as far as it has gone, the result has been good, would you therefore say that Parliament should try no further experiment whatever, in the hope of relieving a certain unfortunate class of persons from temptation which they appear scarcely able to resist; but that having arrived at this point, you would not go a bit further?—I am hardly prepared to say that; but I think it is difficult to see in what way they could beneficially and advantageously move, and where they are to stop, and with what class they are to stop.

731. Was your opinion ever asked before a Committee before, or did you ever give it before any of the existing restrictions were adopted?—Never.

732. And therefore finding yourself at a certain point you are not disposed to go back and you are not disposed to go forward; you think you are at exactly the right point?—I merely say that I find no sufficient inducement to move. The preamble of this Bill says that the restrictions imposed by a certain Act have been found to work beneficially, and that is an Act repealing a previous Act, and that Act increases the number of hours instead of diminishing them; it is a relaxation instead of a restriction.

733. In the years 1854 and 1855, at the time of the passing of those Acts, did you express any opinion upon the legislation of that period?—No, I held a different appointment at that time.

734. Your attention was not called to that subject?—No.

735. Do you find that the law is more broken at present by beer-house keepers than by licensed victuallers?—I do very much.

736. Are they more numerous in your district than public-house keepers?—I think that they are more numerous.

737. Would you recommend their being put under the same restrictions as to licensing?—Yes, I would have them put under the same restrictions as to licensing.

738. Do you consider that the laws as they at present exist intending to restrict both licensed victuallers and beer-house keepers, and intending to promote good order and sobriety, are sufficiently rigidly enforced?—Yes, upon the whole, I think that they are rigidly enforced.

739. With equal fairness upon licensed victuallers and upon beer-shop keepers, do you think?—I think so; I have had no reason to doubt it from my experience.

740. Mr. Locke.] You say that you have looked at this Bill; have you carefully examined the first clause in it?—I have read the first clause with some attention.

741. What, in your opinion, would be the effect of that first clause in the country, as, for instance, as a traveller is concerned, what would happen to him; could he under that first clause obtain any refreshment whatever during the whole of the day?

day?—A traveller is excepted; he could, I take it.

742. Do you think he is excepted as far as the country is concerned if you look at the proviso?—It would be left, as it was under the former law; the restrictions are introduced with the limitation expressed.

743. The words, as regards the country, are, "As respects the sale of the liquors aforesaid when sold for consumption on the premises to the whole of the said day, and subject to the following proviso." That would be the enactment. Then the following proviso makes an exception with respect to the metropolis, and only as to the metropolis?—Yes; but that is only a special proviso introducing a new feature, namely, a man taking a meal. The existing general law, I think, introduces an exception in favour of a traveller elsewhere.

744. You see that this clause says, that in the country, "As respects the sale of the liquors aforesaid when sold for consumption on the premises," it shall not be so sold during "the whole of the said day, and subject to the following proviso." Then you have the following proviso not merely mentioning the lodger, but it says, excepting "a person lodging in his house, or to travellers;" therefore the word "travellers" being mentioned, do not you think it would raise a question as to whether or not travellers were precluded from having those privileges in the country?—I think not. According to the existing law, which in this respect would not be touched by this Act, it precludes the keepers of public-houses from selling provisions or drink at certain hours on the Sunday, except to travellers. There is in this Act an exception in favour of travellers. This Act introduces general restrictions, but it introduces a special proviso applicable not to the rural districts, but to the metropolis alone. It contains a new feature, namely, a man taking a meal, and being supplied with drink during the meal. A bonâ fide traveller stands upon his former footing.

745. A bonâ fide traveller is mentioned with regard to the metropolis, and left out with regard to country?—The bonâ fide traveller is repeated here, but his status is not altered. As to the country, he claims exemption under other Acts.

746. Would not that raise a question?—Yes, I have no doubt it would raise a question, but I apprehend that it might be got over.

747. It might, or it might not; that depends, does it not, upon the court to which you go?—In some measure; but this Act does not incorporate penalties.

748. With regard to Mr. Wilson Patten's Act in 1854, it has been suggested that it was repealed the following year in a ludicrously precipitate manner; and the honourable Member for Leeds has alluded to Mr. A'Beckett, for whom we have very great respect. In Mr. A'Beckett's evidence, which was given before the Committee in 1855, he was asked at Question 1304, "Do you think the Act generally has worked well, and has tended to decrease drunkenness; and do you think that it acts for the convenience or otherwise of the public?" he replied, "I think it has, for the present, diminished drunkenness; but I do not think it acts for the convenience of the public." What is your opinion with respect to this Bill. Do you think it would act for the convenience of the public?—I do not.

749. Then you agree with Mr. A'Beckett?—Yes; in that part of his opinion and also in the opinion that it has diminished drunkenness.

750. Another question that was asked, is, "You say you think this Act operates inconveniently to the public; does it do so to the working classes in particular;" and his answer was: "I do not think it does to the working classes in particular; I have heard a great many of the middle classes complain a good deal of it." Is it your opinion that this Bill if it were passed would work in a very inconvenient manner for the middle classes, leaving out the lowest?—Yes, I do.

751. With regard to those particular hours during which beer, spirits, and so forth, could be obtained to be drunk off the premises, do you think that the hours which are allowed here, namely, 3½ hours during the day would be sufficient for those classes of persons?—I do not think they would.

752. If they wanted to have beer with their meals they might not wish to have that meal between one and half-past two?—There would be a long period during which they could not have it.

753. Then again from half-past two down to eight o'clock, a great many meals are eaten between those hours, are they not, by different people of the middle classes, the working classes, and all sorts of classes?—There are some, no doubt.

754. Beer does not improve from keeping in the air when it is drawn out of the cask, does it; it ought to be drunk fresh if anybody intends to enjoy it?—I should think so.

755. Would they be able to enjoy their beer and to have it fresh during their meals in their own houses if this Bill were passed?—I suppose it would be rather vapid.

756. You have travelled of course like all of us?—Yes.

757. I believe in every other country in Europe public-houses are very open indeed?—Yes, I think they are.

758. They do not shut them at all on Sunday, do they?—I will not go so far as to say that. I think there are some places in which they are closed.

759. Take France for example; are the people more drunken there than they are here?—Less so.

760. Are the people more drunken in Germany than they are here?—They are not so sober as the French. I speak from general observation.

761. What is your general observation; in those places, are the people addicted to drink or not?—I think the Germans are soberer than the English, and the French are soberer than the Germans.

762. Do you think that those restrictions suggested by the Bill would prevent drunkenness?—They would diminish it, but not totally prevent it.

763. Supposing a man did not drink in a public-house, and was fond of drink, do not you think that he would get it somewhere else?—They would not diminish it in a case of that particular nature, but upon the whole I think they would.

764. To what extent?—I cannot determine that.

765. Do you think that if we were to go a step step further, and adopted the Maine Liquor Law, that would diminish it still further?—I have not considered that.

766. Do you think this, that supposing persons were not able to get their drink at a public-house they would not find some other place to get it?—I think they would get drink somehow, but not to the same extent that they can now get it.

767. You have been asked about a man going by himself to a public-house, and leaving his wife and children; have you any experience of the dwellings of the working classes in London?—Not much.

768. Have you seen any of them?—I have seen them occasionally, and I have had their lodging-houses described to me frequently.

769. They are not altogether convenient, are they?—Certainly not.

770. There are some places in the suburbs, public-houses, and so forth, where persons can go with their wives and families and have refreshments, are there not?—Yes.

771. Do you think that, with respect to those persons, this Bill would be inconvenient, locking them out all those hours?—Yes, I do.

772. Therefore, setting aside the case which is generally the one only looked at by persons, that is to say, men standing up at the bar of a public-house and getting drunk, are there not a great many other persons, a respectable class of people, who go into a public-house with a different object and different views, namely, not merely to drink, but likewise to eat?—Yes.

773. And a man might go in just for the sake, if he was thirsty, of taking a pint of beer, without any view to getting drunk?—Yes.

774. Or a glass of wine, or anything else?—Yes.

775. With regard to that sober class of persons who do not take anything to excess, would not they be greatly inconvenienced if such a Bill as this were to pass?—I think so.

776. Is it your opinion then that, for the sake of preventing excess on the part of a comparatively small number of persons, a vast number of the public would be inconvenienced by this Bill?—I think that to produce a partial good considerable inconvenience would be produced.

777. Do you think it would be submitted to quietly; I do not mean by drunken people, but by the bulk of the people who do derive very great convenience from being able to supply themselves with liquids from public-houses on the Sunday?—I think it would call forth a great deal of discontent and eventually opposition.

778. Have you had any cases before you as to persons coming back by excursion trains on Sunday night to the railway stations?—Yes, I have had that under my observation with different views.

779. At the present time a public-house shuts up at 11, the new proposition is that it shall close at 10; do you see that there would be any inconvenience in that?—Yes, I do.

780. At what time do those excursion trains usually return?—Many of them after that, and a good many of them between 10 and 11, I should think.

781. Therefore, the people would be entirely deprived of any opportunity of getting any refreshment of that sort?—Yes.

782. Do you think that the hour of 11, as it at present is, is much preferable to the hour of 10?—I do with that particular object. I would rather that it should stand at 11.

783. For instance, persons coming up by those trains and coming in about 10, want their supper, do they not, at home very frequently, and they must get their beer or whatever they want, and if it is draught beer it must be got at the public-house; would not the closing at 10 be inconvenient to them?—Yes.

784. Do you know what the regulation is with regard to refreshment rooms at a railway station; are they obliged to be closed at a certain hour?—There are some special provisions in favour of parties coming to stations and departing from them by railway trains, but I am inclined to think still that the prohibition on Sundays applies to them similarly to other places.

785. The refreshment room at a railway station is licensed by the magistrates for the sale of wine, beer, and spirits, in precisely the same way, is it not, as a public-house?—Yes.

786. It is a magistrate's license and not a refreshment room license?—Yes, it is not a mere excise license.

787. A refreshment room license would not entitle them to sell spirits; therefore it is absolutely necessary, is it not, that they should have a magistrate's license, a victualler's license, in point of fact, to sell spirits at a refreshment room on the station?—Yes.

788. Then if this Bill were to pass, those refreshment rooms would have to be closed at 10 o'clock?—They probably would, but the question about a traveller and a man taking a meal still turns up; I do not see what is to prevent a man requiring refreshment demanding it at two o'clock in the morning.

789. There would then be a good many decisions upon the traveller question again, if that were the case?—Yes, there would, and upon the meal consumer also.

790. The meal consumer would be a very great difficulty, would not he?—I think so; I think it would be very difficult to know.

791. Mr. Bright.] There are a good many difficulties in legal matters everywhere, are there not?—There are.

792. It is not final against a Bill, but there are difficulties connected with it, I presume?—No, it is not.

793. Mr. Locke.] Are you aware that the question as to the traveller at the present time is pretty nearly settled from the decision in the Court of Common Pleas by Chief Justice Erle?—Yes, I know the nature of that decision, and the question has been tolerably defined, no doubt.

794. The judges went on relaxing it from time to time, and they established it pretty much, did they not, that a traveller was almost anybody who chose to take a walk of a Sunday, either for business or pleasure?—Yes, I believe so.

795. It is the law now, that a man taking a walk on Sunday either for business or pleasure, is a traveller, but the decisions were entirely different in the first instance?—Yes; but I think he must go out of town still.

796. It was a long time before they arrived at that decision, was not it; a great many cases had to be argued and got rid of?—Yes.

797. There was another question, was there not, which was a very moot one, namely, upon whom the onus probandi lay; whether it was for the objector to prove that the person was not a traveller, or whether it was upon the traveller himself to prove that he was such, and at last it was decided that the onus probandi lay upon the man who made the objection?—Yes, it turned upon a general question of legal statement, namely, whether the proviso occurred in the same clause.

798. It was decided both ways, was it not?—Yes.

799. You can hardly imagine what the decision would be upon the meal; but you have no doubt that there would be a great deal of difficulty about that?—Yes.

800. Mr. Yorke.] Taking the point of view of the honourable Member for Birmingham, that this Bill would be in the nature of an experiment, would you consider that this would be a great step as compared with the previous Acts of restriction, or a small step?—I think a considerable one; I think it would be a very long step.

801. So that it would be an experiment upon a very grand scale, in fact?—I think that it would.

802. Would it not amount practically, in the country at any rate, not to restriction, but to prohibition of the use of public-houses on Sunday?—I think it would, except in the case of travellers.

803. It would amount practically to a prohibition of the use of a public-house to persons living in the immediate neighbourhood on Sundays?—It would amount to a prohibition to them with regard to the consumption of liquor in a public-house for the whole of Sunday, and to a very great restraint upon them in respect to obtaining liquor during the rest of the day.

804. So that, in fact, this would be an experiment out of all proportion to any that had preceded it?—It is an extensive change.

805. Does not it practically amount to an entire prohibition to persons living in the neighbourhood of any use of a public-house as a place where they can sit and drink?—Yes.

806. Therefore, practically, as far as they are concerned, it is not a restriction on their use of a public-house for those purposes, but a prohibition?—It is a prohibition, except in the case of travellers; and having regard also to the fact that the proviso here applies only to the metropolis, I think a traveller is excepted under the general law; but to residents and so on it is a total prohibition.

807. Then you would regard it as a very different measure from a mere restriction?—Yes.

808. As differing in kind rather than in degree?—I should look upon it as a difference of principle.

809. Mr. John Abel Smith.] Did I understand you correctly as disapproving of a law which would prevent the working men taking their wives and children to a public-house?—I should disapprove of a law which would prohibit them from doing that. I think it would be an interference with the liberty of the subject, which I do not think desirable.

810. Are you aware that a good many public-houses now do close on Sunday?—Yes.

811. Do you know the habits of the public-houses at all with regard to the way in which they supply drink to their customers who send jugs for it when they are closed?—I have not had those examples before me. I have had examples of course of illegal trading by those houses during the time they ought to be closed, taking liquor out the public way or through an internal communication with other premises, but I have not had cases of complaint as to their legitimate business before me.

812. You do not know persons who carry on that business, and whether they have found any inconvenience from it or not?—I dare say there are some, but they have not come under my observation.

CUTHBERT EDMOND ELLISON, Esq., called in; and Examined.

C. E.
Ellison, Esq.

813. Chairman.] You are Magistrate of the Worship-street Police Court?—I am.

814. Will you inform the Committee what part of the metropolis that office includes?—It is in the north-east of London; the area touches the City upon the south, the Thames district upon the east; it goes up to Old Ford and Bow, which are the extreme eastern or north-eastern points; it takes in Bethnal Green, the greater part of Whitechapel, Spitalfields, and what used to be the suburban district of Hackney, Holloway, Dalston, Kingsland, up to Stamford Hill, and then down again to Finsbury-square, towards the City.

815. It includes a large population, and in many parts a very poor population, does it not?—It does; a very poor population indeed.

816. Do you know the population?—No; I should be sorry to pledge myself to any statement as to that; I should say that it is about 400,000, speaking roughly.

817. Have you before you a great number of charges in the course of the week arising out of drunkenness?—Yes, a great proportion.

818. A great proportion of the cases coming before you are connected with drunkenness?—Yes.

819. Of those cases, does a larger proportion come before you on Monday mornings than on other days in the week?—Yes; then again I must qualify that answer; a great deal depends upon the state of work, and upon the wages that are earned. If there is a great deal of work the workmen are able to make a holiday of Monday, and then it is possible that there may be a great many cases on Tuesday morning, and not so great a number on other days in the week.

820. How many years have you been a magistrate there?—Four years.

821. You can speak generally, I suppose, always allow for special circumstances, and say whether the number of cases coming to the court connected with drunkenness on Monday morning is equal to those on any two days in the week?—Not always; I should hardly put it in that way; I should say that there are more on Monday morning, sometimes considerably more, but I should not say as a general statement that they were equal to the cases on two days.

822. Are you able to say whether the number of cases arising from offences committed on Sunday are as numerous as those on other days in the week?—I should think that they are as numerous.

823. Do

C. E.
 Ellison, Esq.
 1868.

823. Do you think that they are as numerous as those on Saturday?—I should think they were, but I am not able really to give chapter and verse as regards that.

824. Are you acquainted with the general habits of the people in that part of London with which you are connected; have you made anything like a study of it?—I am acquainted, to some extent, with the habits of the classes who are in the habit of coming before me, or of attending the police court.

825. With regard to the classes who bring themselves under the notice of the police particularly, do you think that they get drunk as much on Sunday as on Saturday; do you think that their practice is to drink most on Saturday or on Sunday?—As a whole class, I should say that they did so, as much on a Sunday as on a Saturday.

826. And that in spite of the difficulty that they are not able to buy liquor except at certain hours?—Those who are inclined to get drunk take care to buy liquor during the hours that they can do so.

827. Have you reason to think that that is extensively done?—Yes.

828. Mr. Bright.] Do you mean that this drunkenness is not in public-houses, but in private houses, drink being fetched from the public-houses?—No; that they go to the public-houses during the time that the law allows public-houses to be open.

829. Chairman.] And do they take it away with them when they are obliged to leave the house?—Sometimes; I do not know much about that.

830. Do you think, then, that the closing of public-houses for a greater number of hours on Sunday would tend to diminish drunkenness?—I think it would diminish the number of cases that come before me on Monday morning to some extent, upon the assumption that there was no illicit way of drinking resorted to, or no way of evading the law, or of laying in drink on a Saturday night.

831. Of course they could always lay in drink if they had the money to buy it, but do you think that restricting the number of hours would place such difficulty in the way of getting drink that it would tend to diminish drunkenness?—Now they are able to go to a public-house, and to remain there for a sufficient time to enable them who wish to get drunk to do so, and I think that if those who were determined to get drunk found that obstacles were placed in their way, and that it was impossible for them to do so under the existing law, they would probably continue to lay in drink (at all events it is necessary to look at the possibility of that), and that they would continue to drink at home.

832. Do you think that the streets in that part of the town are quieter during the hours that the public-houses are closed than when they are open?—I have very little experience of that part of the town actually on the Sunday.

833. Do you think that the closing of public-houses for a greater number of hours would cause inconvenience to the respectable classes of the community, and not merely to those who wish to drink to excess?—Yes, I think so; I think it would cause a certain amount of inconvenience to those who do not drink to excess.

834. Do you think that the hours proposed by this Bill, an hour and a half in the middle of the day and two hours in the evening, would not be sufficient to meet the common necessities of the inhabitants?—I think many of them would have to change their ways of life to a certain extent.

835. Mr. John Abel Smith.] Why should they do so?—Because I think that people are in the habit of taking their meals now at a time when it would be impossible for them to get beer if this law were carried into operation.

836. Why should not they have it in their houses?—It would be impossible; it would get flat.

837. Mr. Bright.] When you say that it would produce great inconvenience, do you mean to the great bulk of the people, or only certain classes who dine at fashionable hours?—The question was, as to the middle classes.

838. Chairman.] I alluded to classes other than those who drink to excess—to the respectable portion of the inhabitants, whether they be of the upper, middle, or lower; those who resort to public-houses for their liquor supply, say of beer; I ask whether you think that such people would be much inconvenienced by their only being allowed to obtain that supply for an hour and a half in the middle of the day, and two hours in the evening?—Yes, I think they might be.

839. Should you think that such restrictions, and inconveniences, would be less than the good that might be obtained by diminishing the drunkenness, as you say might be the case if there was much greater difficulty in procuring liquor?—I think that is a difficult question to answer except in a very general way; I think that proposed restrictions are imprudent.

840. Mr. Bright.] Would you say that all restrictions were so?—I would not say all restrictions, because there are some which are necessary, and which are working well.

841. Chairman.] Do you think that such restrictions as are proposed by this Bill would be undue on account of the inconvenience that they would cause to the bulk of the inhabitants when compared with the possible good that might come from them?—I should be inclined to say yes, but still I think, as I say, that depends upon the general question.

842. Do you think that some further restrictions, perhaps not going as far as those in the Bill, might be attended with advantage, supposing the hours during which public-houses might be open, were only six instead of eight, or five instead of eight, do you think that that might do good?—There again it is a very difficult question to answer. You have of course to consider on the one side the possible prevention of drunkenness to a greater extent than at present; and on the other side, you have to consider the certain dissatisfaction which I think would attend the passing of further restrictive measures.

843. From your knowledge of the people in your district, not to speak of other parts of London, do you think that the dissatisfaction would be very great?—I can hardly answer that question. I have no real knowledge upon which I can answer it.

844. All you can say is that you imagine that restriction would interfere greatly with the habits of the people?—Yes.

845. Mr. John Abel Smith.] You know of course course what is the present state of the law with regard to the hours?—Yes.

C. E.
Ellison, Esq.

1868.

846. Do you carry your mind back to the Act of 1855 repealing the Act of 1854?—Yes.

847. And the subsequent Act of Sir George Grey in 1864?—Yes.

848. Have you any opinion as to the working of those two measures?—I should say that they have worked well.

849. Then as far as your judgment and experience goes, it is rather in favour of the well working of the present amount of restriction?—Yes.

850. Have you any doubt that if the poor population in Bethnal Green, Shoreditch, and Whitechapel, did not consume a portion of their weekly wages in drink, the comfort and character of the families in the district would be greatly improved?—I have no doubt whatever that it would be so.

851. Then as far as their condition went it would be a very great benefit if they were prevented from drinking?—Yes, if you could prevent their drinking,—that is precisely the question.

852. Do you doubt that the restrictions which are already imposed have diminished drunkenness?—No, I consider that they have to some extent.

853. Am I over-stating or mis-stating your opinions when I say that you consider restrictions on the sale of drink on Sunday desirable up to a point where it excites so much dissatisfaction as to be intolerable?—Yes; I think you may say that. I think that at present we have done good and that we have gone far enough, and I think that if we went further there would be dissatisfaction and it would therefore be inexpedient to go further.

854. You think that the Bill which is now before this Committee makes too large an experiment?—I should be inclined to say so.

855. Do you know at all whether there are in your district a considerable number of the better class of working men?—Yes.

856. Does your district extend down to Mile End Road?—Yes.

857. All round there there are a great number of workmen and a great number of very decent men employed in daily labour, are there not?—Yes.

858. Do you know at all what their feelings are with regard to further restriction?—No, I have no knowledge whatever as to that.

859. Should you be prepared to disbelieve the statement, that a large proportion of these men were in favour of restriction?—No; I should be quite inclined to believe that a large number would be in favour of further restriction.

860. If they were in favour of further restriction it would, with you, and with your peculiar opinions, be a strong argument in favour of trying that further restriction, would it not?—Yes; but I do not suppose that they form the majority of the working classes; I have no knowledge whatever as to that; it is quite possible, and I believe it to be the case, that a great number of the working classes are in favour of further restriction.

861. Do you at all know how the present temptations offered by a public-house personally affect those men that you are talking of, as being respectable men who are in favour of further restriction; do you think that they adopt those views from finding the younger members of their family induced to practise intemperance by the present practice, or upon what do they go, do you think?—I have never heard that assigned as a reason, nor can I refer any feeling that there may be as to that among them to the question of Sunday trading in liquor; of course I have had cases before me in which young children have fallen into crime through taking to drinking too early; but those cases, I am happy to say, are rare.

862. Have you ever had it brought under your notice, or has it ever been done under your eye, that there has been any watching of the visits to public-houses by the population on a Sunday; I mean, to use the broadest way of expressing it, do you know at all what are the number of the visitors to public-houses on a Sunday?—No, I have no means of telling that.

863. Nor you do not know whether any large proportion go to drink or with jugs to carry their drink home?—I will not say anything as to the proportion, but a great number of people certainly carry drink home.

864. And they do it for the purpose of drinking it with their meals at home?—Yes, I presume so.

865. Why should not others do it in the same way?—All those who wish to do it do it now.

866. There would be no difficulty or hardship in others doing it if the public-houses were shut?—There would be no difficulty in their doing it if the usual time for their taking their meals came during the time that the public-houses were open.

867. Have you ever yourself visited public-houses on the Sunday night, or the Saturday night?—No, I have not.

868. Mr. Bright.] You speak of a considerable proportion of the working men being in favour of further restriction; has it ever occurred to you to ascertain, or have any means come before you by which you could ascertain, what would be the opinion of the women?—No, I have no means whatever of ascertaining that.

869. Mr. John Abel Smith.] Is there any large proportion of drunken cases brought before you of women?—Yes.

870. Unfortunately now it is almost half, is it not?—I should be inclined to say very nearly half. I should rather think that drunkenness is increasing among women.

871. Captain Stanley.] In the part of the town with which you are most brought in contact, you say there are a great number of the better class of working men; are you aware that the practice of the working classes of making excursions in this country on Sunday has very much increased of late years?—Yes, that is so.

872. Many trains by which those persons go return very late at night in the summer time, do they not?—Yes.

873. And many of the people returning by the train resort, not for the purpose of getting drunk, but for the purpose of bonâ fide refreshment, to public-houses on their return?—Undoubtedly.

874. Do not you consider that a great number of people, if restrictions were placed upon the public-houses at that time of night, would be deprived of the means of getting what is, after all, merely legitimate refreshment?—That is one of the reasons which makes me of opinion that any any further restriction at night would be inexpedient.

875. Mr. Locke.] You have been asked why the working men should not carry their beer home. Does it improve by keeping when it is brought in a pot?—Certainly not.

876. It might be very convenient for a person who had his beer in a cask to keep it at home, but a person who does not buy in such large quantities would not be in precisely the same position, would he, if he had to take his beer home always?—No.

877. Looking at the hours which are mentioned in this Bill, would it not be extremely inconvenient to a great number of persons, not merely working men, if those three and a half hours were the only three and a half hours on the Sunday during which they could get those things to take them home to their own houses?

—I think it might be so certainly.

878. Have you considered the question of excursion trains coming into town, and the hour of 10 being the hour that they would shut those public-houses, and do you think that it would be inconvenient for persons who were coming home and wanted to go to their own houses to have supper, to be prevented from getting any beer after 10 o'clock?—Yes, I believe it to be the case that many excursion trains come in after 10 o'clock during the summer.

879. Is 11 a fair hour for closing?—Yes, it is so.

880. You think it is not too late?—No.

881. Might not 12 be more convenient?—I do not wish to see it extended to 12; 11, I think, is a fair hour.

SIR JAMES FERGUSSON, BART., IN THE CHAIR.

MAJOR JOHN JAMES GREIG, C.B., called in; and Examined.

Major
J. J. Greig,
C.B.
1868.

882. Chairman.] You are Chief Constable of the borough of Liverpool, are you not?—Yes.

883. How many years have you held that appointment?—Upwards of 16 years.

884. Previous to that had you been in command of the police force?—No, I was staff officer of pensioners for 10 years previously.

885. Your attention has been greatly called no doubt to the working of the present laws affecting public-houses?—Continually.

886. Are you aware of the subject proposed in this Bill?—Yes.

887. Can you tell the Committee what is your opinion as to the working of the present law as regards the closing of public-houses on Sunday; is it your opinion that the closing of public-houses for a part of the day tends to restrain drinking to excess?—No doubt.

888. Do you remember the passing of the Act called Mr. Wilson Patten's Act in August 1854?—Yes.

889. You were not called upon to give evidence before the Committee of this House in the following year, were you?—I was not.

890. But do you recollect whether the working of that Act, as long as it lasted, was beneficial?—Yes; particularly so.

891. Did it tend further to reduce the cases of drunkenness occurring in your jurisdiction?—The Act, as I understand it, reduced the drinking hours for 2½ hours; I enquired into the working of it, and I took the six months previous to the passing of that Act, and the six months afterwards; I took the time from 10 o'clock on Sunday night, and throughout the night, and I found that in the six months immediately previous to the passing of the Act there were 461 persons taken into custody for drunkenness after 10 o'clock on Sunday night, and after the passing of the Act the number diminished to 210.

892. That was the effect, was it, of closing the public-houses one hour earlier on Sunday night?—Yes, of curtailing the hours by two and a half; they close now at 11; that Act caused them to close at 10.

893. Then that was closing one hour earlier?—Yes.

894. I understand you to say that you have taken the number of cases reported to you as occurring after 10 o'clock on Sunday night, and you state that during the time when under Mr. Wilson Patten's Act the public-houses closed at 10, the number of cases occurring after 10 o'clock on Sunday night were reduced more than one-half?—Yes.

895. You think that that fact was caused by closing the public-houses one hour earlier?—I think so.

896. I suppose the question of their being closed or open in the afternoon did not affect the cases occurring after 10 at night?—No.

897. Were there many complaints of the inconvenience caused by the short time during which the public-houses were open?—No, I do not remember any representation being made to me to that effect.

898. You do not remember any expression of feeling in the borough to that effect?—No.

899. Was there any strong expression of feeling in favour of the change by the inhabitants?—I think it gave satisfaction.

900. And did the number of cases increase after the repeal of the Act of 1854?—The Act was only in existence, I think, about nine months.

901. During which time you have stated the effects in one particular; was there a corresponding falling away after the repeal of that Act?—I have no figures to show that; but my own opinion is that it would increase drunkenness, upon the principle that the more you diminish the time, the more you will diminish drunkenness.

902. But you cannot state to the Committee any facts upon that point?—No, I have no figures.

903. Could not you furnish the Committee on your return home with statistics of the cases of drunkenness and crimes arising out of drunkenness reported in the year following the year 1854?—I have them all here.

904. But not with reference to particular hours?—No.

905. Can you give us the results as regards Sunday?—I have a table which shows the cases of drunkenness commencing from the year 1858, running running down to 1867 inclusive, showing how many persons were taken into custody for drunkenness, and how many were proceeded against by summons, and for the last two years they show the refused charges, because I think that is a material point. The refused charges are those where a person is brought to the bride-well, and he may have been a little noisy and disorderly from the effect of drink, and upon promising better behaviour he is allowed to go away, for no person enters the door of the bride-well without some note or memorandum being made as to why he was brought, and why he was allowed to go. It may be that he has some friend who may say, if you let him go, he is a decent man, and I will see him home; that is called a refused charge.

906. Is the refusing of charges in the discretion of the officer on duty?—Yes, and with the Bride-well keeper.

907. Mr. Locke.] He does not take him into custody and put him into the Bridewell, does he?—No; he is merely at the comptor, if you may call it so.

908. He does not lock him up?—No, and the man does not appear in the police annual statistics as a case of drunkenness; neither do those cases come under the head of drunkenness where there is a graver offence; much drunkenness is merged into graver offences, such as stabbing or stealing.

909. Mr. Horsfall.] Were those statistics of the number of charges continued during the whole time to which you refer?—Yes.

910. Chairman.] Is it stated in the paper before you whether there is any distinction shown between Sunday and other days with regard to the number of cases of drunkenness?—No.

911. Will you furnish the Committee, on your return home, with statements of the number of persons reported for drunkenness in the successive years after 1854?—Yes; and distinguishing the refused charges, also, do I understand?

912. I think, distinguishing Sundays only; and if you would take it from four o'clock on Sunday morning to four o'clock on Monday morning, that will correspond with the similar returns for the Metropolis?—Yes, I will do so.

913. Will there be any difficulty in doing that?—None whatever.

914. Is it your opinion that if the hours during which liquors might be sold were still further reduced, there would probably be a good deal of illicit trade?—I am not prepared to say so. If you mean that spirits would be sold in shops and places not licensed, that would be a matter which the excise would have to take action upon.

915. You would not consider that it was part of your duty to prevent such sale?—Yes, decidedly it would.

916. But do you not think that that kind of offence would increase?—I think that it would be kept down very much by the severity of the excise penalties; the excise penalties are very severe.

917. Would you be in favour of the restrictions going as far as is proposed in this Bill, namely, that no liquor should be sold on the premises for consumption on the premises?—I have thought a good deal of that; and the only point that I am afraid of is, that it might lead to drinking in the streets.

918. Do you think that that would probably be the result if none might be consumed on the premises?—Yes, especially at first; but the police would be bound to remove any obstruction; and such a matter as drinking in the street out of a can, or a bucket, or a jug, would constitute somewhat of disorder, and the police might interfere.

919. There are a great number of persons in Liverpool of a class that have very small lodgings only to live in, and who eat and drink chiefly in public places, are there not; a great number of the labouring population.

920. Yes; they are great frequenters of public-houses?—And the daily habit of the poorer of the working men would be to resort to a public-house for refreshment in the way of drink?—Yes.

921. Supposing, during Sunday, when they are doing no work, they were not able to drink at all in a public house, would that make a great change in their habits?—I have had a great deal of conversation upon this point with clergymen, and in two cases with two eminent brewers and with the people generally, and I give you the opinion of 1,100 men, because, in all matters of consequence I take the opinion of those who are the seniors in the force, and they are one and all of opinion that if the hours were curtailed so, the drunkenness would diminish, and I think, if I may express an opinion which I have picked up elsewhere as my own, that if one hour and a half were allowed in the middle of the day, and one hour and a half in the evening, that would be a matter which would give very general satisfaction indeed. I think clergymen and others who go in for the total closing would be very much satisfied, and I think, speaking of Liverpool, that those who are for partly opening only would also be satisfied.

922. I suppose it would give satisfaction to those who desire more restrictions?—Yes.

923. But are you prepared to say that the majority of the community, or of any class in the community, are desirous of increased restrictions?—I think they would be satisfied with the hours I have named.

924. Do you think that the bulk of the labouring population would be satisfied with the hours proposed in the Bill?—After a short time they would.

925. Perhaps I might remind you that the Bill proposes several things; in the first place, that there should be no liquors consumed on the premises unless by a person who is taking a bonâ fide meal?—I think that it would have a good effect if that could be accomplished.

926. The Bill proposes, as far as places out of the metropolis are concerned, that no drinking whatever should be allowed in public-houses on Sunday, and that liquor should only be sold to be consumed off the premises between one and half-past two, and between eight and ten at night, do you think that the bulk of the labouring classes in Liverpool would accept willingly restrictions to that extent?—I do not think they would complain. I may say that there are 214 places in Liverpool which have spirit licenses, and 156 of those are public-houses in every sense of the word, and those 214 are entirely shut on Sunday and voluntarily shut.

927. What number of houses sell beer in Liverpool?—Eight hundred and nineteen, not including public-houses.

928. You are aware, are you not, that the Bill would prevent any beer being sold to be consumed sumed on the premises in all of those 819 houses?—Yes.

929. And you have that in mind when you give that answer that you do not think there would be any general complaint?—Not a general complaint; there would be a little grumbling at first. But that number does not include public-houses; there are 1,945 public-houses, besides those beer-houses.

930. Then your answer is to be understood to include all those houses?—All of them.

931. Mr. Roebuck. I want to get at your theory about this business. You have laid down a rule that the more you diminish the time of drinking the more you diminish drunkenness: if you were to put an end to all kinds of drinking whatever, do you think you would put an end to all drunkenness?—I do not give it you as a theory, I give it you from personal observation.

932. Do you think that if you put an end to all the time of drinking you would put an end to all kind of drunkenness?—No, I do not think you would put an end to all drunkenness.

933. How do you come to the conclusion that the more you diminish the time of drinking the more you would diminish drunkenness?—Because you diminish the opportunities for getting drunk.

934. I put it as a necessary consequence of your proposition, that if you stop the time altogether you would stop the drunkenness altogether; would that be so?—No.

935. You put this general proposition, that the more you diminish the time for drinking the more you diminish drunkenness; therefore you come to the conclusion that the restrictions in this Act are good because there are further restrictions. Now, I push your proposition to its limits, and say, supposing that you put an end to all time of drinking would you put an end to all drunkenness?—I suppose not.

936. Then where would you stop?—I would give a moderate time in the morning and afternoon.

937. You say that an hour and a half, during the middle of the day, and an hour and-a-half in the evening, would be, in your notion, what ought to be allowed for the sale and drinking of liquors on the Sunday?—Yes; I think that that would satisfy the public.

938. I want to know if, in that hour and-a-half, you would allow any drinking on the premises?—No, I would rather not.

939. Then you lay down another extraordinary proposition, that drinking out of a can in the street would constitute disorder; do you mean to tell the Committee that if I went into a public-house and bought a glass of beer, and walked into the street and drank it, I should be guilty of disorder?—No; I did not mean that at all; I meant that a number of men might send in a great can into a public-house, and get beer and drink it in the street; it might lead to that; and then if they were drinking beer with the general accompaniment of noise, producing disorder, the police would interfere with it as an obstruction.

940. Supposing this Act were passed, that a man could not drink anything in the house, and there are three of them round the door, and he sends in his friend with a can, and he comes out with a quart of beer, and they stand in the street and drink it, do you mean to tell me that you would interrupt them?—No, I would not, if they were not guilty of disorder.

941. Supposing they were perfectly decent people and behaved properly, and made no noise, what should prevent men doing that if this Bill were passed?—There would be no interference with them as long as they were quiet; but drinking in the street would appear unseemly on Sunday.

942. That is what I think it would, and that is one of my objections to this Bill; but I want to know whether it constitutes, in your mind, a recommendation of this Bill, that it might lead to drinking in the streets?—It might at first; but the police regulations would take care that it did not go to any great extent.

943. I see you have a great idea of police regulations; but I do not think that you will put down drinking by police regulations; do you think so?—No.

944. You say that this Bill would do good, and that it would prevent drunkenness?—I think that those hours would give two opportunities, and as to those who stay in a public-house longer than that, it is merely for the convenience of drunkards who would remain there as long as the house is open.

945. But you see they are only to go in for the purpose of buying; they cannot stay there during the supposed hour and-a-half, and drink quietly their jug of beer; that is not permitted by this Bill; the house is to be shut up for all those purposes during the whole of Sunday?—I quite understand that to be the case.

946. When you say that that would prevent drunkenness has it ever entered into your mind that while you are doing that good you might be doing evil?—No; I do not see the direction.

947. Then, supposing that I was not a bonâ fide traveller, but took a walk for my pleasure as I used to do, when a young man, and I was very thirsty, and saw a public-house, would you think it no mischief that I could not go into that public-house, and get a glass of beer?—That would be an exceptional case, speaking generally, for a large town. I spoke of the matter generally.

948. Do you think that it is an exceptional case that men walk out on the Sunday evening?—No.

949. That is the very case I put to you; would there not there be a large mass of inconvenience that thoroughly decent and proper people (decent and proper people get thirsty, you know), wanting to get a glass of beer should, by this Bill, be prohibited from getting it or drinking it, and sitting down to relieve themselves after their walk?—I think that the great good the restriction would do would counterbalance the inconvenience of a few.

950. Do you think that it is no evil and inconvenience that a man walking on Sunday evening, for his pleasure, gets thirsty and cannot, by the operation of this Bill, get a glass of beer, which he can drink sitting down in the house?—Not as compared with the general good.

951. Do you think that any inconvenience at all?—It would be in the case you describe.

952. Then you see you do not contemplate the case I put to you, did you ever contemplate any possible mischief that you might be doing; that whilst you are doing the good of preventing drunkenness there is a mischief which you allow you would do?—Not mischief; I still again must answer that question by thinking of the general good which restricting the hours, by the provisions of this Bill, would do.

953. You

953. You do not consider the inconvenience and mischief?—No; I would lose sight of that in the general good.

954. That is merely reiterating your proposition; I want to know if you have thought of all the evils that would arise; for example, there are excursion trains out of Liverpool on Sunday, are there not?—They very seldom come on Sunday, excepting Whitsunday and holidays; but they generally bring their own provisions with them. The town complains that excursionists never spend any money.

955. Do you mean to say that they take beer in a hot carriage, and carry it all the way (10 miles, say) from home?—They bring a basket with them.

956. Do I correctly understand you to say that there are no excursion trains which leave Liverpool on the Sunday and come back again in the evening?—Very few.

957. I presume you know that there are amazing numbers that do it in London?—I am not well acquainted with London; I spend very little time in London.

958. Do your statistics about Mr. Wilson Patten's Act extend over the six months of its operation?—Yes; before and after the passing of the Act.

959. Have you got any statistics respecting the time which passed immediately after the Act was repealed?—No; the Chairman asked me that question before, and I regret that I have none.

960. Will you tell me why you have none?—Because I did not know upon what subject I should be asked, except the provisions of the Bill.

961. Have you any statistics in Liverpool with regard to that?—I can get anything in the shape of figures from books, which are correctly kept.

962. We may sum up your evidence thus, may we not: that you believe that the restrictions hitherto have been beneficial, and that therefore further restrictions would be beneficial?—I think so; and I again repeat that I spoke with an eminent brewer, who owns at least 50 houses, and he has shut up every one of them on Sunday; and I repeat that there are 214 places which have spirit licenses, and 156 of those are public-houses, and those 214 shut for the entire day voluntarily.

963. Mr. Horsfall.] You are in the habit, are you not, of making a report to the town council every year as to the state of crime and the extent of drunkenness in Liverpool?—Yes.

964. Will you be so good as to say whether this is a correct statement in your report of 1854: "The new Act, closing public and beer houses on Sunday from half-past two until six o'clock p.m., and from ten o'clock p.m. until four o'clock on Monday, has been attended with most beneficial results in the low neighbourhoods; for, although the streets are as crowded as ever during the day by people from narrow streets and courts taking advantage of the open air, there has been an absence of that violence and disorder which was the characteristic of Sunday evening prior to the passing of the Act"?—That is my writing.

965. And that is your opinion still as to the effect of Mr. Wilson Patten's Act?—Yes.

966. Do you know Mr. John Cropper of Liverpool?—I know him well.

967. He is a very active magistrate, is he not?—Yes, I know Mr. John Wakefield Cropper, 069.

the magistrate, and I know he is one of the most benevolent gentlemen we have.

968. You would put faith in any statement which he put forward as a fact?—Yes, certainly.

969. Do you recollect the canvass of the town which took place some four or five years ago, with reference to the entire closing of public-houses on Sunday?—I do, and I recollect the gentlemen who took part in it; the Rev. Mr. Falloon, the Rev. Dr. Verner White, and so on.

970. They then put forward, and signed an official statement as to the number of parties who were in favour of the entire closing and those who were not; you have seen that statement, no doubt?—Yes.

971. They stated that out of the 724 publicans in Liverpool, 432 were in favour of entire closing and that 199 were against Sunday closing, and 93 were in favour of closing, except for two hours; do you believe that to be a fact which is put forward and signed by those gentlemen?—I do.

972. I think you stated that there were a large number of publicans who have voluntarily closed their houses?—Yes, particularly Mr. Walker and Mr. Rigby, two very large proprietors of public-houses.

973. The honourable Member for Sheffield asked you whether the passing of such a law would not be attended with inconvenience; no doubt it would; I presume there are very few laws passed which are not attended with inconvenience to some parties?—At the first start there is a little difficulty in their operation.

974. Do you think that drunkenness has increased or decreased latterly in Liverpool?—I have been surprised at the figures because the table which I have here shows rather a decrease.

975. Will you just read the figures for the last few years, including the period when licenses were, I might say, almost unrestricted?—This table shows the number of licenses granted, and it also shows the number of persons taken into custody for drunkenness. In 1858 there were 9,550; proceeded against by summons, 279. In 1859, 10,470, and 567 by summons. In the next year, 1860, the number taken into custody was 10,112, and the number proceeded against by summons, 851. In 1861, taken into custody, there were 9,022; proceeded against by summons, 810. In 1862, taken into custody, 11,322; proceeded against by summons, 754. In 1863, taken into custody, 13,043; and proceeded against by summons, 871. In 1864, taken into custody, 13,278; proceeded against by summons, 724. In 1865, taken into custody, 13,156; proceeded against by summons, 766. In 1866, taken into custody, 12,332; proceeded against by summons, 672. In 1867, taken into custody, 11,932; proceeded against by summons, 571.

976. What year was it in which the magistrates gave almost what you may call unrestricted licenses?—In 1862, 124 licenses were granted, and 24 were taken away. In the next year 30 were granted, and 16 taken away. The alteration was in the next year, 1864, and then there were 147 granted. In 1865, 126. In 1866, 22; and in 1867, 9.

977. Did you find any increase of drunkenness in the years when the large number of licenses were granted?—No; those figures do not bear that out.

978. You think, on the whole, that even under the present law drunkenness has decreased?—Very slightly; but again I say that these figures do do not show merely the drunkenness; there are a great many crimes in which drunkenness is merged, and also those refused charges swell up the very large number.

979. Mr. Baines.] The refused charges are not included in the figures which you have given us as taken into custody?—No.

980. Mr. Horsfall.] Are you aware what the increase of the population has been during those years to which you have referred?—No, I am not; but by the calculation of the census, the population in 1861 was 443,874; and now by taking the average increase during the four years, I calculate that it represents 492,000 as against 443,000, which is nearly half a million; but the tonnage of Liverpool brings in a very large floating population which adds very much to the drunkenness of Liverpool. There is a floating population of 20,000 seamen.

981. Referring again to the statement which has been published by those gentlemen whose names you have mentioned, it is here stated that out of 17,428 labourers, householders, 15,092 were in favour of the entire closing; do you think that that is probable?—Yes.

982. You have no doubt that it is a correct statement on the part of those gentlemen?—I have no doubt that it is.

983. You know how the canvass was taken, do you not?—Yes, quite so; I have every faith in the figures which those gentlemen have given.

984. That would lead you to the inference that both the publicans and the labouring classes are in favour not only of partial but of entire closing?—No, I think a great many are in favour of entire closing, but I think that a large section of the community are against entire closing. A moderate time in the forenoon and a moderate time in the evening would satisfy both parties.

985. I perfectly understood you to say that your opinion would be an hour and a half in the morning, with an hour and a half in the evening; but I ask you whether, with the statement which is put forth here, that such a large preponderance of the labouring classes as well as publicans are in favour of entire closing, it would not be desirable that that should be done?—I think that it would be a hardship upon the working classes not to have an opportunity of getting some drink.

986. Those parties who have been canvassed represent householders only; but you think that there is a very large population in Liverpool who are not householders, and who would feel it to be a grievance?—I think so.

987. Mr. Evans.] I think I understood you to say, and, in fact, you gave figures to show it, that during the time that Mr. Wilson Patten's Act was in operation, there was a very great diminution in the number of persons taken up for drunkenness after the hour of 10 on Sunday?—Yes.

988. Supposing that the public houses were to be closed at 10 on Sunday, other things remaining as they are, do you think that that would have a good effect?—I think that an hour gained would be a great advantage.

989. Is it customary for many persons who live in Liverpool to take any of their meals at public-houses?—I think not; as a general rule they go there merely to drink.

990. You think that a very small number of persons would take their meals at public-houses?—I think so; they go to refreshment houses and other houses.

991. I gather from what you have said, and also from the figures that you have given the Committee, that on the whole drunkenness has diminished in Liverpool since the year 1858; when do you think this diminution of drunkenness commenced?—In the year 1858 the number was 9,550; then we got to 10,000 in 1859, and 9,000 in 1861; then in 1862 it seems that it ran up to 11,000 and 13,000 in 1863, and now it is back to 11,000.

992. But what year was it that the numbers began to diminish?—1858 shows the smallest number of any year.

993. It increased up to a certain time, and then it began to diminish; when was it that it began to diminish?—In 1866.

994. Not before that?—No.

995. The population, I presume, has increased during that period?—Yes, it is nearly half a million now, against 443,000 in 1861.

996. What proportion do the women bear to the men in the statistics of drunkenness, in Liverpool?—They are a very heavy figure.

997. Do they amount to anything like a third or a fourth?—I should think that there are as many women as men.

998. Do you think that drunkenness is increasing among women, as compared with men?—I think so.

999. I think you stated that there were very few special trains on Sunday at Liverpool?—Very few.

1000. Mr. Yorke.] Is it your opinion that the drunkenness which takes place among women is owing to drinking in public-houses, or in private houses?—Not in private houses, in public-houses and beer-houses, the last is a class of house which is frequented very much by the lowest class of people. There are 819 beer-houses. The public-houses, generally speaking, are well conducted, but the beer-houses are the lowest class of house, and, with the exception of a very few, where the occupiers may be in the expectation of getting a spirit license, they are very badly conducted, and they are very much resorted to by women.

1001. If drinking in private houses has increased owing to the prohibition of drinking in public-houses, it would be chiefly among men, and not among women; and I presume that a great proportion of the cases that come before you arise from drinking out of public-houses?—The beer-houses and the public-houses are the great root of the evil.

1002. Is it your opinion, that if the restrictions in the Bill were enforced, drinking in private houses would or would not be increased?—I do not think it would.

1003. Was there any Act passed in the year 1866, or were any measures taken which would reduce drunkenness, in your opinion, because that is the date at which the diminution in the statistics begins?—No, there has been no alteration of the hours since 1855, when Mr. Wilson Patten's Act was repealed.

1004. Can you form any opinion as to the causes which tended to diminish drunkenness from the year 1866 up to the present time?—No. It perplexes me to give a reason. Although my figures show that drunkenness has diminished slightly, from my personal observation I do not think that it has diminished at all.

1005. Do you think that statistics in matters of drunkenness are always reliable; for instance, do you not think it possible that the increased number of cases of drunkenness might be owing to the increased efficiency of the police force, rather than to the diminution in drunkenness; is not that one of the causes which might tend to alter the statistics, without the cause being an alteration in the condition of drunkenness or otherwise in a town?—I am rather at a loss to answer that question.

1006. My object is to see how far those statistics which you bring forward are reliable as testing the real condition of the town as regards drunkenness?—I do not think that the statistics show the real state of the town.

1007. In your opinion, those statistics are not reliable as testing the comparative amount of drunkenness prevailing in different periods?—Those figures are perfectly truthful; but, for instance, in the case of any person, although he may be very much under the influence of liquor, if he is quiet the police have orders to advise him to go home, and not get into trouble; and then with regard to a refused charge, whenever there is an opportunity, or there is any chance of a person finding his way home, he is not detained.

1008. In considering the expediency of passing an Act such as the one which is before us, would you consider that statistics such as those which you produce are a reliable basis for legislation or not?—I think so.

1009. Is that quite consistent with the answer which you gave just now; if you consider that they are not reliable as a test of the amount of drunkenness at different periods under different conditions, I mean at one period under certain restrictions, and at another period under increased or lessened restrictions, would you consider that such statistics, not being a fair test of the drunkenness of a town, would be a satisfactory basis for legislation?—I again repeat that the figures are accurate, but I do not think that they represent by any manner of means the drunkenness that takes place in a large seaport like Liverpool, where the tonnage exceeds the tonnage of London, and where the docks are so close to the town, or in the town rather.

1010. Mr. John Abel Smith.] I think I understood you to say that there was a decrease in drunkenness in Liverpool in the year 1866, but which you could not account for?—I could not account for it; I referred to apprehensions for drunkenness, and to proceedings by summons.

1011. Was Sir George Grey's Closing Act of 1864 extended to Liverpool?—Yes, the town council adopted it.

1012. When was it adopted?—Very shortly after it was passed.

1013. Do you know what the effect of that adoption was?—Yes, it had the effect of clearing the streets in very objectionable neighbourhoods, corresponding with the Haymarket in London, and the neighbourhood of dancing-houses.

1014. Do you know anything at all of the feeling of the working classes in Liverpool with regard to restrictions on public-houses?—I think that the large respectable portion of the working classes would be satisfied with having two opportunities during the Sunday of obtaining beer.

1015. The honourable Member for Southwark wants to have a clearer explanation of that state of things; what I understand you to say is, that a large majority of the respectable working men in Liverpool would be satisfied with a state of things which excluded them from drinking on the premises, and gave them opportunity of purchasing beer for two several periods in the day, of an hour and a half each to be drunk off the premises?—I think it would be considered a hardship, at first, that they should not be allowed to drink on the premises, but I think that that would wear out. In answer to the second question, with regard to the respectable portion of the working classes, I think they would be quite satisfied with having two opportunities of getting their dinner beer and their supper beer on the Sunday.

1016. Should you have any fear of a public disturbance following such a change in the law in Liverpool?—Not for a moment.

1017. You would have no idea of being unable to put down any resistance of the lower classes?—Not for a moment.

1018. With regard to the canvass that took place in Liverpool of the feelings of the householders with respect to Sunday closing, are you confident yourself that it was an honest attempt to get at the real feeling of those people?—Yes, I know the gentlemen well; the clergymen are highly respected; none more so in Liverpool.

1019. You have been asked by the honourable Member for Sheffield with regard to the inconvenience arising to people taking a walk and being unable to get a glass of beer if they were thirsty; would not it be inconvenient to those people if they were hungry that they could not go into a baker's shop and get some bread?—Yes, of course.

1020. Have you any doubt that the cause of the immense majority of criminal acts in the country arises from drunkenness?—Rather more than three fourths.

1021. Does the drinking on Sunday exceed that on other days in the week?—Yes, but the blackest hours of the whole week are the late hours on Saturday night; from 10 to 12 on Saturday night; I think those are the two blackest hours in the week.

1022. Saturday night, I understand you, to be the worst period in the week, and Sunday drinking comes next, does it not?—Yes.

1023. And inasmuch as crime is the result of drinking, a large amount of crime, I will not say what, but a large amount of crime is referable, you think, to Sunday drinking?—I think so.

1024. Then you are in favour of a restriction upon the present hours of drinking upon Sunday?—Yes, uncommonly.

1025. Do you believe that there is any other limit to the restriction in favour of temperance of the lower classes except this, that the restriction becomes at last so severe as to be intolerable. I ask you that question with reference to your answer to the honourable Member for Sheffield?—I am sorry to say that I hardly understand the question.

1026. I understand you to be in favour of restriction; and that you think restriction upon beer drinking is conducive to public morality and public good?—Yes.

1027. But there is, of course, a point at which that restriction becomes intolerable if carried too far?—Yes.

1028. That point of its becoming so inconvenient as to be intolerable, is what in your mind would be the limit to restriction?—Yes.

1029. Do I correctly apprehend that that is your opinion?—Yes.

1030. Will you be so good as to state whether going out of Liverpool on Sunday on excursions either by train or otherwise, is the habit of the place at all?—No, not at all; it is the exception.

1031. Do you know the habits of any other large towns in Lancashire besides Liverpool, with regard to Sunday excursions?—No, I do not.

1032. Do you know the habits of Liverpool as regards the dining at public-houses on Sunday?—I believe that there is very little dining in public-houses on Sunday in Liverpool.

1033. Is it the habit in Liverpool generally for people to dine in their lodgings?—Yes.

1034. Therefore with regard to those habits, the power of getting drunk for two periods of an hour and a half, or two hours each would enable them with their meals to get all that they now get?—Quite so.

1035. With regard to the disposition and feeling of the owners of public-houses in Liverpool as to closing on Sunday, do you believe that they are in favour of it generally or not, if there was one law or rule applicable to all?—If all were to agree, I think the public-house keepers would rather prefer being open twice a day.

1036. Without drinking on the premises?—No, I am not quite sure about that.

1037. You think that they would be in favour of retaining the day for the benefit of the trade?—I think they would.

1038. But still there are at present 214 public-houses in Liverpool shut on Sunday?—Yes, and a very large proportion of them belong to two gentlemen, eminent brewers.

1039. With regard to the women's drinking, you say that you fear there is an increase of drinking among the women?—Yes; a great many persons when they knew that I was coming to give evidence upon this point, were very anxious that I should introduce the subject of beer-houses, which are not under the control of or are not licensed by the magistrates at all. They go to the Excise and pay three guineas and have a beer license, and those are the class of houses that do a great deal of mischief, and magistrates have spoken to me of how desirable it would be if such beer-houses were under the like control, with public-houses to be licensed by the justices and not by the Excise.

1040. That is not a part of our inquiry; but with regard to the increase of habits of drinking amongst women I think, I understood you to say that you fear it is increasing?—I think so.

1041. Do they drink in public-houses or at home?—In public-houses, and especially in the beer-houses.

1042. Do you believe that if they were restricted from drinking in the beer-houses, they would drink as much at home as they would there?—No, I think that that would reach the women uncommonly well.

1043. Do you believe that the women and children would benefit very largely in Liverpool if the expenditure of the working men on beer on Sunday was reduced?—No doubt of it.

1044. A very considerable amount of the earnings of those men are spent on Saturday night and Sunday in the public-houses, are they not?—Yes; and that money is diverted from the clothing and education of their family.

1045. Do you know at all what are the number of children that are overlaid annually in Liverpool?—I have a return upon that point. It is a return of inquests held upon infants found suffocated in bed with their parents, on each morning of the week, for the year 1867. The term suffocated includes those children who are overlaid chiefly, and the numbers are as follows: On Saturday 17, Friday 15, Thursday 15, Wednesday 15, Tuesday 13, Monday 16, Sunday 36.

1046. To what do you attribute that remarkable increase on Sunday?—To Sunday drinking.

1047. Chairman. When you say Sunday, are those 36 cases that happened on Sunday morning, or on Monday morning?—They would take place upon the day before.

1048. Mr. John Abel Smith. Then it was the Saturday drinking, was it?—On the Sunday it was 36, and Monday 16.

1049. Colonel Fane. What do you mean by Sunday?—Saturday night and Sunday night, the inquest would be on Monday morning.

1050. Mr. John Abel Smith. When you say 36, are you giving a return of the two days?—No.

1051. The return of 36 is a return of the children overlaid or suffocated, or whatever term you use, on Sunday?—Yes; on Sunday. This return is prepared in the coroner's court.

1052. Mr. Baines. Do you mean on Sunday night, and discovered on Monday morning?—No, I think that the fact took place on the Sunday; so I read this return. It is a return of inquests held upon infants found suffocated in bed by their parents, on each morning in the week, for the year 1867; the term "suffocated" includes those children overlaid; and on Sunday 36 were overlaid.

1053. Mr. Locke. There were no inquests held on Sunday?—No.

1054. Then the inquests held on Monday included those who were overlaid on Saturday and likewise on Sunday?—I do not read the return in that way.

1055. What are you reading that from?—From a return which shows seven days, and the Saturday has its proportion as well as the Sunday.

1056. Mr. Yorke. As I understand, it is on Sunday morning that they were found?—Yes.

1057. Then that would be owing to drinking on the Saturday night?—Or on the Sunday morning.

1058. It must be from the effects of drinking on the Saturday night, must it not?—I think the case would be produced before the coroner as a fact which happened on Sunday.

1059. As showing that the effect of drinking is to produce the overlaying of infants on a particular day, this would go to show that it was the drinking on Saturday night which, during that night, caused those infants to be overlaid?—I only received the return yesterday; it was made from the coroner's court, and I have not those particulars.

1060. On the showing of the return, you say on each morning of the week a certain number of infants were overlaid; that on Sunday morning 36 infants were overlaid. If that bears relation to drunkenness at all it must bear relation to the drunkenness on Saturday night?—Yes, quite so.

1061. Mr. John Abel Smith. The deaths by suffocation on the Sunday must arise from Saturday night's drinking?—Yes, and Sunday morning.

1062. Is there a great deal of drinking on Sunday morning?—Yes; a great many informations tions are laid, against beer-houses specially. There are men sent out in plain clothes, to check Sunday trading; two inspectors in uniform, two first-class constables, and eight men in plain clothes. They begin at 11 o'clock on Saturday night, and visit the beer-houses which should close at 11 o'clock, and the public-houses which close at 12.

1063. I understand that the general purport of your evidence is, that you approve of the principle of a further restriction on Sunday drinking, and you think that such a measure as has been referred to this Committee might at first produce discontent and grumbling, but that it would be afterwards received, and would have a beneficial effect upon the community?—I think that it would produce great general good.

1064. Mr. Baines.] I think you have undertaken to produce further returns to the Committee when you get home, besides those which you have now produced?—If I am furnished with any request from this Committee, so that I may perfectly understand what returns they want, I will take care to furnish them at a very early date; going back for so many years would require some three or four days.

1065. Chairman.] Would it be very difficult to give those returns for every day in the week?—No; it is the simplest thing possible; it will only require a little time, and to be prepared with great care.

1066. Mr. Baines.] I wish to ask whether those returns would include the refused charges?—Yes, if you desire it.

1067. I also want another column, if you can give it, for cases of crime which arise out of drunkenness, but are not specified under the head of drunkenness, that is to say, which merge in other offences, and are not therefore included under the general head?—You refer to charges of stabbing arising out of drunkenness, for instance; that will take some little time, but it can be very simply done by referring to my books. There is no difficulty about it.

1068. I see one column of your return is headed "refused charges," persons being drunk, and those amount to several thousands; and other cases, where drunkenness is merged in other offences; those also amount to several thousands?—Yes, it is a very heavy figure.

1069. It is those which the Committee wish to have included in the return which you are to furnish them with?—I will take care that it shall be done.

1070. The return which you have given us only goes back to 1858; could you carry the return back to 1853, a date prior to Mr. Wilson Patten's Act?—Yes.

1071. Mr. Hibbert.] With respect to the return which you have put in about the number of inquests held upon infants suffocated in bed, I see it is stated at the bottom of the return that the large number on Sunday morning may be in a great measure attributed to the Saturday night's debauch. I presume that, as there is a return for every morning during the week, the 36 on Sunday morning must be owing to the large number of cases of drunken women on Saturday evening?—Yes. That paragraph appended to the return is a volunteer statement by the officer who is next to myself in command.

1072. I understand that public-houses and beer-houses are not open after 12 o'clock on Saturday night, therefore it must be from 0.69.

drunkenness that occurred, supposing it took place in public-houses at all, before 12 o'clock at night?—Yes.

1073. The honourable Member asked you whether the statistics were reliable. I suppose that the police regulations in Liverpool, with respect to drunkenness, and your instruction to the police with respect to the mode of dealing with drunken cases, have been the same during the whole time of the returns presented to the Committee?—Quite so; they have never varied.

1074. Therefore they would be reliable as far as the town of Liverpool is concerned?—Yes, and they are very carefully prepared.

1075. Though they might not be of any use as comparing Liverpool with other places; with Manchester or Liverpool, for example, they still are of use in comparing one year with another in the town of Liverpool?—Quite so.

1076. Can you tell me what the police regulations are, with respect to beer-houses in Liverpool; have the police the same control over beer-houses as they have over the licensed houses?—They are visited, and more visited than public-houses, because they are far the more disorderly of the two.

1077. On the Sunday, have you more cases of disorderly conduct arising in beer-houses than you have in licensed houses?—Yes, very much more so.

1078. Can you suggest any plan of giving greater control over beer-houses with respect to the police?—Not except as to the license. The beer-house keepers are fined 5*l.* for the first offence, and 10*l.* if there is a second offence within a year, and 50*l.* if a third offence takes place within 18 months, and they lose their licenses, both the person and the house, but then they go into a private house and defy the police, because it then becomes to visit them an act of trespass.

1079. Have you any cases of licenses being taken from beer-houses on account of those offences?—Yes, frequently.

1080. With respect to the cases that occur on Sunday of drinking in public-houses during prohibited hours, have you any difficulty in proving those cases before the magistrates?—No, not during the prohibited hours, the most respectable houses do not offend in that respect.

1081. Have you any cases occurring in Liverpool of drinking during the prohibited hours, either in licensed houses or in beer-houses?—Yes; there were 122 informations against public-houses in 1867, which are not many, taking the whole. There are 1,945 public-houses to begin with, and there were 122 informations laid against them in that one year; and with respect to beer-houses, of which there are 819, there were 673 informations laid against beer-houses.

1082. So that you have a greater number of informations laid against the beer-houses than against the licensed houses?—A very much greater number; the one has a great deal to lose and the other nothing.

1083. When those informations are in some places, the magistrates require proof of sale, but have you found any difficulty in Liverpool in proving those cases before the magistrates?—No, not frequently, they are well defended.

1084. What regulations exist with respect to drinking in the steam-boats of Liverpool; are they under your control?—No; I have nothing to do with them.

1085. Are they allowed to sell drink during any hour on Sunday; I mean excursion boats?—I cannot speak to that point.

1086. You have stated that a large number of publicans have already closed voluntarily on Sunday; have you thought that if a system of licenses were granted for six days, supposing a license was granted for a smaller amount than for a seven days' license, a large number of publicans would be induced to take advantage of them?—I have not considered that point.

1087. I suppose the number of publicans who are closing on Sunday has been increasing in Liverpool from time to time?—I think so, considerably so.

1088. Do you think that if you came to propose a greater restriction on Sunday drinking it would be more desirable to do it by curtailing the hours under the present system, than carrying out such an alteration as is proposed by the Bill now before the Committee?—I think that by beginning with restricting the hours there would be an advantage.

1089. Do not you think there would be an advantage in restricting the hours on the present system over introducing a new law entirely, seeing that we should thereby get rid of the inconvenience of having to consider fresh points of law?—I hardly feel myself qualified to answer that question.

1090. Many points of law have arisen from the reading of the Act of 1855, as to what was a bonâ fide traveller; all those points are now well understood by the magistrates, but if we were to introduce a new law with respect to drinking off the premises, would not considerable difficulty arise again as to understanding the law?—Possibly there might be.

1091. Would you think that it would be desirable to reduce the number of hours; we will say, taking off one or two hours in the evening, under the present system, rather than carry out the proposal in the present Bill, which is to stop all consumption on the premises?—I think both would be grumbled at very much, but I think that the restricting the hours would be acquiesced in by all.

1092. Do not you think that if you curtailed the hours of opening so that they should be closed at nine o'clock at night, you would give much less inconvenience to people than you would if you closed on the plan proposed by the Bill, that is, of closing it entirely for consumption on the premises, and merely allowing drink to be purchased to be taken off the premises during certain hours?—Yes, I think so; nine or half-past nine, or whatever hour it might be.

1093. Chairman.] Would you prefer that drinking should be allowed on the premises for a limited period, or that it should be prohibited on the premises altogether?—I think if you could introduce it, it would be an advantage allowing drinking on the premises for a limited period.

1094. Do you think that that would be better than what is proposed in the Bill?—I think that there would be a difficulty, as many would consider it a hardship in not being allowed to drink in the house.

1095. You think it would be fairer and better, if there is to be a restriction, that the restriction should be as to the hours and not as to the place?—That is quite my opinion.

1096. Mr. Hibbert.] Do not you think, from the experience which you have had, that if you make a great change all at once it might cause a sort of reaction against the law, and that it would be better to carry out a gradual system of restriction?—Decidedly so.

1097. You state that there were no complaints about the restrictions imposed by Mr. Wilson Patten's Act?—No, not that I remember.

1098. You have given in returns with respect to the six months previous to the passing of Mr. Wilson Patten's Act, and six months after its passing; could you give returns for the six months after the repeal of that Act; that is to say, the first six months under the present law?—Yes, very readily.

1099. Mr. Frederick Stanley.] You stated your opinion that any discontent which might be caused by further restriction would wear out in time; may I ask upon what that opinion is based?—I think that any reform or any measure of any description whatever might be objectionable to certain parties.

1100. You are aware that Mr. Wilson Patten's Act was a restrictive Act in one sense of the word?—Yes.

1101. And are you not aware that it met with a great deal of opposition locally amongst the populations of large towns?—No, not to my recollection.

1102. Are you not aware that it was repealed within a comparatively short date of its being passed?—Yes, the next Session of Parliament.

1103. Are you not aware that that repeal was owing to the dissatisfaction generally felt in the country with the working of that Act?—Doubtless it was, but from my own recollection I do not remember any symptoms or strong expressions of discontent with the Act.

1104. Colonel Fane.] Were you chief constable of Liverpool at that time?—Yes, I have been so 16 years.

1105. Mr. Frederick Stanley.] You have stated also in answer to a question that there are not many excursion trains running out of Liverpool on a Sunday?—Very few, if any.

1106. You are aware that there are a good many steamers running there on Sunday?—Yes, but there are no excursion trains.

1107. The steamers, in fact, take the place in Liverpool to a great degree that excursion trains do in other places?—Quite so.

1108. A number of people go to the opposite ferries, leaving Liverpool early in the morning and returning in the summer time late at night, do they not?—They do.

1109. And many of them on returning go to public-houses for the purpose of refreshment, not with the object of getting drunk, but of bonâ fide refreshment?—Yes, they do.

1110. Do not you consider that any restriction on the hours at night would produce great inconvenience to those people?—I think they would arrange to meet the hours. If the houses were shut at half-past nine, they would arrange to meet that.

1111. Is it not the fact that many of those excursion parties return at a later hour than nine at night?—Yes, they do.

1112. And to parties returning after that time there would be the inconvenience of finding no place of refreshment open?—There would be that inconvenience.

1113. Is that a class of persons whom you would desire to debar from any justifiable refreshment?—I think that they generally take refreshment with them, but it may be exhausted by the time they came home, if they stay late.

1114. In a case where it is exhausted, it is not

Major
J. J. Greig,

of very much use to them when they come home?—No, certainly not.

1115. Colonel Fane.] Sir Thomas Henry, the chief magistrate of Bow-street, was here the other day; he expressed the opinion that figures were very often extremely fallacious; that is one reason why I should like to ask you whether, in almost all cases where the police are in question, more especially cases where a man or a woman is brought up 30 or 40 times, each case is put as a separate case of drunkenness?—Yes, that individual would represent 30 or 40 persons.

1116. Consequently, in all those cases they are more or less fallacious; there is no doubt that the man or woman has again got drunk, but they are not fresh cases, taking the number of people who get drunk; it would be more or less fallacious, would it not?—It would represent so many more.

1117. Mr. Locke.] Do you mean that there are so many cases of drunkenness, but not so many drunken people; that is what your statistics would represent?—Yes.

1118. Have you read this Bill?—I have; it is a very short one.

1119. Have you arrived at a conclusion as to precisely what the number of hours are during which, in the country, public-houses may be open on Sunday for the purpose of selling beer or spirits to be consumed off the premises. They are to be open at one and shut at half-past two; then to close from half-past twelve to eight, and then from eight until ten to open again, for the purpose of selling wines, spirits, and so forth, to be taken away and consumed off the premises; that makes altogether during the Sunday 3½ hours, does it not, during which those things may be bought to be taken off the premises?—Yes.

1120. Then you are aware that, except where it is provided otherwise with respect to the metropolis, none of those articles can be consumed at all on the premises during the whole of Sunday?—Quite so.

1121. You say, do you not, that you think that proposition objectionable as to restricting the sale of liquor to be consumed on the premises, and entirely doing away with the right to do it?—I think it would lead to great discontent and grumbling, but the curtailing the hours would not.

1122. Curtailing the hours during which it might be drunk on the premises, you think, would not?—No.

1123. Supposing you were a legislator drawing a Bill, what hours would you give?—I do not feel myself in a position to speak upon that point.

1124. If you were an autocrat, what would happen to the people under your direction; what do you think you would say, supposing you were to do exactly as you liked upon this question; what number of hours would you have the houses open?—Then I answer that question by saying, I think an hour and a half in the middle of the day and an hour and a half in the evening would be sufficient.

1125. What part of the evening?—After church hours; from eight to half-past nine, or half-past eight to ten.

1126. And in the middle of the day, from one till when?—Till half-past two; that would be clear of the churches going in.

1127. Then you would allow persons to drink on the premises as well as to buy things to take them off?—Yes, I think so.

1128. You do not differ with this Bill except 0.69.

as to half-an-hour; this Bill says from eight to ten, and from one to half-past two in the country; but you would say that in addition to their being allowed during those hours to buy those articles to be consumed off the premises, you would allow them to be consumed on the premises sometimes?—Yes, I think so, on account of the opposition that would be caused by the Act compelling them to take the liquor away, and not to drink it on the premises.

1129. Mr. Bright.] In that case, I understand you, you would only really limit the hours, but leave the buying and the consumption exactly the same as it is now?—Yes, the same as now, on account of the opposition it would meet with. It would be a great point to carry; but it would meet with great opposition.

1130. But apart from the opposition, what would you think of it?—I think it would be an advantage that they should have to take the liquor and consume it at home.

1131. Apart from the opposition, you would recommend that the principle of the Bill should be adopted?—Yes. In one way I hardly would recommend it, on account of the opposition which it would excite; but apart from the opposition, I think it would be an advantage.

1132. Mr. Locke.] What do you think that opposition arises from; people do not like it, I suppose?—No, they do not.

1133. Do you think it would be advantageous to pass laws that the great bulk of the people do not like?—With submission I am not qualified to answer that question; I do not feel in a position to do so.

1134. You have not given any particular attention to this species of legislation; that is, restricting people without asking them what their views are upon the subject?—My attention is connected with every matter that can happen in a large town.

1135. In a large town like Liverpool, I presume that persons wish to have all the accommodation they can obtain, do they not, and to use it if they please, and not to be forced at any time to go into a public-house, but to have the opportunity of going there if they like, and they would prefer not to be restricted?—Doubtless that class of people who would never be out of a public-house would; but I think the respectable part of the community would not grumble much at those restrictions if they had an opportunity of obtaining their beer twice a day.

1136. Still they would like an opportunity of going to the public-house if they pleased, would they not?—There are a variety of dispositions; some would.

1137. But they need not go unless they liked?—Of course not.

1138. You have been asked with regard to excursion trains, and so forth; but are there not a class of people in Liverpool, as everywhere else, who are obliged to buy their beer at public-houses and take it home to their meals, particularly on Sunday?—Yes, particularly on Sunday.

1139. Do all the people in Liverpool, who buy beer to be taken to their houses to be consumed at their meals, dine precisely at the same time?—I do not know; I suppose the hour for dining is about one o'clock, as far as I can judge.

1140. Is that the case with all people who buy beer to be consumed off the premises?—The working classes dine, as a rule, about one o'clock.

1141. But are there no other persons but the working working classes who buy beer to be consumed in their houses at their meals on Sunday?—I do not think the gentry do.

1142. But is there nobody in Liverpool but the gentry and the working classes?—If you will tell me what class you mean I will be glad to give an answer.

1143. I mean the shopkeepers, the middle classes as they are called?—I fancy that they provide for themselves.

1144. But do you know whether they do or not; have you had any opportunity of knowing?—I have had this opportunity, that I go about the town a great deal, sometimes on horseback, and sometimes on foot, both Sunday and Saturday and other days; and on Sunday, I judge of the dinner hour of the working classes, by seeing persons coming from the ovens, and then if you go to another part of the town, the working class part of the town, you see women with jugs going and getting beer, and then in another part of the town you do not meet those persons going out for beer.

1145. Not so much?—No, not by any manner of means. I have described three parties, the working classes, the gentry, and the shopkeepers; I think the working classes do, I do not think the shopkeepers on a Sunday do it.

1146. Do they never buy beer from the public-houses?—There might be exceptional cases, but as a general rule they do not.

1147. You do not see them in such numbers as amongst the poorer classes?—No, certainly not.

1148. Still it would be convenient to others, besides the working classes, to have an opportunity of purchasing beer which must be bought and brought to the house to be drunk fresh at other hours than between one and half-past two, supposing they dine at three or four?—I think that a shopkeeper could keep his beer; in the first place he might not be induced to send for it, and in the other case, he might get it in bottle.

1149. Supposing he preferred draught beer to bottled beer, you would give him that advantage?—I cannot say anything about that.

1150. Is the point at which you are to stop in the limitation under this Bill, to be the point where it becomes intolerable, or can you find out any other point, before that, at which you would stop?—The question perplexes me; I do not know how to answer it.

1151. Do you think that it is necessary that those regulations should become intolerable to persons, or do you not think that if there is only great inconvenience you ought not to put on these limitations?—Intolerable is a very strong word; I must still say that I hardly know how to reply to your question; I am sorry for it, but so it is.

1152. Would you stop before it became intolerable?—Yes, certainly; intolerable means not to be borne.

1153. Then its being intolerable is not the limit?—No.

1154. Do you say that 214 houses are shut up on the Sunday, and they belong to two gentlemen?—No, pardon me for saying so; I said that there were 214 premises which have spirit licenses attached to them, which shut entirely on Sunday, and of that number 156 are entirely public-houses, and the other 58 are restaurants, and hotels, and so on.

1155. But did not you say that those belonged to two gentlemen?—A large proportion of them do belong to Mr. Walker, an eminent brewer, and Mr. Rigby; both are members of the town council.

1156. Those gentlemen own the principal part of the 214 which are shut?—Yes; but before those two gentlemen touched those houses, there were between 50 and 60 which did shut up.

1157. Why were those 50 or 60 shut?—Some of the publicans were church-going people, and others went to the country, and so on; they gave various reasons, and a great many of them said that they preferred giving themselves rest by shutting up.

1158. In what part of the town were those houses?—Principally in the centre of the town, or rather branching out from the centre of the town.

1159. Is that the best part of the town?—It is the most crowded, the most populous.

1160. I mean to say is it the best built?—No.

1161. How many houses were left open beyond that, when those were shut up within that district?—The total number of public-houses is 1,942. There is a column in the return, giving the number of those not doing business; and the return shows that out of that large number of public-houses, 1,942, there are 61 which are not doing business, the premises being under alteration, or not let, as the case may be; but 61 is the figure.

1162. That 1,900 would afford quite sufficient accommodation, would they not, without those which are shut up?—It is a large number.

1163. There are all kinds of people at Liverpool, are there not; sailors, and so on?—Yes; the floating population, on the average, is 20,000, increased by a west wind, and decreased by an east wind.

1164. Are those sailors who merely come into the port, or do they belong to Liverpool?—Not only do not a large proportion belong to Liverpool, but there is a large proportion of foreign tonnage.

1165. What proportion do you say of foreign sailors, and men of that description, are in Liverpool; what number do you say?—About 20,000.

1166. Where do those men live when they are in Liverpool?—Some of them live in the Sailors' Home.

1167. What is provided for them in the Sailors' Home?—They get bedding, and board, and so on.

1168. Do they get wine and spirits?—I do not think that they go in for much wine.

1169. Do they get any spirits?—I do not entirely know, but I believe not.

1170. As to those who do not live in the Sailors' Home, do they live in lodgings or where?—I do not think that they are very particular where they live sometimes.

1171. Is it not necessary that they should have some houses to go to, to refresh themselves?—Quite so.

1172. What are they to do, supposing all these houses are to be shut up on Sunday entirely, and they are not to be allowed to go into them to get any refreshment, unless they take it off the premises, and consume it off the premises; what is to become of those sailors?—They could get refreshment in hours I have suggested.

1173. Mr. Horsfall.] Are there not a number of licensed lodging-houses in Liverpool?—Yes, and of refreshment-houses.

1174. Mr. Locke.] Would it not be inconvenient venient to those men if all those places were to be shut up?—No, not with two opportunities of getting drink.

1175. I am speaking of this Bill; supposing this Bill were passed, and the public-houses were shut up the whole of Sunday, those men not being allowed to go in at any period on Sunday to drink anything on the premises, would not it be a hardship to them?—I think it would be a hardship being obliged to take it off the premises.

1176. Do not you think it would be a great hardship to all those men who have got no dwellings of their own in Liverpool?—No, because there are a great many houses very ready to receive them.

1177. But they do not supply them with those articles?—Where the sailors live there are a great many eating-houses where they can get refreshment.

1178. With regard to the refreshment-houses, do they sell wine and ale and spirits on the premises?—The refreshment-houses do not.

1179. Have they no spirit license?—No.

1180. Have they a beer-house license?—They have merely a refreshment license, which they get from the Excise.

1181. Cannot they, under that refreshment license, obtain a license to sell wine?—They can.

1182. And do they sell wine?—When you come to a wine license, before you get a wine license you must have a refreshment license. The confectioners and eating-houses have wine licenses, which the Excise grant; but the application must go through the justices, and the police report upon those wine licenses whether the place is suitable: it may be in a bad neighbourhood, or the house may be too small, and the justices have the power to withhold the license; they do not always grant it.

1183. How many do you suppose there are of those refreshment-houses in Liverpool which are licensed for the sale of wine?—About 50, I think.

1184. Have they likewise a license to sell beer, because of course they can obtain it?—No, they have not.

1185. Why have they not?—I do not know; if they apply for a beer license, they can have it; but that is a matter between them and the Excise.

1186. Then it is a matter merely of paying for it?—Yes; three guineas for the license.

1187. In the pastrycooks' shops in London they sell both wine and beer, do they not?—In Liverpool they must have a wine license to sell it.

1188. And so they must in London; but they do sell it in the pastrycooks' shops in Liverpool?—Yes.

1189. Do not they sell Bass's ale there too?—I suppose they do.

1190. Then they have both licenses; now supposing this Bill becomes an Act precisely as it is, would not all those refreshment-houses likewise be obliged to close throughout the whole of Sunday, as far as any consuming on the premises is concerned?—That would depend upon the Legislature.

1191. Look at it; you have read the Bill, you say; you observe it does not say, "licensed victuallers;" it says this, "shall, as respects the sale of the liquors aforesaid, when sold for consumption off the premises, be extended to the following hours, that is to say, from half-past two to eight in the afternoon, and from 10 to 11 in the afternoon; and as respects the sale of the liquors aforesaid, when sold for consumption on the premises, to the whole of the said day;" that applies everywhere?—Yes.

1192. And, therefore, those places likewise would be all shut up?—No doubt; and if they were not, it would give them an undue advantage over the public-houses.

1193. Then, in point of fact, there would be no place where, with the exception of those three and a half hours during the whole of Sunday, anybody could go to get any refreshment unless it was to be taken off the premises; that would be so, would it not?—Yes.

1194. And you say, I think, that that would be a great inconvenience?—Yes.

1195. I have one question to ask you about this overlaying of children, as I understood it; it was stated that on the Sunday there were 36 children overlain?—Yes.

1196. In answer to the honourable Member for Oldham, you stated, did you not, that the 36 would apply to Saturday night?—I hold that the case would be reported on Sunday in my books.

1197. On Sunday morning?—Yes.

1198. Then the children would have been overlain during the Saturday night?—Yes, and on the Sunday morning.

1199. This is a return of inquests held upon infants found suffocated in bed with their parents on each morning of the week for the year 1867, and the term "suffocated" includes those children overlain; then on Sunday morning there were 36, and those must have been suffocated on the Saturday night or the Sunday morning; if that was occasioned by drunkenness, must not the person have got drunk on Saturday?—No, the streets are not clear at midnight.

1200. Colonel Fane.] The public-houses close at 12 o'clock, do they not?—Yes; but still the streets are not clear.

1201. Mr. Locke.] You stated in your evidence that the very worst two hours throughout the whole of the week were from 10 to 12 on Saturday night, then, I presume, you meant by that to say that between those hours of 10 and 12 on Saturday night, more people got drunk than in any two hours throughout the whole week?—Yes; I said that those two hours were the two worst, and I do not depart from it.

1202. Would this Bill remedy that; would not it make it rather worse than better, because a person would have no choice between the Saturday night and Sunday, which he has at the present time to a certain extent?—I hardly know how to reply to that question.

1203. Shutting up the public-house on Sunday could not affect a man getting drunk between 10 and 12 on Saturday night, could it?—I do not think it could.

1204. Therefore the passing of this Bill would not alter at all the number of children who are overlain on Saturday night and Sunday morning?—No.

1205. Then, as far as this number 36 in these statistics is concerned, it does not exactly apply to this particular case?—No.

1206. With regard to your statistics as to drunkenness, as mixed up with the other offences, you mention stabbing and so on; how do you arrive at that. Let us take a calendar of prisoners who are to be tried for offences which you very frequently see. Stabbing would be one of those offences, but how would it appear in the calendar, that the man who committed the offence was drunk?—There is in every bridewell what is called main bridewell, which is the head quarters of all those prisoners, and there are a great many out bridewells, district bridewells. Wherever there is a bridewell and a prisoner locked up, there is always what is called a charge-book, and in this there would be entry of "stabbing when drunk."

Major

1207. The indictment would not contain that, would it?—That is a matter for the clerks to the justices.

1208. Take any calendar supplied to any court; you always have put against a prisoner whether he can read or write at all, and whether he does it imperfectly or well; but with regard to drunkenness, there is no column for drunkenness in the calendar, either at the assizes or anywhere else; is there?—Not except it is coupled with a graver offence. I have not the preparing of those sheets for the assizes or the sessions, but I have my own statistics.

1209. I only want to know how you arrive at the fact of the number of persons who have been drunk, coupled with some other offence?—From the charge sheet; it is an entry in the charge sheet at the different bridewells.

1210. But a man has never been convicted of drunkenness, he has only been convicted of the other offence?—I have nothing to do with him after that; he passes through my hands. I am responsible for those books, that a proper entry is made and produced before the justices.

1211. Mr. John Abel Smith.] What is your exact position in Liverpool as head constable; have you any superior officer over you?—No, I am chief of the police.

1212. You dictate to others, but you receive no orders from anyone?—I serve under the watch committee, who are a section of the town council, and act as well under the justices.

1213. How often are you in the habit of going to the bridewell?—Every day of my life.

1214. On Sunday do you go there?—Every Sunday.

1215. And do you see the prisoners?—Yes.

1216. When you are speaking of the habits and characters of the people who are brought in, you speak not only from those returns, but from ocular inspection?—I speak of the state of the town more from my personal observation than from statistics. When I say that drunkenness has decreased, those figures show it to be so; but my personal observation tells me to the contrary.

1217. With regard to vice generally in the town, is Liverpool worse than Manchester as to houses of bad repute?—That is a disadvantage which we labour under in Liverpool; because in Manchester, speaking from their statistics, there are 388 houses of bad repute, I mean brothels, and in Liverpool there are 927.

1218. Do they sell spirits in any of them?—No.

1219. Mr. Horsfall.] Are there not a large number more of public-houses in Liverpool than in Manchester?—Yes.

1220. About three times as many, I think?—

I think, speaking out of book, that in Manchester there are a great many more beer-houses than in Liverpool; but Liverpool exceeds Manchester very much in public-houses.

1221. Mr. Roebuck.] Can you tell me the difference between the population in Manchester and in Liverpool?—Glasgow and Manchester I always look upon as sister places, and I should think that the population in both of them is under that of Liverpool.

1222. Does that include Salford?—I think Captain Palin, who is the chief constable of Manchester, is here, and he can speak with confidence to that which I do not know; in my own case I speak with reference to the area of the borough, which is 7½ miles.

1223. Colonel Fane.] Does the police district extend beyond the borough?—No; it is the country beyond the borough.

1224. Mr. Bright.] How many places in Liverpool holding spirit licenses are shut up altogether on Sundays?—Two hundred and fourteen.

1225. Of those, how many are public-houses?—One hundred and fifty-six.

1226. Of those 156, how many are under the power, or rather, are the property of the two brewers to whom you refer?—I think about 50, or more.

1227. Do you believe that there are 100 public-houses in Liverpool that are closed on Sunday by the action of the occupiers themselves?—Yes.

1228. Have you had any conversation with licensed victuallers on the question which is before this Committee?—No, except those two gentlemen whom I refer to.

1229. They are brewers, and not licensed victuallers?—They are great proprietors of public-houses.

1230. Has it ever come before your observation that licensed victuallers object to closing their houses voluntarily, on the ground that others would keep open?—I think that that operates very much; I think that if they could come to an understanding between themselves, they would have no objection to curtailed hours; but they do not like to shut when their opposite neighbour is open.

1231. Assuming that there is a considerable demand from public opinion for it, if the law were made more restrictive on the Sunday, and made universal, the objection that licensed victuallers would have, would in their opinion be greatly modified?—I think so.

1232. Have you had any opportunity of discussing this question with any of those licensed victuallers whose houses are closed, with regard to the advantages to their families of having Sunday as a day of rest, as other people have?—No.

1233. Have you had any experience of the evil to the families of licensed victuallers, or to the licensed victuallers themselves, from their pursuing their ordinary calling seven days in the week instead of six, as other people do?—No.

1234. The honourable Member for Southwark asked you, in reference to your observation as to the discontent that would arise if their Bill were in operation preventing any consumption on the premises, whether there would be great discontent; do you consider that that discontent would be from the general public, or merely from the limited class who would like to go on any day in the week when they had a chance, and sit down in a bar parlour and drink?—From that class.

1235. Taking

1235. Taking Liverpool, where that class probably is as numerous as in most places, do you think that that class is sufficiently numerous to create any observable discontent?—It would consist principally in expression more than in act.

1236. But the general public of Liverpool, the great bulk of them certainly, do not go to public-houses on Sunday; would they be discontented with the operation of the Bill?—I think not.

1237. If you take every merchant and every professional man, and every shopkeeper, and the great majority of the working men, is it your opinion that they would be discontented with any restriction which this Bill proposes to establish?—I have had many conversations with persons in different stations in life, and all parties, I think, would be quite satisfied, and would be pleased if they had the two opportunities of getting what they want and taking it home.

1238. But the class that likes to sit down in a bar parlour and drink on a Sunday, or on any other day, would be the class that would be discontented to a certain extent?—No doubt. A man who sits long in a public-house I look upon not as a man who goes and gets a glass of beer and leaves, but is a drunkard who would remain in a public-house.

1239. You would hardly recommend the Committee or Parliament to regulate their legislation by the opinion of the class that likes to sit down in public-houses and drink on Sunday?—I do not like to answer that question.

1240. The reason I put the question to you is because of what you said about the discontent that might be created. It is essential for the Committee to know whether, in your opinion, the discontent may be said to be confined mainly to those who would like to go to a public-house on Sunday and sit and drink there?—Entirely confined to them.

1241. If you were asked to give your opinion as to the vast majority of the women in Liverpool, the wives, and sisters, and daughters; and mothers of working men, do you think that there would be any difference of opinion amongst them as to the advisableness of greater restriction; would they be for it or against it?—The women would be very much for it, I think; it would make a very great difference to their own homes.

1242. Mr. Roebuck.] To test the value of your opinion as to the feelings of licensed victuallers, you say that the feeling now amongst them is, that if one were to shut up his shop, the other would not, and therefore he would be placed at a disadvantage in the competition of life?—Yes.

1243. But you say that if that restriction were extended to all of them, there would not be the sort of discontent that is expressed now when that great monopoly would be created?—In my opinion, if the restriction of hours applied to all, the licensed victuallers themselves would not be dissatisfied.

1244. Have you any idea of the number of licensed victuallers who have petitioned against this Bill?—No.

1245. If you were told that they have presented petitions containing the names of half a million of persons against this Bill, would you say then that your appreciation of the feelings of the licensed victuallers was in accordance with their petition?—That is opposed to my opinion. I cannot speak for the licensed victuallers of England generally, but I think that the licensed victuallers of Liverpool would accept it, and not with dissatisfaction.

Captain WILLIAM HENRY PALIN, called in; and Examined.

1246. You are the Chief Constable of Manchester, are you not?—I am.

1247. How long have you occupied that office?—Rather over 11 years.

1248. Previous to which, what was your position?—I was in the Indian army.

1249. Are you acquainted with the provisions of the Bill before the Committee?—I am.

1250. Does Sunday drinking to excess prevail to a large extent at Manchester?—No doubt of it.

1251. Have you many cases of drunkenness under the cognisance of the police?—Yes.

1252. Can you state to the Committee whether their numbers are greater or less on Sunday than on any other day?—That would be a matter of opinion, I apprehend, because it depends really upon what would be called Sunday drinking.

1253. Taking the hours within the period of which Major Greig spoke, four p.m. Sunday and four a.m. on Monday, would you say that the number of persons arrested for drunkenness was greater on Sunday or less than on any other day?—Not greater. I have prepared a return in anticipation of being questioned upon this subject of the number of persons locked up on charges of drunkenness, and charges in which drunkenness is involved, between one o'clock on Sunday at noon, when the opening of the houses commences, and four o'clock on Monday morning; and I think it would be nearly the same as if we took the hours 0.69.

from four o'clock on Sunday morning, because there are not many people who are brought up for being drunk at that time.

1254. Will you state the result of that return?—The return is for six years. The number in 1862, between one p.m. on Sunday and four a.m. on Monday, was 608; the number during the rest of the week was 5,919. In 1863 the number was 637 on Sunday, and 5,916 for the rest of the week.

1255. Consequently the number was less on the Sunday than on the average of other days?—Yes; I have taken the average out; there is no doubt about it that the average is less. The average number per Sunday, I may say, for 1867 for those hours, was 21.78, compared with 33.21 for the other days.

1256. Have you the number belonging to Saturday?—No, not for Saturday by itself.

1257. Should you say that the numbers were much greater on Saturday than on any other day?—Yes, I think considerably greater.

1258. Are many persons taken up drunk on Sunday forenoon, during the hours when the public-houses are not allowed to be open?—Not so many on Sunday forenoon; that is to say, after sunrise there are not many; most of those who are taken up are taken up in consequence of drinking on Saturday night.

1259. The closing of the public-houses during a certain number of hours does almost prevent drunkenness drunkenness during those hours, does it not?—Certainly.

1260. Do you think that if the hours of opening were restricted, as proposed by the Bill, it would be possible to prevent drunkenness to a much greater extent?—It is very difficult to answer that question; I am not prepared to give a definite opinion upon it.

1261. Is it not the case that there is some peculiarity in the way in which those statistics are kept in Manchester?—There was, perhaps, this difference, that those persons who were entered as charged with drunkenness, and appear so in the returns, do not represent all who are locked up for drunkenness. There are some prostitutes, for instance, many of whom are really drunk, but they would not appear in the return as being charged with drunkenness. Then there are carters and persons drunk in charge of horses and carts; those persons are locked up and charged before the magistrate under the Police Act under a special heading, and they do not appear in the returns as being charged with drunkenness; if they were, they would certainly alter the returns to some extent, and increase the numbers.

1262. Do those figures which you have been giving include what are called refused cases?—Yes, those figures which I have been giving include all the persons that have come under the observation of the police for drunkenness; those who are entered as being drunk and drunk and disorderly; drunken carters, drunken prostitutes, and also those who have been taken to the station, and liberated when sober.

1263. It is your opinion, is it not, that the number of cases taken up by the police are on the increase?—They are considerably increased.

1264. Have your police force been increased?—It has within 12 months; but the greatest increase of drunkenness took place before the increase in the police force.

1265. Mr. Hibbert.] You have only given a return for the three years, 1862, 1863, and 1867; can you give no returns for the year 1864, 1865, and 1866?—Yes; I have such a return, of which I can give the Committee a copy.

1266. Chairman.] But you cannot state, as your opinion, whether the further restriction of the hours of opening would be effectual?—I cannot state that.

1267. Should you say that it would interfere greatly with the habits of the people who use public-houses?—Certainly, of those who use public-houses.

1268. A Bill contemplating that there should be no sale of liquor for consumption on the premises, would that greatly interfere with the habits of a large number of people in Manchester?—Certainly, with their habits, most unquestionably.

1269. Without speaking of those who consume spirits, especially to excess, would it interfere greatly with the habits of those who resort to public-houses to refresh themselves with beer?—Yes, it would interfere with their habits also, because there are many persons who go to those houses to sit and take their beer, and smoke on Sunday evening, and use it as their sitting room.

1270. Would the ability to purchase drink during three or four hours a day not meet the wants of people of that class?—It might meet their legitimate wants, but whether it would meet the wants of all those persons, I am not prepared to say.

1271. Have you any opinion whether such a change would inconvenience persons who do not resort to public-houses; small tradesmen, for example, who merely send to the public-house for their beer?—No, I do not think it would inconvenience them; I think it would fairly meet their wants.

1272. Do you think that such a change as is proposed, would be very unpopular in Manchester?—My own opinion is, that it would not be so very unpopular.

1273. You think that they would submit to it, when they got accustomed to it?—I think so.

1274. Would you anticipate great difficulty, for a time at least, in enforcing the law, in preventing the sale of liquor at illegal hours?—We should have some difficulty, I have no doubt at first, there would be attempts to evade the law, and the police would have a good deal to do in preventing the sale.

1275. Mr. Bright.] Is there any difficulty now in the working of the law of restriction as it at present stands?—There is this difficulty, that the police have to be employed specially on Sundays to watch beer-houses and public-houses, a considerable number of which are reported during the year, and summoned before the magistrates.

1276. Is that to watch certain of them, or all of them; do not the bulk of them conform to the law?—Yes, many of them conform to the law; I should say the bulk of them do.

1277. Have you any reason to suppose that if any change was made by Parliament, the law would not be equally well observed?—I think the police would have more difficulty than they have at present; if any change were made many beerhouse keepers and licensed victuallers would attempt to evade the law.

1278. Chairman.] Are there many cases of selling liquor in unlicensed houses in Manchester?—We have occasionally cases, but there are not very many.

1279. Mr. Roebuck.] Could you tell me the number of the population within the area over which your jurisdiction extends?—According to the last census in 1861, it was about 338,000 within the municipal borough.

1280. You are of opinion, are you not, that the present restrictions, as by law established, do really, in some degree, diminish the amount of drunkenness?—Yes.

1281. And that, so far at least, restriction has been good?—Yes.

1282. Do you think, from your knowledge of the people, that increased restriction would be followed by increased benefit in the shape of prohibiting drunkenness?—I have not a very strong opinion upon that, but I think that it ought to do so.

1283. While it was doing the good of diminishing drunkenness it would, to a certain degree, do evil, by inconveniencing other people, would it not?—There might and might not be inconvenience. A certain class would be inconvenienced, as I said before.

1284. I put the question just now to Major Greig, and I will put it to you. Supposing that I were a good deal younger than I am, and I wished to walk out on a Sunday evening, and that walking out I became thirsty, and was not able able to obtain in a public-house, as I passed by it, the cause of this law, that refreshment which nature demanded, would not that be an inconvenience?—A temporary one.

1285. But all inconveniences are temporary, are they not?—No; some of them may be permanent.

1286. A man's life is temporary?—I am speaking, of course, within the limits of the duration of a man's life.

1287. If I were to hit you a thump in the eye, it would be a temporary inconvenience, but it would be an inconvenience still?—I apprehend that you would not like to do it.

1288. I merely put it as an illustration of a temporary inconvenience, which may be a great one. Do not you think that that inconvenience would exist under this present Bill?—I said before there would be a temporary inconvenience, but I do not think that it would be a very serious inconvenience.

1289. Are there not to your knowledge large classes of the community who walk about on the Sunday evening perfectly decent people, who behave themselves perfectly well, and who would like a glass of beer during their walk, or after their walk?—Yes, no doubt, many.

1290. Then to prohibit the sale of beer to that decent class, because there is a certain number of persons who will get drunk, is rather a strange sort of legislation, is it not?—I think that in a short time they would be reconciled to it, and would not care for it.

1291. Do you think that in a short time a man would become reconciled to the fact, that on a Sunday afternoon when he was walking and got a little thirsty he could not get a glass of ale, and by use he would accustom himself not to care about drinking?—Certainly, I do think so; habit is second nature, and I do think so.

1292. That then is the answer which you give me to that question?—Yes.

1293. Hitherto we will say that restriction has been beneficial, and then comes the question how much farther ought we to go. What limit do you think ought to be put to restriction?—I am not prepared to give an answer to that question.

1294. According to the present state of the law I think public-houses are open altogether something like eight hours and a half on the Sunday. How much do you think that a wise legislator would restrict the eight hours and a half, speaking to you as a practical man, and having a great deal to do with the administration of justice?—I am not prepared to give any opinion upon that.

1295. You are not prepared to say that there ought to be further restriction?—I am not, as I said at first.

1296. Mr. Horsfall.] Can you tell me the number of public-houses that there are in Manchester?—484.

1297. Do you know the number in Liverpool?—I think I heard Major Greig say 1,942.

1298. Of course the number in Manchester is very much less than in Liverpool?—Yes.

1299. And the drunkenness very much less, according to the statistical returns?—The drunkenness is no doubt less in Manchester than in Liverpool; at the same time statistics are very untrustworthy. I may say that the number of beer-houses in Manchester is considerably greater than the number of public-houses, and greater than it is in Liverpool.

1300. Are you able to trace the cases of drunkenness to the beer-houses and the public houses as regards the numbers from each?—No.

1301. Is no record kept of that?—There is no record kept of it, because we cannot tell when a person is locked up where he has been getting his drink.

1302. What is the number of beer houses in Manchester?—2,406, whereas in Liverpool Major Greig said there were 800 and odd.

1303. You stated, did you not, that drunkenness had rather been on the increase latterly?—It has very much increased during the last two years.

1304. I understood you to state that in 1862 the number of cases of drunkenness were 3,519, and in 1867, 5,196?—No, I said that the total number of persons in 1862 was 6,527, in 1866 9,244, and in 1867, 11,495.

1305. In reply to the honourable Member for Sheffield I think you said that of course some parties would be put to inconvenience by further restrictions being imposed?—Yes.

1306. Chiefly drunkards, I presume?—Drunkards would, of course, and there may be others who would be inconvenienced, persons of drinking habits.

1307. But the others would be the exception?—Yes.

1308. You would not be in favour, I suppose, of an entire closing of public-houses on the Sunday?—I think not.

1309. What further restriction would you suggest on the present law; you heard the evidence of Major Greig, would you be disposed to concur in the opinion that an hour and a-half in the day and an hour and a half in the evening would be sufficient for public-houses to be open, say from one to half-past two, and half-past eight to 10?—Yes, I think that would be quite sufficient.

1310. Mr. Hibbert.] Do you think that it would be desirable to limit it to consumption off the premises, or to allow beer to be consumed on the premises?—I am scarcely prepared to answer that question, for it is doubtful whether it would really decrease the amount of drunkenness, whether it were sold for consumption on or off the premises.

1311. But you think that further restriction upon the present hours, say two or three hours in the day, would decrease drunkenness?—I think it might, and probably would.

1312. Mr. Bright.] Have you had any opportunity of ascertaining the public opinion of Manchester with regard to this question. I do not speak of the particular limits of this Bill, but with reference to the propriety of carrying the existing restriction somewhat further?—I have.

1313. What would you say the public opinion in Manchester would indicate with regard to that; would it sanction some further restriction?—The impression that I gather from what I have heard is that the public would sanction it.

1314. Putting out of view the well-off people who can afford to have everything that they want in their own houses, and who I would not consider much in this matter, looking at the persons who live by their weekly wages, and who do not keep a cellar, would you say that the majority of working men and their wives would sanction some further restriction than that which now exists?—My own opinion is that they would;

I am

Captain

I am bound, however, to say that the opinion of my officers is very divided as to the effects of any further restrictions.

1315. Have you any means of ascertaining the views of any of the licensed victuallers and beer-shop keepers themselves?—No, I have not; some few I may have ascertained, but I should not like to give their views as an expression of the feelings generally of the licensed victuallers or beer-house keepers.

1316. Might not the persons who use public-houses on the Sundays, not speaking of travellers, be divided into two classes; those who go there and recklessly get drunk, and those who go for social purposes, and might probably come home after all sober, after conversation on the topics of the day; you would not say that all those who go to public-houses on Sunday are people who go to get drunk, or who do get drunk?—No, certainly not.

1317. Many moderate and temperate people do that, do they not?—Yes, certainly.

1318. Then both those classes you would include in the one class that would be in a certain degree inconvenienced by further restriction?—Yes.

1319. But taking them together, do the persons who sit in public-houses on the Sunday form a very numerous class in Manchester?—The number is large; there are a good many country people who come in and make use of those houses in the evening.

1320. But excluding those who attend the public-houses, your opinion is, that the great majority of the rest of the public would be disposed to sanction some further restrictions with regard to the sale of intoxicating liquors on Sunday?—I think so.

1321. With regard to the precise restriction, I understand that you would not either express your own opinion or express theirs?—Exactly so; that is my meaning.

1322. I asked a question of Major Grieg with regard to the opinion of the women; some of them unhappily I presume go to public-houses on Sunday, but speaking of the wives and the women of the families of the working men, do you suppose that there could be any more than one opinion with regard to the advisableness of some further restriction; would they approve of it, and would they consider it to be in their interest?—I think they would.

1323. With regard to the licensed victuallers and the beerhouse keepers themselves, are you able to express any opinion from your observation as to the interest which they have in this question, a pecuniary interest in keeping their houses open, and a moral interest in having their houses closed, have you ever formed any opinion with regard to that?—There are many licensed victuallers and beerhouse keepers too who, no doubt, look to pecuniary benefit, and consequently keep their houses open and do obtain a great deal of custom on the Sunday; I am not prepared to say whether they consider the moral aspect of the question.

1324. Among the public-houses and beer-houses in Manchester that you observe and know anything of, must there not be a very large number of them whose receipts on Sunday are very small, and to whom, therefore, the closing under this Bill or closing all together would be a very small matter?—Yes, I think so; there are many of that sort; the numbers that are open and frequented to a great extent are small.

1325. Are there any in Manchester, either public-houses or beerhouses, which are closed by the voluntary action, or I might almost say the good sense, of their occupiers?—There are some.

1326. Do you know at all how many?—I do not know the number, but I believe it to be small; perhaps thirty or forty altogether; I have not a precise return of the number.

1327. Have you had any conversation with them on the subject of further restriction to enable you to say whether if it were general over all the public-houses and beerhouses they would be satisfied with some further restriction?—I have not.

1328. Mr. Evans.] Can you tell me whether in your opinion and your experience much drunkenness takes place during the last hour on which public-houses are open on the Sunday; that is to say, between 10 and 11 on Sunday night?—I think there is more during the later hours than during the earlier hours.

1329. Major Greig said that in his opinion in Liverpool more drunkenness took place during that hour than during the rest of the day?—I understood him to answer the question with reference to Saturday night.

1330. However, you would say that on the whole more drunkenness takes place late than early?—Yes, I think so. It is a natural consequence; those who do get drunk go in, and they add glass after glass till they get drunk, and they come out drunk later on.

1331. Do you think it is likely that a good effect might be produced so far as preventing drunkenness was concerned, if the public-houses were closed one hour earlier on Sunday, other things remaining the same?—I do.

1332. Are there many persons in Manchester who are in the habit of taking all their meals, or any of their meals at public-houses?—Very few. I am not aware of any.

1333. Are there many persons in Manchester who live in lodgings?—Yes, a great many.

1334. Where do they take their meals?—At their own homes; at their lodgings.

1335. You think there are very few who take any of their meals at public-houses?—Very few.

1336. Are there many excursion trains that leave Manchester for different parts of the country on Sundays?—I believe there are some.

1337. Do you know whether the persons who make use of those trains are in the habit of coming back late in the evening?—Yes.

1338. I suppose if that is the case, probably many of them might wish to get refreshment on their return?—Yes.

1339. Supposing the public-houses were closed on Sunday evening at 10 instead of 11, would many persons who have made use of excursion trains in order to spend the day out of Manchester, be prevented from getting refreshment when they came back, or would the trains, generally speaking, bring them back sufficiently soon to enable them to obtain that refreshment?—I think the trains would bring them back sufficiently early.

1340. You think, in fact, that the trains would, generally speaking, bring them back before 10 o'clock at night?—I think so.

1341. I understood you to say that drunkenness

ness had increased during the last two years in Manchester; can you give any reason for that increase?—No, I cannot.

1342. Among those persons who are brought under your notice as being drunk or charged with drunkenness, what proportion do the women bear to the men?—About one-fourth.

1343. Are there three men charged with drunkenness for every woman on the average?—Yes.

1344. Do you think that the proportion of drunkenness among women has increased as compared with men of late years. I mean, do you think that of the whole of the persons taken up for drunkenness, a larger proportion are now women than was the case sometime ago?—The proportion seems to have been much the same.

1345. Can you tell me whether the women who are charged with drunkenness, generally speaking, drink at home, or in public-houses, or beer-houses?—I should say the majority of them at public-houses and beerhouses, vaults, and such places.

1346. Mr. Bright.] With regard to the increase of drunkenness, is it not the fact that during the last two years the employment and means of the people have been very much better than they were for three or four years before in Manchester?—Yes, they have been; but I am not prepared to say that that has had the effect of increasing the amount of drunkenness. During the cotton famine, when a great many were out of employment, drunkenness increased considerably.

1347. Mr. Evans.] Has the population of Manchester increased considerably since the census of 1861?—I think not much; it is very difficult indeed to estimate the population of Manchester.

1348. Mr. John Abel Smith.] Do you know at all what the operation of Mr. Wilson Patten's Act in 1854 was on drunkenness in Manchester?—No, I do not, for I was not in Manchester at the time; and I have failed to observe any difference in the statistics as bearing upon drunkenness.

1349. What year did you go to Manchester?—In the early part of 1857.

1350. Then probably you do not know what the effect of the repeal in 1855 of Mr. Wilson Patten's Act was?—No, I do not; not from my own knowledge, nor from the returns.

1351. Have you any knowledge of the wishes, opinions, and feelings of the working men of Manchester with regard to further restriction?—Not such knowledge as I could speak upon.

1352. Do you believe that there are people who would hail with pleasure greater restrictions?—There are many, no doubt.

1353. Why would they do so?—Many because the temptation would not be put in their way.

1354. Do young men and young women frequent public-houses largely on Sunday?—Yes.

1355. Would that be a motive with the parents for wishing for more restriction?—Undoubtedly it would.

1356. Do you know whether there has been any inquiry at Manchester from house to house to ascertain the feeling of the people upon that subject?—I believe there has, but I am not acquainted with the particulars.

1357. You are not prepared, as I understand you, to give an opinion as to the propriety of further restrictions beyond the existing law?—I am not.

1358. But you think that the present law has acted beneficially in restraining drunkenness?—I believe so.

1359. But you do not think, as I understand you, that further restriction would produce an amount of public inconvenience that would excite any disturbance?—I do not think it would.

1360. You think, do you not, that past restrictions have had the effect of limiting drunkenness?—I can scarcely answer that question, because there has been no alteration in the law with regard to Sunday closing within my experience; nor can I find any statistics that bear upon the question.

1361. There was an alteration of the law in 1864; has that been called into operation at Manchester?—It has.

1362. How has it acted?—It does not appear to have diminished the drunkenness, but it certainly has had a good effect upon the appearance of the town, inasmuch as now between one and four o'clock in the morning, the public thoroughfares which were frequented by persons of the worst classes, are now very much clearer, and the appearance of the town generally is very much better.

1363. Mr. Roebuck.] The streets have in fact become safer between those hours?—Yes.

1364. Mr. John Abel Smith.] You have not considered the question of applying those restrictions further; that is to say, limiting still more the number of hours during which public-houses may be open?—No, I have not considered that question.

1365. Mr. Hibbert.] With respect to the statistics which you gave, you stated that in the year 1867 the average number of cases of drunkenness on Sunday, was 21·78, and the average on other days was 33·21. In making those returns, do you mean that to show that the number of cases of Sunday drunkenness is less than on other days?—Yes, I do.

1366. Have you looked at it in this light, that on Sunday the public-houses are only open 8½ hours, and on other days they are open 20 hours?—I have looked at it in that light, but I have not considered it in preparing these figures.

1367. But would not it be the case that, if we are to take the matter in that light, it would show that really a greater number of cases of drunkenness in proportion to the number of hours occur on Sunday than on any of the week days?—I believe it would.

1368. A very large proportion?—Yes; I believe it would.

1369. When do the greatest number of drunken cases occur?—At night and in the evening.

1370. The houses were open on Sunday for eight hours and a half; that is, from half-past twelve or one to three o'clock in the afternoon, and from five o'clock to eleven o'clock at night; and for that number of hours you have 21 cases?—Yes.

1371. On the other hand, the houses are allowed by law to be open altogether, with the exception of the four hours when they are closed under Sir George Grey's Act; that is, 20 hours; and on those days there are 33 cases?—Yes.

1372. Supposing you take the proportion of the number of hours open on the Sunday, it shows a much greater proportion of cases for the number of hours open on Sunday than you have for the number of hours open on other days?—It would show a greater proportion, no doubt, if you compare the 20 hours on a week day, and the 33 persons on that day, and the eight hours and 21 persons for the Sunday. It certainly would show a greater proportion.

1373. Then the statistics may be put in a fallacious manner. Supposing a person were to say there were 21 cases on a Sunday, and 33 cases on other days?—I scarcely agree with that opinion, because if the houses were open on a Sunday morning for three or four hours longer, it might not increase the number of drunken cases.

1374. But to look at the statistics, at first sight you would say the average on Sunday is less than the average on other days—Yes.

1375. But is not that accounted for by the houses being open a less number of hours on the Sunday than they are on the week days?—I do not know.

1376. With respect to Sir George Grey's Act, which has been applied in Manchester, that has had a very good effect, has it not?—Yes.

1377. That has been adopted by the town council?—Yes.

1378. Do you think that any similar principle could be applied with respect to Sunday closing, allowing town councils to adopt not only the plan of closing on Sunday, either a limited number of hours or a total closing?—I have not considered the subject of leaving it to the town council.

1379. Did the town council have the matter before them for consideration any great length of time before they adapted the Act of Sir George Grey's?—No; it was done in a very short time; I think within a very few months of the passing of the Act; and I believe it was unanimous, or very nearly so.

1380. You say that 30 or 40 publicans close on Sunday in Manchester; do you think that if the publicans had the chance of taking licenses for six days, and having an advantage given them in the amount which they paid for the license, any great number would be inclined to close on the Sunday?—I think so.

1381. Do you think it might be an advantage to the Excise to grant six days' licenses?—I do not know about its being an advantage.

1382. Would you say that a great number of people would be induced to take advantage of them?—Yes, I do think so.

1383. Have the police instructions, with respect to drunken cases, been the same from the year 1862 to the year 1867, during which your statistics exist?—They have.

1384. Mr Locke.] You stated that there were a good many country people who came into Manchester on a Sunday; for what object do they come in?—I cannot say.

1385. Is there any amusement in Manchester on Sunday?—Some public-houses and beerhouses have music on the Sunday.

1386. What sort of music is it; is it the same as on the Chain Pier at Brighton, sacred music?—No; there may be some sacred music; but what I have myself listened to has not been sacred music.

1387. Those places are open on the Sunday?—Yes.

1388. Is there no music outside the public-house on Sunday; no band to play anywhere?—No, I think not; not that I am aware of.

1389. The amusement is left to the publicans entirely?—I believe so, as far as my knowledge goes.

1390. Mr. Roebuck.] Is there music in the licensed victuallers' public-houses, as distinguished from the beerhouses?—Yes, in some of them.

1391. Is that ever taken notice of by the magistrates?—The magistrates have no power to deal with them.

1392. They would have power to refuse the license, would they not?—Of course they have power to refuse the license, but there is no music license.

1393. Mr. Locke.] Even if they had a music and dancing license, or a music license, which is under a special Act of Parliament, it does not apply to Sunday, does it?—There are no music licenses granted in Manchester at all.

1394. What sort of music is it, a fiddle, or what?—All sorts; organs and pianos as well as fiddles.

1395. It is on that account that people come in from the country?—Some of them.

1396. You say that a good many country people come in; they would be inconvenienced if the public-houses were closed, and that would be put an end to entirely, would it not?—It might be put an end to, but I do not know that they would be inconvenienced by it.

1397. Why do they come; I suppose they come because they like it?—Possibly, but they might convey themselves elsewhere; they might do something elsewhere which would do just as well.

1398. Colonel Fane.] There is no other amusement in Manchester, is there?—No.

1399. Mr. Locke.] There is now a class of people who come in for that purpose, and that would be entirely stopped; have you looked to this Bill with reference to the fact that in the country the public-houses are to be shut up entirely on the Sunday, and not open at all for the purpose of selling wine, spirits, or beer, to be consumed in the house; are you aware of that?—I am.

1400. There is no relaxation whatever?—Precisely so.

1401. Do you think that right, or that it would work well?—I do not know that my opinion would be worth much upon that question, for my office is a borough office; and that question has reference more particularly to the country.

1402. I mean in Manchester as opposed to the metropolis; the clause says that, as respects the sale of liquors when sold for consumption off the premises, there are certain hours during which that may be done, but with respect to the consumption of liquors where sold for consumption on the premises, the restriction is to apply to the whole of the said days; that is, Sunday, Christmas-day, and Good Friday; do you think that it would be beneficial to pass a law of that description?—I have already answered a question similar to that, I believe, and said that I am not prepared to give an opinion as to whether it would be right to shut them up altogether, or not.

1403. You have not considered the question?—I have considered it, but I have found it very difficult to arrive at an opinion upon it.

1404. What caused your difficulty?—The fact that there seemed to be such a variety of opinions upon it. As I stated before, my own officers, whom

Captain
W. H. Palin.

1868.

whom I have consulted on the subject, are very equally divided in their opinion.

1405. What do they ground their opinions upon?—It is very difficult to say.

1406. What reason do those persons give who say that it would not be a beneficial thing to adopt this Bill and pass it into an Act?—One of their opinions is that it would lead to drinking in private.

1407. By drinking in private, do they mean persons merely in their own houses alone drinking to excess in private, or persons congregating together to any number, and drinking in a private place?—I do not think it could refer so much to persons drinking in their own houses, but to evasions of the law, by a number of persons collecting together and getting a quantity of spirits or beer into houses, and so drinking it.

1408. Do you know any instances of persons doing that now?—I do.

1409. Can you mention whether or not those instances are to any great extent in number?—Not to any very great extent, but there are some; we have had cases of it.

1410. Will you be kind enough to describe what number of persons congregate in such unlicensed places?—They vary from 15 to 50, I should think.

1411. What do they drink?—Principally beer.

1412. They do that at the present time, although there are licensed houses for them to go to?—Yes.

1413. And you are of opinion that that practice would be very much increased, supposing they had no other place to go to?—It would be increased, but I do not know that it would be increased to any great extent.

1414. Mr. Roebuck.] Referring to those cases which you speak of, under your own knowledge, they drink within the prohibited hours?—Yes, of course; there is no occasion for them to drink in that way when the houses are open; it is on the Sunday morning principally.

1415. Mr. Locke.] If this Bill were to pass, all the hours would be prohibited, would they not?—Yes.

1416. The fashionable time for drinking is more the afternoon than the morning, is it not, or is it all day long in Manchester?—The time when most drink is taken certainly is in the afternoon and evening.

1417. If all the public-houses were entirely closed in the afternoon and evening, do you not think that the number of those illicit houses with no licenses whatever, and where persons congregate in this manner, would be very greatly increased?—Not to any very great extent.

1418. Seeing that there are those houses already, and that persons go to them during the morning when the public-houses are closed; if they were closed altogether would not these persons require more accommodation of that description than they have now?—No, I do not think they would, for the persons who carry on this practice are, generally speaking, a very low class, and I do not think that the number would be increased very much by those restrictions.

1419. Do not you think that persons of a better class than those persons who you say are of a very low class, who resort to this mode of satisfying their desire, might be led into acting in the same way if they had no accommodation whatever at the public-house?—Not to any very great extent; I have a higher opinion of them.

1420. You think that they would do so to some extent?—They might.

1421. You stated, did you not, that during the cotton famine drunkenness increased?—There was an increase of drunkenness at that time.

1422. What was the precise date of that?—One thousand eight hundred and sixty-two.

1423. Do you find that persons who are in very bad circumstances often take to drinking?—It is not that so much; it really was their reduced condition, in consequence of their want of food, I think, that accounted for it.

1424. You stated, did you not, in answer to the Honourable Member for Chichester, that the present law had acted beneficially?—I believe it has.

1425. When you say the present law, what particular enactment do you allude to?—The law as regards Sunday has been in operation for a considerable time, that is to say, there has been no opening of houses for drinking on Sunday morning for many years; and even before that time, in Manchester, our own Police Act required that the houses should be closed to 12 o'clock on Sunday; that was in 1844.

1426. You believe that to have been beneficial?—I believe it to have been beneficial.

1427. Is it what you allude to when you speak of the present Act acting beneficially, that there should be no drinking on Sunday allowed until after half-past 12 or 1 o'clock?—Yes.

1428. And do you think that the restrictions of the hours in the afternoon, after that, have acted in a particular way which is beneficial?—I look at it perhaps more in this light, that if the restrictions which exist at the present time were withdrawn, there would be an increase of drunkenness.

1429. I am speaking of the afternoon, for instance; now, from one to three the public-houses are open, they are closed from three to five, and they are open again from five to eleven; would you see any benefit in closing them any further?—I have answered that question, I believe, and said that I am not prepared to give an opinion upon it.

1430. But you were saying, were you not, that if those restrictions were taken off, drunkenness would increase?—I did not say that; I said I thought it very probable that it would.

1431. It is important to have the houses closed until after one o'clock, but do you think that after one, it is important; for instance, do you think it important to have the houses closed from three to five?—Looking at it as a Sunday question, I think that it is important. I think that the Legislature has defined the hours during Divine service, and for that reason I believe that it is important.

1432. Upon that ground then you think that they ought to be closed?—Yes, certainly.

1433. With respect to any other hours, do you see any benefit?—I think that we may carry it further, and say that, as a Sunday question, in towns particularly, there is just the same reason why they should be closed until after Divine service on Sunday evening.

1434. But that has never been recognised as a service, from seven till nine?—Apparently not; whereas, in the country, service is performed in Captain W. H. Palin. the afternoon; in towns it is invariably in the evening.

1868.

1435. To a person who does not go to all those three services, it might be an inconvenience, might it not?—I do not know what three services you allude to.

1436. The morning, afternoon, and evening. A man might be dining during one of those services, and might want his beer from the public-house?—He may; that is possible.

1437. Mr. Bright.] With regard to what you call excursion trains on Sunday from Manchester, are you quite sure that there are any excursion trains on Sunday from Manchester?—I do not speak positively. I am under the impression that there are some in summer to Southport and Blackpool.

1438. There are regular trains of course from Manchester to the neighbouring towns and back, but excursion trains, I think, are not common?—I may be wrong in that; perhaps the ordinary trains are taken advantage of by excursionists.

JOHN JACKSON, Esq., called in; and Examined.

J. Jackson,
Esq.

1444. Chairman.] Are you Chief Constable of Sheffield?—I am.

1445. How long have you been so?—Nearly 10 years.

1446. Before that what were you?—I was chief constable of Oldham for nearly 10 years.

1447. Have you had experience of the working of the liquor law?—Yes.

1448. Do you understand what is proposed in the present bill?—I believe so.

1449. You understand that it is proposed to close the public-houses entirely (I am speaking of places not in the metropolis) for the sale of liquor to be consumed on the premises; and that for the sale of liquor to be consumed off the premises the public-houses should only be open between one and half-past two, and between eight and ten at night?—Yes.

1450. In Sheffield is drunkenness on the increase or not?—It is on the decrease.

1451. Have you any figures to show that it is so?—I have figures for the last 20 years, showing during the last 10 years the offences committed on Sundays.

1452. Will you state the general result of them to the Committee for the last 10 years?—In 1858, 881 persons were apprehended during the year for drunkenness, and 92 only on Sundays, namely, 78 men and 14 women. In 1859, 1,009 were proceeded against for drunkenness, 139 being on Sundays, that is to say, 116 men and 23 women. In 1860 there were 875 cases, 144 on Sundays, 126 men and 18 women. In 1861 there were 965 cases, and 183 on Sundays. In 1862 there were 794 cases, 164 being on Sundays. In 1863 there were 1,109 cases, 180 being on Sundays. In 1864 there were 952 cases, 151 being on Sundays. In 1865, there were 1,113, 184 being on Sundays. In 1866 there were 931 cases, 130 being on Sundays; and in 1867 there were 863 cases, 110 being on Sundays.

1453. Mr. Roebuck.] During these 10 years can you tell us the increase of the population of Sheffield?—Over 50,000. I can also give the proportion of persons proceeded against for drunkenness to the population during the same years, if you wish it.

1439. Have you been in the Victoria Station in Manchester on Saturday evening?—Yes.

1440. And perhaps occasionally in the railway stations of the neighbouring towns?—Not often.

1441. There is a good deal of travelling on Sunday by the few trains that run, is there not?—Yes, a good deal.

1442-3. But would you say that those passengers who come to Manchester, are passengers who come to Manchester for the purpose of seeking some places of amusement, or rather that they are those who live in the neighbouring towns, and who take advantage of the Sunday to go and visit their friends in Manchester and the different towns?—Yes, certainly there are many who come there to visit their friends; when I speak of those who come from the country as going to public-houses on Sunday, I do not mean that all or even any considerable number of them go to those houses. Generally it is local travelling, the visiting of families, relations, and friends.

1454. Chairman.] Will you put in that return?—Yes. (The Witness delivered in the same, vide Appendix.)

1455. That will show, generally, a diminution in drunkenness according to the number of the population?—Yes; in 1852 one in every 87 of the population was proceeded against for drunkenness, and in 1867 one in every 254.9.

1456. To what do you attribute that remarkable diminution?—To a certain extent, to the improved habits of the people, and, perhaps even to a greater extent, to the difference in the state of trade. During the year 1852 trade was unusually good in Sheffield, and during last year it was not so.

1457. In the last few years you would not say that trade had been uniformly dull in Sheffield, would you?—No, not uniformly dull.

1458. But trade has not been so frequently dull as to account for the diminution of drunkenness, owing to the inability of the people to find money to spend on their luxuries?—No; I said it was partly owing to the difference in the state of trade, and partly owing to the improved habits of the people.

1459. But I gather from you that drunkenness has been steadily decreasing, and therefore it would not be correct, would it, to say that that is owing to the state of trade, because trade has not been steadily deteriorating all that time?—No, I do not say so; I say that through the improved habits of the people gross drunkenness does not exist to anything like the same extent that it did 15 or 20 years ago.

1460. Do you think that the restrictions proposed in this Bill could be carried out without causing much inconvenience to the people of Sheffield?—I think not.

1461. Do you think that they would feel the prohibition to drinking in the public-houses, during the whole of Sunday, as a hardship?—A very large number would.

1462. Is the habit of a great proportion of the respectable working people of Sheffield to spend some portion of the Sunday afternoon in public-houses?—A large number do. I am not prepared to say that a larger proportion of the people,

J. Jackson,

people, in Sheffield, go into public-houses on Sundays, than of the population of other towns.

1463. From your knowledge of the habits of the people, is it the habit of a great number of the people of Sheffield to visit public-houses for the sake of refreshment at some time in the course of Sunday.

1464. Undoubtedly. If they were prohibited from doing so it would make a great change in their habits?—It would.

1465. Do you think that they would submit to such restriction cheerfully?—I think not.

1466. I am asking you these questions, with regard to what I understood you to say, was the practice of a great number of people in Sheffield, namely, to visit the public-houses and take their refreshment there at some period of the day on Sunday; if the Bill would permit them to buy liquor to take away at certain hours, do you think that that would fairly meet their wants?—I think not.

1467. Do you think that when they became a little used to it, they would submit cheerfully to such a change in the law as is proposed?—I scarcely think they would; I do not think that the persons, who now frequent public-houses on Sundays, would quietly submit to it. When I say quietly, I do not know that there would be any rioting, but I think they would do as they did in 1854; they would send such representations to Parliament as would induce Parliament to alter, in the next Session, such an Act of Parliament if it were passed in this Session.

1468. Do you recollect the passing of that Act of 1854, when you were at Oldham?—I do, well.

1469. Was it your experience that there were great complaints against it?—No; that Act allowed them to go into public-houses on Sunday evening, between the hours of six and ten, and although it was a restriction upon what they had been previously used to, so far as Oldham was concerned, they would have quietly, in my opinion, abided by it, and it certainly had the effect of diminishing drunkenness considerably.

1470. The restrictions imposed by the Act of 1854 reduced drunkenness considerably in Oldham, and still did not, in your opinion, greatly interfere with the liberal using of the public-house, at certain hours, if people thought fit?—Just so.

1471. Is it your opinion that if this Bill were to pass that line, it would cause serious inconvenience?—It is my opinion.

1472. Mr. John Abel Smith.] Have you any return as to the working of the Act of 1854 in Oldham?—I have none by me; I was summoned here to give evidence before the Committee that was then sitting, and had with me those returns, but the Committee closed their labours the day before I was to be examined, and those returns were never put in evidence, and I have not them by me here.

1473. Can you put them in, do you think?—I am not sure that I can.

1474. Chairman.] Have you any idea what is the feeling in the community of Sheffield as to this question, whether any large class of persons desire that the public-houses should be closed for a greater number of hours than they are at present?—Opinion is very much divided. There is no doubt a large class of persons, workmen, who would like to see further restrictions, and there

1475. There are, you think, a large proportion of the working classes who desire to have greater restrictions?—Yes; I believe so; those being persons who do not now go to public-houses themselves.

1476. But with regard to the classes who do use public-houses, should you say that they would like to be further restricted?—No.

1477. But you do not think that they would object to some further restrictions, provided they were not kept out altogether?—No; I think that the Act of 1854 was a reasonable one.

1478. Can you say that there is one hour of the day, or evening, more than another at which men get drunk?—No; not at which men get drunk; but the hour at which drunkenness is most manifest in the streets, no doubt is the last hour when persons are turned out of the public-houses.

1479. That is the hour at which most cases come under the notice of the police?—Yes.

1480. Do you think that it would make matters much better if that hour arrived a little sooner than it does just now, or would the cases be much the same?—I do not think there would be much difference. It would cause people to get home sooner, and go to bed sooner, and probably on that account they would be more likely to go to their work the next morning.

1481. Do many people in Sheffield resort to the country on Sundays?—Yes; large numbers.

1482. Has that practice increased much in your recollection?—No, I do not think it has much increased.

1483. Mr. Bright.] People do do so?—Yes; many go to Derbyshire and Nottinghamshire, to Worksop, and the neighbourhood of Wharnccliffe, and so on.

1484. Chairman.] I ask whether the practice has much increased?—I do not think it has; I do not know that it is either much more or much less.

1485. Mr. Roebuck.] We have heard from many witnesses that in certain towns drunkenness has increased, and in certain others decreased; I think you say that it has decreased very materially in Sheffield?—It has.

1486. Can you tell me whether it has decreased amongst the women?—I am sorry to say that, taking those brought before the magistrates, I should say not; the decrease amongst women does not bear the same proportion that it does amongst men.

1487. There has been evidence given to the Committee about London, to the effect that although there has been a general decrease of drunkenness, there has been an increase of drunkenness amongst the women; do you think that that is true of Sheffield?—Yes; but the increase is not large.

1488. Have you any idea, or rather any statistics, which would tell us the number of persons who go out by excursion trains on the Sunday throughout the summer months?—That I could not tell you; but a very large number go, not by excursion trains, Sheffield being surrounded by very beautiful scenery; a large number of working people walk, getting out four or five miles into the country.

1489. Those people who walk, I suppose, would require a glass of ale on their walk?—Many would prefer to have it, no doubt.
I require

1490. Would it not be an inconvenience, and something more than an inconvenience, if you were to prevent those persons from taking a very sober glass of beer?—Yes.

1491. If this Bill would do that, would not it be a thing very much discussed by that class of people who take those sort of excursions?—There is no doubt about it.

1492. The classes who take that sort of excursion are very decent and respectable people, are they not?—Very.

1493. Therefore, upon the whole, I may take it as your view of the public opinion of Sheffield, that there is a great division of opinion?—A very great division of opinion.

1494. But that the classes of whom it is now the custom to take a glass of beer at the ale-house would wholly object to this Bill?—I think so.

1495. Mr. Horsfall.] I apprehend that those classes to which the honourable Member for Sheffield has alluded, are a very small minority with respect to the whole population of Sheffield?—Undoubtedly.

1496. You stated that there was no objection taken in Oldham to the Act of 1854; you have not heard any objection to it probably in Sheffield since you were there?—No, I have not heard since I went to Sheffield any objection to it.

1497. And although you think there would exception be taken to the Bill of the honourable Member for Chichester, do you think there would be any objection taken to shortening the hours on the Sunday during which the houses are open?—Some, doubtless, would object to it; but I think it would not only be a minority, but that the minority would be small.

1498. What is your opinion as to the desirableness of shortening the hours of public-houses being open on Sunday?—I always was in favour of the Act of 1854, and am so still.

1499. You would, perhaps, be not indisposed to go a little further?—Personally, perhaps, I should not; but I do not think that the population of Sheffield would quietly submit to go further.

1500. Do you think that the majority would object to an hour and a-half in the morning and an hour and a-half in the evening, for liquors to be drunk on the premises?—I think they would object.

1501. Either in the one case or the other?—I think so.

1502. Mr. John Abel Smith.] You think that that would not be sufficient?—I think not. I think an hour and a half, to be drunk on the premises would be scarcely practicable; you would scarcely be able to get people out at the closing time in the evening if they were only open for an hour and a-half; many persons go in, say, half-an-hour before closing-time.

1503. Mr. Bright.] Practically, it would be a great discouragement to drinking on the premises, would it not?—It would.

1504. So far as the licensed victuallers and beershop-keepers go, they might think it was hardly worth having their premises open for so short a time?—I think that many would not open for so short a time.

1505. That, on the whole, you would consider rather an advantage than otherwise, would you not?—If it tended to diminish drunkenness, I should so consider it.

1506. Looking to the general view, and not pretending that legislation should go in advance of public opinion, but looking to the general opinion, in Sheffield, of all classes, and looking specially to the opinion of the working classes, do you think they would receive some further restriction, not excessive, with general approbation, or, at least, with so much approbation as would quite justify the law?—I think so; perhaps to the extent that I have mentioned; I do not think beyond it.

1507. Still, if the Sheffield people are becoming, by their own good sense, and their improved habits, so much more temperate; that is to say, those who were intemperate are becoming much more temperate, and, from your returns, the intemperate class is less, do you think there would be any difficulty in accommodating some further restrictions to the general view of your town, beyond the restrictions which are now in operation?—I have already said that I think they would submit to the houses being open two hours less in the evening.

1508. That is to say, they are open now from five to eleven on Sundays, and you think that it would be quite judicious to lessen them by an hour at each end, say from six to ten?—I think so.

1509. Mr. Locke.] That was the restriction in Colonel Wilson Patten's Act, was it not?—Yes, it was.

1510. Mr. Evans.] Are there many persons in Sheffield, of the class you are speaking of who take all or any of their meals at public-houses?—No large number, except those who make public-houses their home.

1511. Are there many persons, especially of the working classes, living in lodgings in Sheffield, who take their meals, or any of their meals, at public-houses?—Very few indeed, except such as lodge in public-houses. There are some who lodge in public-houses and beerhouses.

1512. There are many persons, are there not, who leave Sheffield on Sunday mornings by excursion trains?—They go out of town, certainly, in large numbers; I do not know that they go by excursion trains.

1513. Do that class of people come back late, generally speaking?—No, they are generally back about nine in the evening.

1514. If the public-houses were open till 10 a great number of those people would be able to obtain refreshments after their return?—Such refreshments as they would need; they would get some refreshments before they returned, no doubt, and when they returned also.

1515. Mr. John Abel Smith.] Can you give the Committee any description of the working of the Act of 1854 in Sheffield, during the time it was in existence?—No, not being in Sheffield myself, I know nothing of it.

1615. Have you no returns?—I have returns here of persons who were brought before the magistrates during that year and the following years.

1517. You have no return with reference to the period before the Act of 1854 and afterwards?—Except for whole years.

1518. What do they give you?—In 1853, 1,433 were brought before the magistrates for drunkenness. I can only go back, with regard to Sunday offences, to the date of my appointment

0.69.

1549. Supposing that in another place as important as Sheffield, namely, London, you had trains coming in at 10, would not it be inconvenient to close the public-houses at 10 instead of 11, as far as London is concerned?—If a large number of people were coming in at that hour, no doubt it would.
I 2 trains

1550. Assuming that there are a large number of persons coming in by excursion trains on Sunday, would it be advantageous to revert to Mr. Wilson Patten's Act, and close the public-houses at 10 on Sunday instead of 11?—At that time the annoyance was so great that Parliament was induced to alter it, and I think it is probable that they would do the same again.

1551. Was not it a very great grievance in the metropolis?—That is what I understand.

1552. People came up by excursion trains that arrived at 10, and then they besieged all the public-houses to get refreshments; but they were closed to them, as nobody could open?—I know very little about London. I speak only from what I have been told.

1553. There was a universal opinion against it, was there not at the time?—I do not know as to its being universal; I heard it stated frequently.

1554. And you have not forgotten it?—I have not forgotten it.

1555. and there is no reason why you should?—No, I do not know that there is.

1556. You have spoken of those respectable working people who have complete control over themselves, and who if they see liquor, they will not drink, if they do not think it will do them some good; do you think that they are particularly anxious that this Bill should pass?—No, I do not think they are; so far as they are themselves concerned, it is not likely.

1556*. Of course in the case of a person who has control over himself, it is not important to him whether or not this Bill should pass; but it would be inconvenient to him if he wanted to drink some beer, as my friend the Honourable Member for Sheffield has said, on some occasion when he is walking out; do you include that respectable class of people who can restrain themselves amongst those who are anxious for this legislation?—No, I do not class those amongst them; certainly not.

1557. Who are the poor persons who are anxious for the legislation; I presume they include the teetotallers?—No, there are a very large number of very well-disposed persons who are not teetotallers, who are anxious to suppress drunkenness, not because they would be likely to get drunk themselves.

1558. That is so, I know; but the teetotallers are in favour of restriction, are they not?—No doubt of it.

1559. In addition to the teetotallers, are there not likewise a great number of persons who are anxious to suppress drunkenness, and who think that drunkenness can be suppressed by prohibiting public-houses from being open, who are in favour of closing the public-houses altogether, not only Sunday, but week days and at all times?—I do not know about that; I never met a person who was not a teetotaller who would wish to see the public-houses closed both Sundays and week-days; I never had conversations with any men who wished to close the public-houses altogether.

1560. You never met a person of that description who went so far, unless he was a teetotaller, as to say that he would close the public-houses on Sundays and all the days in the week?—I never did; indeed, I never met a person calling himself a teetotaller who went to that extent in speaking to me.

1561. But with regard to that class of people that you have met who are anxious to close the public-houses, during what time are they anxious to close them; is it merely restricted to Sunday, or do they go in for other days of the week likewise?—I think it is Sundays only; I have had no conversation with any one as to closing on the other days of the week.

1562. Then that raises the religious question that the public-houses ought to be closed entirely on Sunday, because Sunday ought not to be desecrated; are there a great number of persons who entertain that view?—No doubt of it.

1563. Are those principally the persons who are very anxious for the Sunday closing?—There are others of the class which I have already described; persons who would not get drunk themselves, but who, knowing that others do get drunk, would like to see restrictions imposed upon those who are not able to keep themselves sober, supposing the opportunities of getting drunk was always presented to them.

1564. They would close the public-houses because there are a certain number of persons who cannot restrain themselves, and who would get into trouble in consequence of going into the public-houses and ruin themselves; and without reference to the other persons who can restrain themselves, and want in a reasonable manner to use those public-houses, they would deprive them of all their advantages for the sake of protecting a set of drunken people against themselves?—They would consider, I think, that four hours on Sunday evening did give them a reasonable opportunity of getting drink if they wished it.

1565. I am not speaking of four hours, but I am speaking of persons who are in favour of this Bill?—You are speaking of persons with whom I have had conversations, and having had no conversation with persons who are in favour of this Bill, I can give you no account of them.

1566. You have had no conversations with persons who are in favour of this Bill; are you against it yourself?—I think it impracticable.

1567. Mr. John Abel Smith.] From your books at Sheffield, can you put in an account of the number of offences in the six months before Mr. Wilson Patten's Act came into operation, and in the six months subsequently?—I could give the numbers, but I could not distinguish Sundays from other days in the week.

1568. In the number of offences which we have heard to day alluded to, are the refused charges included?—It is my practice, if a man is brought into the office on a charge of drunkenness, though the inspector might not lock him up for drunkenness, to summon him before the magistrates, so that every case would come in this list. I have given you an account of all those who were proceeded against before the magistrates, no matter whether they were apprehended at once, or were summoned to appear some other day, and the refused cases for drunkenness are included, unless a case is refused as being wholly untenable. Supposing the inspector were of opinion that the constable had no right to have brought the prisoner in, that the man was not in such a state of intoxication as would justify his apprehension or his interference with him in any way, that would not be put in.

J. Jackson,
Esq.

1868.

1569. I understand you from your answer to Mr. Locke, to be in favour of further restriction than that now existing; but that you are against carrying restriction as far as proposed in this Bill?—Yes; I do not think that the country would submit to it, as far as I am able to judge of it.

1570. Are you in favour of restriction as to the hours, beyond that which now exists?—Yes; I think that Mr. Wilson Patten's Act was right, and that it should have been allowed to remain.

1571. Mr. Evans.] Has drunkenness decreased in Sheffield?—It has diminished considerably.

1572. Has the population increased or diminished?—It has increased very considerably.

1573. In fact the decrease of drunkenness, considering the increase of population, would be very considerable?—I have handed in statistics for 20 years, which show that in 1848, 1 in every 120·3 was proceeded against, whereas last year the number was 1 in every 254·9.

1574. When you mentioned the number of public-houses, does that include beer shops?—No, we have a number of beer shops in addition to the public-houses; 833 licensed to consume upon the premises, and 191 to consume off the premises.

Friday, 1st May 1868.

MEMBERS PRESENT:

Mr. Horsfall.

Mr. Locke.
Mr. Roebuck.
Mr. John Abel Smith.
Mr. Frederick Stanley.

SIR JAMES FERGUSSON, BART., IN THE CHAIR.

Mr. GEORGE GLOSSOP, called in; and Examined.

Mr. G. Glossop. 1575. Chairman.] You are Chief Constable of Birmingham?—I am.

1 May 1868. 1576. How long have you been so?—Eight years.

1577. Previous to which what position did you occupy?—I was Superintendent of the Detective Force in the same town.

1578. Are you aware of the provisions of the Bill before the Committee?—I am.

1579. Have you given much consideration to the working of the present liquor laws?—Not much, except when it has been brought under my notice.

1580. It has been part of your duty to administer them, has it not?—Yes, to carry out the present laws.

1581. Can you state whether, in Birmingham, cases of drunkenness on Sunday have increased or diminished since you have been Chief Constable?—They have increased.

1582. Can you state that positively in figures, or do you give it as a general result?—I can give it in figures.

1583. Would you give us the general result of the variation in the cases of drunkenness reported as arising on Sundays, and I would ask you also, what hours do they comprise of the Sunday?—After six o'clock on the Sunday morning, until 12 o'clock on Sunday night.

1584. What year do you begin with?—With the year 1854. On the Sundays in 1854, there were 124 charges.

1585. Do you include, in those numbers, what we have been told are called refused cases?—No; those are cases which were actually detained.

1586. Could you say whether the number of those refused cases would be much in excess of that?—There would be a few in addition to those.

1587. Is it your practice, as a rule, to detain persons so brought in?—Unless they were able to go home, we should.

1588. If they are very drunk you always keep them?—Yes, and if they were not we certainly would not interfere with them.

1589. What general instructions do you give your police on that matter?—Not to interfere with persons if they are able to go home.

1590. If they are incapable, what do you do with them?—If they are incapable they would be brought to the station, and detained, and taken before the magistrates.

1591. Consequently, there were not many cases of persons brought to the stations and allowed to go away without coming before the magistrates?—Not very many.

1592. Will you go on, and give us the numbers, through the following years?—The total during the year 1854 was 671, and on Sunday it was 124.

1593. Consequently, there was a greater number of cases of drunkenness on the Sunday, on the average, than on other days of the week?—In that year there was; in 1855, that is the year during the operation of the restricted Act, there was a gross total brought in of 585, and on Sunday there were only 63 that year; in 1856 the gross total was 693, and on the Sunday 87; that is the first year since the passing of the present Act; in 1857 the gross total was 817; in 1858, 872; in 1859, 1,213; in 1860, 1,256; in 1861, 1,186; in 1862, 1,266; in 1863, 1,281; in 1864, 1,373; in 1865, 1,706; in 1866, 1,357; and in 1867, 1,330; those are the gross totals.

1594. Mr. Hibbert.] Have you any returns for the Sundays in any of those years?—Yes; in 1852, 1857, 1862, and 1867; in 1852 on the Sundays the number was 131; in 1857, 107; in 1862, 192; and in 1867, 174.

1595. Chairman.] What has been the increase in the population of Birmingham in the corresponding years?—I have not got that.

1596. Generally speaking it has very largely increased?—It has.

1597. Mr. John Abel Smith.] What do you consider approximately to be the present population of Birmingham?—Three hundred and fifty thousand.

1598. Mr. Horsfall.] What was it at the census of 1861?—About 296,000.

1599. Chairman.] Probably it has increased by 100,000 since the year 1854?—Yes.

1600. You would not say that the amount of drunkenness had largely increased according to the population?—It is increased in a stronger proportion, rather than the population; the population has increased, I think, about 30 per. cent. and drunkenness about 35 per. cent.

1601. Mr. Roebuck.] Take the two years, 1866 and 1867; the total in 1866 I think you said was 1,357, and in 1867, 1,330; therefore there is a diminution?—Yes.

1602. Chairman.] Do you recollect the working of the Act of 1854, which closed the public-houses during uring the greater portion of the hours of Sunday?

—Yes.

1603. Do you recollect whether the amount of drunkenness was greatly diminished during the year that that Act was in operation?—It was; I have given you the figures for the year before the passing of the Act, the year of the Act, and the year afterwards.

1604. Was there much complaint of the operation of that Act by the inhabitants of Birmingham?—Yes.

1605. Were those complaints confined to the lower class, or were they pretty general?—It was a pretty general complaint.

1606. Did the respectable inhabitants complain of the inconvenience caused by the Act?—They did.

1607. Do you remember whether there were petitions to Parliament?—There were.

1608. Was there anything like disorder or rioting?—No.

1609. Would it be your opinion that you could diminish drunkenness if similar restrictions were imposed?—No doubt of it.

1610. But on the other hand, if a more stringent law were enacted, as proposed by this Bill, do you think the discontent would be even greater than it was in 1854 and 1855?—I think it would.

1611. Do you think that the public would submit readily to such restriction as would absolutely close public-houses during the whole of Sunday for the consumption of drink on the premises?—All well-disposed persons would be very pleased to see it, but there are a large number of persons who would complain, and would not allow it to pass.

1612. Do you think that all well-disposed persons in the town would be pleased to see it passed?—Yes.

1614. Who have the comforts of home, and do not want the assistance of a public-house?—That is it exactly.

1615. Chairman.] Is it the habit of many of the working classes of Birmingham to use the public-houses as places of meeting on Sunday, without any intention or practice of drinking to excess?—No, I think not.

1616. You think that those who do go and sit in the public-houses are rather apt to exceed?—We have not much drunkenness in Birmingham according to our population.

1617. You appear to have misunderstood my question; is it the practice with many of the working classes to use public-houses as places of meeting without drinking to excess in them?—Yes; they go there in the afternoon.

1618. In fact it is their club-room?—Yes.

1619. Then many such people would object strongly to having them closed during the whole of Sunday?—They would.

1620. You would consider those well-disposed people, would you not; I mean people who use a public-house without abusing it?—They are well-disposed in that sense.

1621. Then you would qualify your statement, would you not, that all the well-disposed persons would like to see them closed?—Yes; I mean the well-to-do people; people who do not frequent public-houses.

1622. That the people who do not use public-houses would have no objection to see them closed?—Yes, that is so.

1823. Is it your opinion that, short of the restrictions proposed by this Bill, you might impose some restriction that would diminish drunkenness without causing much hardship; for example, might the hours of closing be brought down from 11 at night to 10 at night on Sunday, and extended in the afternoon or evening, so as to diminish drunkenness?—That would be acceptable, no doubt, to the inhabitants, and would diminish drunkenness to a certain extent.

1624. And, of course, would not be so unpopular as going the whole way?—It would not be so obnoxious.

1625. Mr. Roebuck.] Will you be good enough to tell me in what way people complained of the inconvenience of the law of 1854; I think you said that they sent petitions to Parliament?—They did.

1626. Have you any recollection of what those petitions complained of; in what shape they put their grievance?—That they could not get their dinner beer at the time they wished it.

1627. And do you think those petitions were signed only by persons who frequent public-houses?—I cannot recollect; but I should think they were pretty generally signed.

1628. Have you any doubt that many signed them who never entered a public-house on Sunday?—I have no doubt that they did it from sympathy with the working classes.

1629. I think you said that the public-house is the club-room of the artizan?—It is in a great measure.

1630. Are not those club-rooms very decorously conducted?—Very.

1631. And, in your idea, there is no impropriety in allowing them to be used by the artizan on Sunday as a club-room within any of the eight-and-a-half hours, which according to the present law they are allowed, if they please to make use of the public-house on Sunday?—No; but the worst of it is a lot of silly people who cannot resist drink, get tipsy, and create a disturbance.

1632. Silly people go into the public-houses and get drunk?—Yes, they take more than they should do.

1633. Does that happen more with regard to beer-houses than public-houses?—No.

1634. You think there is no difference?—I do not think there is much difference.

1635. You think that the interest of a master of a public-house does not induce him to keep better order than the non-interest of the beer-shop keeper?—He has rather a greater stake in his business, and he feels therefore more interest in that way. Still, the houses of both classes are pretty well conducted.

1636. So that, in fact, you have no great complaint to make of either?—We have not.

1637. Considering that you have no great complaint to make of either, why should you wish to see the law changed?—Simply to benefit people who cannot restrain themselves.

1638. Do you think that the people who cannot restrain themselves would not take other means of getting drunk if they desired to?—I have no doubt they would.

1639. And do you believe that by an Act of Parliament, stringent as this Bill is, you could make a really drunken man a sober man?—For the time being he must be.

Mr.
G. Glossop.

Mr.
G. Glossop.
1 May 1868.

1640. If he cannot get drink of course he would be so; but do you not think that he would find the means of getting drunk?—As soon as he could he would avail himself of it, no doubt.

1641. Are there at the present time any illicit houses in Birmingham?—No.

1642. Has it ever struck you to consider whether or not there would be illicit houses if drink was prohibited entirely on Sunday from being sold in those more respectable places?—I fear there would be in the suburbs; I do not think there would be in the town itself.

1643. The suburbs of Birmingham are very large, are they not?—Very large.

1644. So that the evil would therefore be very large also?—People go out to the picturesque little villages around, and if they were not allowed to get something to drink they would go into the coffee-houses and tea-houses, and get spirits, or something of that sort, illicitly.

1645. Have you ever had your attention called to the working of what is called the Maine Liquor Law in America?—Not particularly.

1646. Have you never heard of any means that have been pursued there to evade that law?—Yes, I have.

1647. Have you never heard of the celebrated striped dog?—I have heard of it.

1648. Do not you think that the striped dog would cross the Atlantic, and come to England if you were to have such a Bill as this passed?—Very likely it would.

1649. Looking at it as a person connected with the administration of justice, and the preservation of the peace, do you think that in the balance of benefit such a Bill as that to which your attention has been called would be beneficial?—That is a very difficult question to answer.

1650. It is a question which the Legislatures are called upon to solve; and we are asking you, being connected as you are with the administration of justice, what is your opinion of the working of such a Bill as that; do you think it would do so much good as to balance the inconvenience that would arise from it?—I fear it is too great a stride at once.

1651. Would you at any time make a stride like that?—If the people were advanced in sobriety to the extent that they have gone now for the last 20 years, they would bear it.

1652. If the people are themselves advancing in sobriety, they do not want a law to compel them to be sober?—They will be asking for it themselves in 20 years, I think.

1653. Do you think that when a man has himself acquired habits of sobriety, he would ask the Legislature to pass a law to keep himself sober?—No, not to keep himself sober, but to keep weak-minded people, who disturbed everybody else.

1654. I thought you said that those weak-minded people have very much decreased of late, and that there has been increased sobriety?—Yes.

1655. Is not that rather opposed to your first statement, in answer to the honourable Chairman, who asked you if you thought drunkenness had increased, and you said, yes?—I said the number had increased.

1656. If the number of drunkards has increased, has not the drunkenness increased?—That would not necessarily follow.

1657. You said just now that people have acquired more sober habits, and become more amenable to the effect of reason?—That is correct.

1658. How do you reconcile the two things; because they are in direct opposition one to the other?—I cannot reconcile them; you cannot see drunken persons about the streets now as you did, and yet the numbers on our charge sheets are actually on the increase.

1659. If you do not see the number of people in the street, how do you get at them; you do not seize a man that is not in the street, I take it?—We do not.

1660. Then if you do not see the men in the street how do you get them?—I mean that a general observer, walking about, does not observe as much drunkenness about the streets as we did formerly, and yet our numbers have actually increased.

1661. Do not you think that that may be attributable in a certain degree to the increased rigidity with which you enforce the law?—It may even be that.

1662. Do not you think, for example, that experience has made you a more effective officer?—Yes.

1663. Do not you think that that may have led you to take up people whom some years ago you would not have taken up; may not that explain the apparent anomaly?—I think my experience, would teach me to let them alone a little more; I should not interfere so frequently now as I did when I was a young officer, probably.

1664. Although you have acquired that experience, you think, nevertheless, that the number of cases has increased, but yet a person passing along the streets would not see so much drunkenness?—Yes, that is so.

1665. That is a clear statement of the case as put by you?—Yes; I think that although drunkenness has increased the number is confined to a very few persons; they appear and re-appear, and yet they are recorded as a fresh person each time.

1666. Have you not now expressed it thoroughly that the same people get drunk oftener, and appear in the streets oftener, but that the whole population has become much more sober?—That is it exactly.

1667. In that case is not the beneficial effect produced without an extremely stringent law like this?—Yes.

1668. Then why should you have a stringent law like this?—I can only give the same answer as I did just now, that it is to restrain those other people.

1669. But in restraining those other people you put decent people to inconvenience?—That is true.

1670. And therefore it is a balance of benefit and evil; I ask you as a man of experience, do you think that it would be worth while to create so much inconvenience as an Act like this would create, for the very small benefit that would result from it?—I think that is too much.

1671. Chairman.] I have asked you whether many working men do not make the public-house their club-room on Sunday afternoon; are there many places of meeting for working men in Birmingham now where they do not have drink at all?—There are.

1672. And are those open on Sunday?—I do not know; I could not answer that.

1673. You cannot say whether any of them are?—I cannot.

1674. Mr.

Mr.
G. Glossop.
1 May 1868.

1674. Mr. Roebuck.] Will you explain what sort of houses those are?—They are coffee-houses and club-rooms where no drink is tolerated; that is to say, no beer or spirits.

1675. And you say that those have increased greatly in Birmingham of late?—Within the last 10 or 15 years they have increased.

1676. Would you not call that a very great improvement in the habits of the people?—Yes, I say that is so.

1677. All that has been done without stringent legislation?—Yes.

1678. Mr. Locke.] You cannot say whether they are open on Sunday?—I cannot.

1679. Mr. Horsfall.] From the returns that you have laid before the Committee I think it appears that in 1855 there were a fewer number of cases of drunkenness than in any other year before or since?—Yes.

1680. Do you attribute that to the Act of 1854?—Yes.

1681. Then it would be your opinion probably that if that Act were re-enacted there would be fewer cases of drunkenness again?—It would lead one to think so, as it had that effect at that time.

1682. Also from the statements that you have laid before the Committee it appears that there were a greater number of cases of drunkenness in the year 1865 than in any other year; can you account for that?—I cannot account for it.

1683. Was the trade of Birmingham in a particularly flourishing condition at that time?—I do not recollect; I should think it is from the excess of money, because I find that Saturday is the most drunken day; we get more drunken cases in on Saturday than any other day.

1684. I thought you informed the Committee that there were more cases of drunkenness on Sunday?—No, less than on any other day.

1685. Chairman.] I thought you said there were more on Sunday than on the average of other days?—In some of the years, but not in all.

1686. Mr. Horsfall.] You stated that a considerable number of persons complained of the Act of 1854; what class of persons were they?—I could not recollect.

1687. You stated, I think, before that there were a considerable number of respectable people who complained of that Act?—Yes; a great many.

1688. What class of persons were they?—The ordinary working classes, persons who had to frequent public-houses for their beer.

1689. I think you stated that you could not inform the Committee whether the greater number of cases of drunkenness arose from drinking in beer-houses or in public-houses?—No; I could not state that.

1690. Have you no returns to show that?—No; we have more beer-houses than public-houses, and consequently there is more beer drunk in them.

1691. Can you give respectively the number of public-houses and of beer-houses?—Yes; last year there were 698 licensed houses and 1,300 beer-houses.

1692. Any person can obtain a beer license, can he not, who chooses to go to the Excise?—Yes.

1693. Do you think that a desirable system?—No; it is a very unfortunate system.

1694. Are you able to give any information to the Committee as to the number of cases of drunkenness among men as compared with women?—No; I have not so divided the cases.

1695. Do you think that drunkenness amongst women is increasing?—It is confined to the few, not as a general rule.

1696. You mean that some parties are brought up over and over again?—Yes.

1697. When you were asked about those club-houses, you said that they were decorously conducted?—I was treating public-houses as club-houses, and they are conducted in an orderly manner.

1698. Of course, there are exceptions, are there not?—There are a few exceptions; but, as a rule, in Birmingham the public-houses and beer-houses are very well conducted.

1699. Are you aware of any publicans who close their houses altogether on Sundays?—Yes, there are some.

1700. Can you give the number to the Committee?—The licensed houses closed altogether on Sunday of their own accord are 27 out of 698, and of beer-houses 46 out of 1,300.

1701. Have you had any communication with the publicans as to the desirableness of either closing altogether on Sunday, or of being more restricted in the hours?—Only a very few.

1702. What was their opinion?—Those I spoke to would be very glad if it could be carried out; but they admit that it is a very difficult question.

1703. Mr. John Abel Smith.] You state that you recollect the working of the Act of 1854; were there any public meetings in Birmingham in 1854 against that Act?—There were.

1704. And the petitions presented against the Bill were proposed and carried at those public meetings?—Yes; when you say at those public meetings, they were not public meetings called by the mayor, but by persons who felt themselves aggrieved.

1705. What do you call a public meeting?—A meeting called by the mayor.

1706. What was the character of those public meetings; were they small meetings called in public-houses, or was there any general meeting of the town?—I do not think there was a general meeting of the town; they were small meetings.

1707. Were they parish meetings?—No; they were more like ward meetings.

1708. Do you think that those meetings were general, or were there only one or two, or half-a-dozen?—There were quite half-a-dozen.

1709. You do not think they were general in the town?—There is the working part of the town, and the west-end part of the town; of course this latter part of the town did not call any meetings nor agitate for it at all; but it was amongst the working classes and the industrious classes.

1710. I think I understood you to say that the ground of the dissatisfaction of the working men was, that they could not get their dinner beer?—Yes.

1711. What time do they dine?—One o'clock, generally, in Birmingham.

1712. Do you recollect the provisions of the Act of 1834?—Yes.

1713. Were not the public-houses open from 12 to one o'clock?—No, they were not open till half-past two, I think.

1714. Think a moment; were they not open from one till half-past two?—I do not think they were open till two, but I may be mistaken.

K

1715. If

Mr.
G. Glossop.
1 May 1868.

1715. If they were open from one till half-past two there would be no difficulty in getting their dinner beer?—No.

1716. Then that would not be the reason?—No.

1717. What do you think it was?—I cannot tell, unless that they could not go to the public-house.

1718. You do not recollect the provisions of the Act of 1854?—I do not, if that was the case; but I know that the houses were closed at 10 on Sunday evening, and all the afternoon, I think, from two o'clock till five or six.

1719. What time do they sup in Birmingham?—From eight till nine.

1720. Then if the public-houses were open from one till half-past two and from five till ten there would be no difficulty in those people getting their beer, either for their dinner or their supper?—There would not.

1721. There are a great number of highly-educated and highly-intelligent working men in Birmingham, are there not?—There are.

1722. What do you think their feeling is with regard to the further restriction to drinking on Sunday?—I saw a very large meeting held in the Town-hall, at which at least 4,000 or 5,000 were present, and they were advocating it.

1723. When was that?—A few months ago.

1724. There was a strong feeling expressed in favour of the change?—Yes; it was a meeting called by persons advocating the Permissive Bill; there were an immense number of working men in the body of the hall, and they all voted for the Permissive Bill.

1725. Do you think that those men would be in favour of greater restriction on Sunday than at present exists?—No doubt of it.

1726. Who presided over that meeting?—I think it was the mayor.

1727. Generally speaking, do you think that the feeling of those working men was a fair picture of the better class of working men in Birmingham?—Yes.

1728. And a fair representation of their general feeling?—Yes, so far as it went.

1729. With regard to the effect of Sunday drinking upon the condition of the men, and of the families of those who do frequent public-houses on Sunday for the purpose of drinking, there can be no question, I presume, about the evil consequences to the families?—None whatever.

1730. Do you think that the women are very much in favour of further restriction?—Yes.

1731. Do you think that many men who frequent public-houses on Sunday for the purpose of drinking, carry it so far as occasionally to have recourse to the Poor Law for their support?—Some of the lower classes do.

1732. That of course is an evil to the rate-payers generally?—It is.

1733. I collect from your answers to Honourable Members who have examined you, that your general opinion is that the greater the restriction the greater the diminution of drunkenness?—The Act of 1854 proved that, as the drunkenness was less that year.

1734. I do not, of course, wish to put opinions into your mouth, but I understood you to express an opinion, that as restrictions increased so drunkenness diminished?—It had that effect.

1735. Are you in favour of such restrictions as exist now?—Yes.

1736. Do you think that they might be carried further with public benefit, that is to say, benefit to those who are wrongly disposed, or weak in resisting temptation, and would the benefit to them be greater than the corresponding disadvantage of inconvenience to the community at large?—That is rather an awkward question to answer.

1737. Do you recollect the Night-closing Act which was passed by Sir George Grey in 1864?—Yes.

1738. Was that Act extended to Birmingham?—It was.

1739. How did it act there?—Very beneficially; it was adopted by the Town Council in October of that year.

1740. Can you bring to mind any one instance in which restrictions on the facilities of getting drink have been otherwise than good?—I cannot.

1741. As a whole, would the community at Birmingham, taking the upper classes, the middle classes, and the more respectable portion, and the better conducted portion of the working classes, be in favour of further restrictions on Sunday?—I think they would.

1742. And would those who would be dissatisfied, and who would complain, be a very marked minority?—Yes.

1743. Would not your conclusion from that be, that the restrictions of a Bill like that which is now referred to this Committee would, as a whole, be accepted with approbation in Birmingham?—I fear it would not; I fear it is too wide a stride at once.

1744. What is the portion that you think too wide; do you mean that you doubt the prudence of proposing that there should be no drinking on Sunday in public-houses?—Yes.

1745. Is that the portion that you objected to?—Yes; they should be open a little time in the evening, and in the afternoon a little.

1746. Do you know the provisions, as regards opening, in this Bill?—I think I do.

1747. The hours are from half-past 12 till half-past two, and from eight to 10; do you approve of that?—Yes; I think that is reasonable.

1748. Do you think that would be enough to meet the wants of the population?—Yes, if you would allow them to drink it in a public-house.

1749. You think that being allowed to drink on the premises, is an essential part of the convenience?—It is; the occupations of most of our working classes are sedentary, and almost every Sunday they walk to one side of the town or the other; it is seven miles through it either way, and they are sure to want a glass of beer somewhere, and unless they can drink it at the public-house door, or in the house, they could not have it.

1750. It would be a hardship to those men, which nobody wishes to expose them to, that they should not drink their beer; but you mean, that they could buy their beer, but that they could not have a place in which they could drink it in comfort?—Yes.

1751. That is a resource which nobody, I imagine, wishes to deny the working-man; but can you suggest any means of preventing that soaking on the premises by men who go for the purpose of drowning themselves in drink, the result being a loss to their families?—That is one of the difficulties.

1752. Have you ever thought over any means of of meeting that difficulty?—I cannot see how it can be met.

1753. Is there any other means of meeting it than exposing others to some inconvenience?—I do not see any.

1754. You consider sotting a very great evil, do you not?—I do.

1755. Should you not be disposed to think that anything that stopped it would be so great a benefit that it was to be fairly set against some inconvenience?—It should; but whether everybody should be inconvenienced for a few silly people, it is for you, gentlemen, to judge.

1756. With regard to the closing of the public-houses on Sunday, you say that there are 27 publicans and 46 beer-house keepers who close their houses; do you think that there would be a much larger number if all would do it?—Yes, they all would close.

1757. Would there be a general disposition to close if the majority closed?—I think there would.

1758. Do you think that they wish to close if they were not exposed to competition by others opening around them?—If we are to judge by shopkeepers and tradesmen, that is so. In 1860 we had 1,600 shops open, and selling in their ordinary trade on Sunday; there was a petition presented to the Corporation to enforce the Sunday Closing Act, and 250 persons were summoned for Sunday trading the first year, and last year we had only eight summoned; we close up altogether; they all agreed, upon being waited upon, that if A. would close B. would close, and so they would not be summoned, and now they are all closed; at least very few shops are open.

1759. Has the result of that been beneficial or injurious?—Very beneficial to the town; the town looks like another place, it is so respectable and orderly.

1760. Generally speaking the feeling of the community in which you live is in favour of such legislation as will tend to diminish drunkenness, which is felt to be one of the great evils of all large populations, is it not?—It is.

1761. As one of those connected with the administration of justice, have you any doubt that a very large proportion of the crime of the country results directly and indirectly from drunkenness?—I have no doubt it does.

1762. And that if that was stopped, in the same proportion crime would diminish?—It would.

1763. Do you believe that crime is more plainly resulting from Sunday drinking than from drinking on other days; that is to say, is there a longer time consumed in public-houses, and is there more conversation on Sundays as to the means of breaking the law, or of evading discovery if they do break the law than on other days?—No, we have very little Sunday drinking according to our population.

1764. You account for that, do you not, by their going out on excursions on the Sunday?—Yes.

1765. It is a great habit of the place to go out somewhere?—Everybody turns out, and goes to some place on Sunday.

1766. Mr. Locke.] Everybody you say goes out somewhere on Sunday; would it be a great inconvenience to those persons who go out somewhere on Sunday if all those public-houses were entirely shut up?—That is the difficulty.

1767. You say that you have very little drinking in Birmingham itself on Sunday; therefore the Bill is hardly necessary for you in any way?—Yes, my answer referred to sotting; sitting in public-houses and drinking; persons call and drink glasses of beer, perhaps 50 in an hour, but no one would stay in the house and drink on the Sunday.

1768. How do you account for that?—From the habits of the people.

1769. You say that people would go in and have a glass of beer by fifties; do you mean in Birmingham?—On the road, and in the suburbs.

1770. And it would be very inconvenient indeed to them if an alteration took place?—It would thus far.

1771. Do those persons who go out on excursions go into the public-houses and sot?—No.

1772. Then they merely use the public-houses as any reasonable being would?—Yes, as refreshment-houses.

1773. Do you think it necessary that those houses should be open on Sunday for the convenience of those persons?—It is a very great convenience to them.

1774. Have they not a right to have conveniences the same as other members of society?—They have at present 1775. But is there to be a distinction made between one class and another?—That is for you, gentlemen, to judge.

1776. But what is your opinion; do you think that there ought to be any distinction amongst the different classes of society as to the convenience to which they are entitled?—There ought not, strictly speaking, and yet you cannot avoid it.

1777. Why cannot you avoid it?—Because some persons have the means and advantages of having liquor always at their hand, and others can only procure it from hand to mouth.

1778. Is not that a much stronger reason that the convenience of being able to procure it from hand to mouth should be reserved to those persons who cannot have it in their own houses?—No doubt it is.

1779. You say that drunkenness has greatly diminished in Birmingham?—Yes.

1780. Therefore, with regard to Birmingham, I presume you do not think that any fresh legislation is necessary?—I do not think it necessary; but in answer to the other question, I said that if it were done it would reduce drunkenness, no doubt.

1781. That is to say, it would reduce drunkenness amongst the class of people who are always getting drunk?—Yes.

1782. Of course, if a man cannot get drunk he cannot get drunk; but I will ask you this, supposing Birmingham were to take advantage of the Permissive Bill, if it were passed into an Act and prohibited all spirits being sold in the town at all, do not you think the people would find them somewhere?—Those who are determined to have drink will find the means to procure it.

1783. Therefore those persons who are always getting drunk, legislate just as you may, will still continue to do so; would not that be so?—I fear it would.

1784. Do you think that under those circumstances it is fitting for the Legislature to pass a law which would be a great inconvenience indeed, as you have shown, to reasonable and respectable people who do not get drunk, in preventing them from having their convenience merely for the purpose purpose of attempting to prevent a few drunkards from disgracing themselves, who would do it whether you passed that law or not?—It is a very difficult question, and I cannot answer it.

1785. You say that amongst the working and industrious classes the public-houses being open from one to half-past two, would be the time in which they would get beer to be consumed on their own premises for their meals at the time that they dine, which is one o'clock, although probably they might be getting the beer just as dinner was hot; that is considered an infinitesimal convenience by the promoters of this Bill; still they would be able to have their dinner between one and half-past two; but do the whole of the people of Birmingham dine between one and half-past two on Sunday?—No.

1786. Are there not persons who dine probably at three?—I think no persons but those who would be capable of having a barrel of beer at home would dine at three.

1787. Then they get a barrel of beer at home, you think, instead of going to the public-house?—Those who dine at three o'clock would.

1788. They would be obliged to do so, would they not?—They would if this Bill passed.

1789. Supposing they dined later, at a more fashionable hour; supposing they dined at seven or six, then they would be obliged to have a barrel of beer at home?—Yes.

1790. They would have their beer with their dessert, if they chose to get it at the public-house?—Yes.

1791. That is inconvenient, is it not?—Of course it is.

1792. To all those classes of people this Bill would be a great inconvenience, would it not, if they had any other hour for their dinner than between one and half-past two?—Yes, unless they kept a barrel of beer at home.

1793. Do you think that a Bill ought to be passed which would inconvenience the mass of the people for the sake of a few drunkards, who would drink just the same whether it were passed or not; do not you think it is better to let well alone, and not legislate; I should like to have your view of the case, because you come from a sober place?—I think it would allow a little more restriction.

1794. What do you think should be the restriction; take the hours as they are at present, and say how far you would suggest that those hours should be reduced?—They are at present open at half-past 12; divine service is generally over at half-past 12.

1795. In London by a special Act of Parliament, they are not open till one, but in the country it is half-past 12, is it not?—Yes.

1796. Would you propose to diminish the present number of hours, namely, eight, arranged in the way that they are by the present law, during which the public-houses are open?—I should close at 10 on Sunday night, instead of 11; and I would not open till six in the evening.

1797. Instead of opening again at five, you would open at six?—Yes.

1798. Can you give us any reason why you have adopted those particular hours?—I have adopted them as the least inconvenient to persons who would have to procure their beer.

1799. Will you be kind enough to explain how those hours would particularly suit those persons who wish to procure their beer that is to be drunk off the premises?—I adopt those as the dinner hours, from half-past 12 till three; you may take that as the ordinary dinner time amongst all working people; I would then close from three to six, and I would leave them open from six till 10.

1800. Do you think that would be advantageous?—That would reach everybody for their supper beer.

1801. Those hours might suit the working classes, but with regard to those individuals who are fantastic enough to eat their meals at different hours, it would inconvenience them?—It would.

1802. Do you conceive that the benefit would be so great that it ought to induce the Legislature to make an alteration in a system under which, according to your own statement, drunkenness has very greatly diminished; do you think it worth while trying the experiment, as drunkenness has greatly diminished?—As a general rule with the inhabitants it has; you do not observe drunken people as you used to do in the streets, but the number of cases has increased.

1803. But you say again, the number of cases are composed of those persons who perpetually get drunk, and they are the same people over and over again?—That is so.

1804. Do you think that any sumptuary law could by any possibility make those drunkards sober men?—I fear not.

1805. It must be their own consciences and their own proper feeling which would induce them to give up drinking, must it not?—Yes.

1806. Therefore it would be useless legislating for such people as that, and that being the case, do you think it worth while to pass a law to make any alteration whatever in the hours in which public-houses are open on Sunday?—That is for you gentlemen to judge.

1807. Do you think that it would be so great a benefit as to induce the Legislature to make an alteration in the law which might, and as you stated before in the case of Mr. Wilson Patten's Act did, cause great discontent?—But I do not think that it would cause the measure of discontent now that it did then.

1808. And therefore you think it would be advantageous?—I think it would.

1809. Do you think that it would cause discontent at all?—It would with a few people.

1810. Whom do you designate as a few?—All persons interested; all persons who are always thirsty.

1811. Are there a great many people that are always thirsty?—There are.

1812. What a dreadful condition they must be in if they cannot get anything to drink?—Yes; very bad.

1813. That is a painful infliction upon them, is it not?—Very hard.

1814. And you think that they would get out of the way of being always thirsty if they had nothing to drink?—No; they would have to go to the pump.

1815. Do you think that that would do as well?—It would keep them sober at any rate; it would keep them out of our hands.

1816. With regard to that meeting which you say was called at Birmingham, who were the originators of it?—I do not recollect; but as the mayor is to be a witness to-day, he will be able to give you the full particulars, I think.

THOMAS AVERY, Esq., called in; and Examined.

1817. Chairman.] You are Mayor of Birmingham, are you not?—I am.

1818. Is this your first year of office?—I was elected in last July in consequence of the resignation of Mr. Dixon, my predecessor in office, and I was re-elected in November.

1819. Have you been long a magistrate of Birmingham?—For three or four years.

1820. Has your attention been much given to the working of the liquor laws?—No; not very much.

1821. Are you aware of the provisions of the Bill before this Committee?—Yes, I believe so.

1822. Is it your opinion that the restrictions proposed by the Bill would be acceptable to any large number of people in Birmingham?—To a very considerable number they would, no doubt.

1823. Is there a large class in Birmingham who desire to put further restrictions on the sale of liquor?—Yes.

1824. Is that confined to the well-to-do classes, or are there many of the working classes also of that opinion?—A great many of the working classes heartily desire such a measure. I am quite unable to say whether the majority would.

1825. But there are a large number of persons in Birmingham who desire that additional restrictions should be placed upon the sale of liquor?—I believe so.

1826. Many of those persons would go the length, would they not, of prohibiting its sale at all?—Yes; no doubt of it.

1827. Do you think that there are many persons who would not go that length, and yet are in favour of restriction?—Yes; when you say many, there are very few, I think, who would be inclined to adopt such an extreme measure as that of entire prohibition.

1828. The Bill before the Committee would entirely restrict the sale of liquor to be consumed upon the premises on Sunday, as you are aware?—Yes.

1829. Is it your own opinion that that restriction would be excessive?—My own opinion is, that it would be a moderate and reasonable restriction.

1830. That is to say that there should be no sale of liquor to be consumed on the premises at all?—Yes; that is my own opinion. The success of such a measure as an Act of the Legislature would entirely depend, in my judgment, upon whether it would or would not be supported by public opinion; intrinsically, I believe it would be a very wise and benevolent measure.

1831. Do you think that it would cause serious and real inconvenience to many persons who are in the habit of consuming upon the premises such liquor as they buy in a public-house?—To some extent it would, I dare say; but the advantages would predominate.

1832. That is the habit of a great many of the poorer people, is it not?—Yes.

1833. But still, you think that the good which would follow some diminution of drunkenness would outweigh the inconvenience that would be caused to individuals?—I think so.

1834. You stated that it might be a question how far public opinion would sustain such restrictions; do you think that there would be considerable outcry in Birmingham if such restrictions were imposed?—I am unable to express any decided opinion upon that subject. At the passing of Mr. Wilson Patten's Act in 1854, there was a great deal of public agitation; at the time of the subsequent measure, the Early Night-closing Act, there was a very slight opposition, and that opposition soon subsided, and the effects, I think, have been highly beneficial.

1835. There was a general acquiescence, was there not, in Sir George Grey's Act?—Yes.

1836. But there was considerable complaint against the working of Mr. Wilson Patten's Act?—Yes, very considerable.

1837. Then the public considered the restrictions in the one Act to be fair, and in the other they did not?—I presume so, at that time.

1838. You are aware that the provisions of this Bill would go a good deal farther than those of Mr. Wilson Patten's Act?—Yes; if I remember rightly, the provisions of Mr. Wilson Patten's Act restricted the hours of opening public-houses from eight to 5½ hours.

1839. During which liquor might be sold to be consumed on the premises?—Yes; on or off the premises.

1840. If Parliament were to pass this Bill you would be prepared, would you not, for a greater objection than was made to Mr. Wilson Patten's Act?—Unless public opinion has changed in the interval, which I believe to a considerable extent it has; but of course that is largely a matter of opinion, and there is no really reliable evidence to enable any one to arrive at a positive conclusion upon it.

1841. Should you like to see this Bill passed as it stands, or would you prefer more moderate restrictions, you having stated that you are generally in favour of restrictions?—I would rather see it passed in its present form, as an experimental measure.

1842. Mr. John Abel Smith.] You recollect the feeling in 1854, and you think that since 1854 there has been a considerable change in public feeling?—I think so.

1843. Do you think that that has more specially marked itself amongst the working classes?—I do not know that it is more specially so; there have been some considerable indications of a change of opinion amongst all classes upon the subject.

1844. Was there not a large meeting held at Birmingham some time since, at which you presided, with reference to some permissive Bill, or some form in which restriction was proposed?—Yes. It was not what we call in Birmingham legitimately a public meeting, because it was not convened by public requisition. It was convened by the United Kingdom Alliance, and at the request of a large number of persons I presided. I think there were probably more than 5,000 persons present, a very large proportion of whom were working men, and they were, I think, unanimously in favour of a permissive Bill.

1845. I suppose it is not an unfair representation of the opinions of that meeting that they were generally in favour of greater restrictions upon facilities for obtaining drink?—Yes, that was the case; they were evidently very strongly in favour of absolute and complete restriction, subject to a permissive power in the local administration of any particular borough; that is to say, of a permissive Bill, with practical application by the local government; that was the proposition before the meeting I believe.

1846. Did you hear the evidence which the head constable of Birmingham has just given?—Yes.

1847. Do you endorse the opinion which he expressed, that on the whole temperance is on the increase in Birmingham?—No. The facts and the actual records of the public office, so far as I am aware, lead to the opposite conclusion.

1848. He said that, as to drunkenness, the increased number of cases resulted probably from the repetition of the offence in the case of the same individual a great many times, but that the number of persons indulging in drink was diminished?—I heard the chief constable say so, but I do not know upon what evidence he founds that opinion. The number of cases were, in 1857, 997.

1849. He gave them as 817?—Then he gave them wrongly; there are 997 for the 12 months ending the 31st of December 1857.

1850. Have you the power of giving us the Sunday cases also?—Yes, I will do so directly. In 1857, the population of Birmingham was about 265,000; and the charges of drunkenness, 997; in 1867, the population, as estimated by the Registrar General, I believe, is 345,000, and the number of cases of drunkenness were 1,699. I have no doubt that the chief constable can explain the difference, because the Tables that I am speaking from are authentic returns from the Birmingham police, supplied to me two or three days ago. There is, therefore, an increase of about 30 per cent. in the population, and an increase of nearly 70 per cent. in the cases of drunkenness. Though the chief constable's observation is no doubt quite accurate, that a great number of those cases are the same cases heard over and over again, yet exactly the same principle of taking those cases would be observed in 1857; so that I do not at all concur in the conclusion at which the chief constable arrives, though probably his great practical experience may give him information which I do not possess.

1851. He also stated that sometime since there was a resolution on the part of the magistracy at Birmingham, to enforce more strictly the law against Sunday trading, and that that has worked beneficially?—I think so. There was some opposition and discontent on the part of a few persons, but the great bulk of the population supported the magistrates, and it was finally adopted. I am not aware that there has been any public inconvenience; I believe that it has worked very beneficially.

1852. You believe that that law was passed in the interest of religion and social order on the Sunday?—Yes.

1853. Mr. Roebuck.] Do you know when that law was passed?—I do not know the year that it was passed. I remember the time when greater stringency was applied in the execution of it.

1854. Was not an Act of Charles the Second's reign?—I do not remember the time of the Act.

1855. Do you think that anything that was done in that reign was for the good of society and sobriety?—If so, it must have been by force of contrast, I presume.

1856. Mr. John Abel Smith.] The same principle which, as applied to other things as being thought necessary, might be applied to beer, might it not?—No doubt it might.

1857. And the inconvenience which it produces is to be set against the great public advantage of order and tranquillity, and quiet on that day?—Yes; it is a question of degree and comparison on both sides.

1858. Generally speaking, are you of opinion that laws restraining the facilities of getting drink diminish drinking and drunkenness?—Yes; all the facts with which I am acquainted support that opinion; I heard the evidence of the chief constable with regard to the operation of Mr. Wilson Patten's Act in 1854; in the year following the passing of that Act, 1855, I think the cases of Sunday drunkenness had diminished rather more than half; I can give you the exact number.

1859. Can you give us the general number in 1855, and the Sunday number?—In 1854, the number of persons charged with drunkenness was 671, and the number of persons charged with drunkenness on Sundays was 124. In 1855 the number of persons charged with drunkenness was 585, and the number on Sundays was 63. In 1856 the number of cases charged was 693, and on Sundays was 87.

1860. Generally speaking, you think that the amount of restraint with reference to the facility of getting liquor, acts distinctly in putting a stop to drinking and drunkenness?—I think so.

1861. You consider that a great social advantage, do you not?—Yes.

1862. Have you ever at all heard of a number of persons frequenting public-houses on a Sunday at Birmingham; have they ever been counted?—No; I have no information upon that part of the subject.

1863. Have you any calculation of the amount of expenditure on Sunday in public-houses in Birmingham?—I have no information as to the separate receipts on Sunday, but the ordinary average receipts of public-houses, gin-shops, and beer-shops combined, are calculated at 10*l.* a week for each house.

1864. Mr. Roebuck.] Can you tell us how you suppose that calculation was made?—I think that the licensed victuallers themselves give that as their amount, and that is the ordinarily accepted amount, I believe.

1865. Would you suppose that there was a direct equality between the licensed victuallers and the beer-shop keepers?—No; the amounts are excessively unequal. Some of those people would only take 2*l.* or 3*l.* per week, and others would take several hundreds of pounds per week.

1866. Do you think that what licensed victuallers consider themselves, could be applied to beer-shop keepers; I want to know how you can possibly get at what is sold by beer-shop keepers?—I have heard it stated by very practical persons over and over again, that 10*l.* a week is a very moderate average, but I do not know the means by which they arrive at that result.

1867. Then we may take it to be a mere guess?—Very largely it is conjectural, I expect; but if you will take 10*l.* as the ordinary weekly receipt, as we have 1,998 public-houses and beer-shops in Birmingham, it gives a total expenditure of rather more than 1,000,000*l.* annually, and at least nine-tenths of that would come direct from the pockets of the working people.

1868. Mr. Locke.] Is that consumption exclusively by working people?—I should think that at least nine-tenths of it would be so.

1869. But

*T. Avery,
Esq.*

1 May 1868

1869. But that would be the consumption of the whole town amongst licensed victuallers?—Of the whole town of Birmingham. The proportion of working men in the town, as it is in most other manufacturing towns, is very great indeed. I think out of about 65,000 houses we have about 55,000 which come within the operation of the compound, and they would nearly all be occupied by working men. Then, if you take the ordinary average of five persons to a house, which is the ordinarily accepted average of the census, you would have 250,000 of the whole population working men and their families.

1870. Does this include beer, wine, and spirits?—Yes, the receipts at gin-shops, public-houses, beer-shops, and taverns of all sorts.

1871. And every description of houses of entertainment in Birmingham?—Not confectioners, and places of that character. There are a great number of wine licenses, and the like, and it would not include those.

1872. You give public dinners at Birmingham sometimes, do you not?—Yes.

1873. And that would all go in?—Yes.

1874. For the rich and the poor the consumption would all go together?—Yes.

1875. Mr. John Abel Smith.] As the chief magistrate of Birmingham, charged with the preservation of the peace in one of the most important towns in the kingdom, should you have any fear of public disturbance, or any difficulty in preserving obedience to the law, if such an act were passed as that which is now before the Committee?—Not the slightest; whatever excitement prevailed, it certainly would not take the form of public disturbance.

1876. Do you think it would probably subside after a time?—I cannot express any very confident opinion as to the result. I have a very strong opinion, from a long experience of working men, that such a measure would be highly beneficial, if it were supported by public opinion.

1877. Mr. Frederick Stanley.] You stated that you believed that there had been a change of opinion on the part of a great number of working people, and that they are now more favourably disposed towards restrictions?—Yes.

1878. Has any canvass been made of the town with respect to that?—Yes, canvasses have been made, but I am not at all prepared to say how far they are reliable, because they were made by persons who entertain very strong views upon the subject. The result of the canvass, I believe, was very strongly in favour of further restriction.

1879. But you would distrust the figures?—I always distrust evidence where there is very great zeal.

1880. Would, then, your opinion incline to seeing this Bill passed as a permissive Bill without any alteration, in preference to seeing it made compulsory, with modifications, in its present form?—I would rather see it passed in a permissive form, the application of it to be determined by the local governments.

1881. Mr. Locke.] You say that it was at the instance of the United Kingdom Alliance that this meeting was called?—Yes, in the case of the public meeting at which I presided.

1882. Was it strictly a public meeting?—It was convened by public advertisement.

1883. For everybody in the town who chose to come?—Yes.

1884. Were there no tickets, or anything of that sort?—I think there were tickets to some parts of the hall, and all the others were free. I think that a small part of the hall was reserved, but I should not take any part in that.

1885. However, there were tickets, and some part of the hall was reserved?—I think the side galleries were reserved, but that would be a very small part of the hall.

1886. The platform, I presume, was reserved?—The platform is always reserved; platform tickets were issued without any charge.

1887. Then the platform, I presume, was filled by members of the United Kingdom Alliance?—Very likely, but I do not know.

1888. And the speakers, I presume, were agreed upon before the meeting took place?—Most likely, but I do not know.

1889. And those would be members of the United Kingdom Alliance?—Most likely.

1890. Where was the meeting held?—At the town hall. It was a very large meeting indeed; the estimate was from 5,000 to 7,000; probably 6,000 would be a fair number; the hall was exceedingly full.

1891. Mr. Roebuck.] Was there any opposition?—No; the body of the hall was free to the public; it seemed to be exclusively filled by working men, and the more ardent and energetic the statements the more they applauded.

1892. Mr. Locke.] Then, in point of fact, this meeting was under the auspices of the United Kingdom Alliance?—Yes.

1893. And it was so announced?—Yes, by public advertisement.

1894. Unless they wished to interfere with the proceedings of the evening, nobody but a United Kingdom Alliance man would go?—I presume that anyone might go; it was open to the public.

1895. The meeting was got up by them, and announced under their auspices, and their friends were expected to come?—A large proportion of the meeting, I expect, would be their disciples, and people who entertained their views, but the meeting was open; the whole body of the hall was open to the public, and a great number of them would also come from curiosity to hear what was said.

1896. But not to interrupt the meeting, which would be a very unpolite sort of thing to do; when the meeting was summoned by a particular body of men, other persons would not come to interrupt them; they have that politeness in Birmingham, I presume, like other places?—My experience of public meetings is, that their proceedings are much more characterised by enthusiasm than by politeness.

1897. Is there any local Act at Birmingham, as to Sunday trading?—I do not remember; we acted under the General Act, I believe.

1898. That is the Statute of Charles the Second, is it not?—Whatever it is, we have acted under it.

1899. I suppose you have persons brought up before you for infringing the Act of Parliament, whatever it may be?—Yes.

1900. What is the punishment that you inflict; it is a fine of 5 s. is it not?—For the first information there very likely would be no punishment beyond a nominal fine. The magistrates of Birmingham are very moderate in their judgments upon cases, especially on first informations and first proceedings.

1901. Do you recollect to what extent the magistrates can go in imposing a fine or any K 4 other

T. Avery, Esq.
1 May 1868. other punishment?—I have never seen a larger fine than 5 s. imposed.

1902. What was that imposed for?—For Sunday trading.

1903. Then what Act are you under?—I do not remember what the Act is. I know very little about this part of the subject. I was at that time very little in Birmingham. I remember very well that there was a great deal of excitement and agitation, and that it soon subsided, and every one has been content since.

1904. But do not you know what the Act is under which you have imposed those penalties?—No; I forget the name of the Act at this moment.

1905. There are 1,998 houses, of all sorts, engaged in the sale of liquor in Birmingham, earning 10 l. a week, which would amount to how much in the year?—£. 1,038,960.

1906. That is not all expended, is it, for beer, wine, and spirits?—Chiefly.

1907. For everything that people use in hotels and public-houses?—Yes.

1908. Turtle soup, expensive dinners, and everything that they enjoy in a public, is included in that?—Yes, I averaged the whole at 10 l. each weekly, but I think it must be more than that.

1909. Do you consider that that is too much for Birmingham?—That is for those who pay, I presume, to exercise some judgment upon.

1910. It is a very incorrect sort of calculation, if the whole of the Birmingham consumption in the public-houses throughout the year amounts to that sum, and yet from that you infer that they are a drunken set of people?—I did not say that; that certainly is not my conclusion; I am very far from saying that they are a drunken set of people; I neither said so, nor implied so; on the contrary, they are a most orderly and well behaved body of people.

1911. Is there anything in that calculation to show whether they drink much or whether they drink little, seeing that it includes all the food and everything else that they consume in those places besides drink?—I said that it was calculated that about 9-10ths was expended by working men in public houses and beer shops.

1912. But working men dine there, do they not?—Very little.

1913. But they do to a certain extent?—But very little.

1914. However, that includes all the houses in Birmingham where the people go to eat and drink?—It does not include eating-houses, but all the houses that are licensed.

1915. How many large hotels are there in Birmingham?—Very few large ones.

1916. Is there not the "Hen and Chickens"?—Yes; I do not think you can count more than 50 at the most.

1917. But surely they must take more than 10 l. a week?—I merely gave 10 l. a week as the average for all the licensed houses.

1918. For instance, we will take the "Hen and Chickens," that is a large hotel, is it not?—Yes.

1919. Do you mean to say that they only take 10 l. a week?—I said that some of them received hundreds of pounds a week.

1920. But how much they receive is not calculated, is it?—Yes.

1921. Have you got it all down in figures?—No.

1922. Your 10 l. a week includes everything, every article of consumption, bread, and meat, and poultry, and everything?—Yes; and I gave you a division, as near as can be, of the general estimate, that about nine-tenths is spent in drink of various kinds.

1923. How do you arrive at that?—There is no very accurate process thoroughly reliable, it is only approximate.

1924. What process have you at all for arriving at that?—If you will take a few of the large houses, and deduct, you will arrive upon the whole at about 100,000 l. for them. That brings you to the general small class of beer-shops and public-houses, which will give, I expect, about the other nine-tenths, about 900,000 l.

1925. Have those large houses been asked what their take is?—I am not aware that they have.

1926. Then it is a mere guess?—Very largely; it is conjecture.

1927. They charge pretty well for their wines now at Birmingham, do they not, as they do at most other places?—Yes.

1928. You do not get a bottle of sherry for much less than 7 s., do you?—The process of public education is advancing.

1929. That would cover a good many pots of beer?—Yes.

1930. If you drink chateauyquem, and those sorts of wines, it tells up immensely, does it not?—Yes.

1931. You have made no calculation as to that?—No.

1932. You say that there are about 50 of those large houses?—I do not think there are as many as 50.

1933. However, the expenditure in those houses would be very considerable, would it not, in Birmingham?—Yes, I expect it would; but, as I say, it would be a reasonable division to give about one-tenth to them and nine-tenths to the others.

1934. Do you think that one-tenth would cover the sum which is paid for liquor, wine, and beer, in those large places?—I expect so.

1935. However, you have not any distinct mode of making it out?—No; I do not pledge myself to a statement of that kind.

1936. Mr. Roebuck.] Were you helped by anybody else in making that calculation?—No.

1937. Mr. Baines.] I want to know whether you think that the opinions at that meeting of 5,000, over which you presided, are deserving of any respect?—No doubt very great respect.

1938. Do you still think that the opinions of total abstinens generally, notwithstanding your salutary dread of undue enthusiasm, are entitled to some weight on this question?—Certainly.

1939. Do you believe those persons who you say assembled, and who were your townsmen, to be persons of good character and respectability?—Yes.

1940. And that they were, as far as you could judge from all that you heard, and all that you saw, actuated by virtuous and good motives?—Yes.

1941. May I ask whether you think that they would be aware of the condition of the persons and of the families who were living around them, their own neighbours?—I presume so.

1942. Do you think that those 5,000 men had any pecuniary or other interest, or had motive, for taking the course which they took?—Not the slightest.

1943. Then do you believe that their motive was was one strictly and purely virtuous?—Certainly.

1944. Can you imagine to yourself any motive influencing men like those, and inducing them to come together at much trouble, and to take the interest that they showed in the welfare of their fellow-townsmen, except a good motive, and a desire to promote the real welfare of individuals and families?—I have not the slightest doubt that those were their real motives.

1945. As to the idea of setting aside the opinions of men like those, influenced by such motives as those, and having such knowledge and experience as they have, you would think it in the last degree unreasonable, would you not?—I think it would be very unreasonable to set their opinions altogether on one side; and I think it would be almost equally unreasonable to implicitly adopt their statements in practical legislation.

1946. You think that men who have formed strong opinions are liable to let those opinions influence them unduly till they become men, as it were, of one idea, and attach too much importance to their own views?—I think it is very often the case.

1947. But still is there any other motive for their conduct and for the opinions that they entertain, but the deep sense that they have of the mischief and the danger of the drinking which they have seen around them?—No.

1948. Mr. Roebuck.] Do you think that because a man is a teetotalter, he is thereby qualified to give a more worthy opinion than a man who is not a teetotalter upon a question of local law?—I should give to the opinion of every man the influence that his character and judgment appeared to entitle him to, and measuring it also by its reasonableness, and the degree that it was supported by facts and by evidence.

1949. Therefore you would rather judge by a man's mental character, and his general intelligence, and his general probity, than from the fact of his being a teetotalter?—I should not give a predominating influence to his opinions, by reason of his entertaining strong views upon any subject whatever. I should be more inclined to distrust his conclusions, howsoever I might appreciate and admire his motives and character.

1950. Mr. John Abel Smith.] Do you know any of the details of a public meeting on the same subject, which was held at Birmingham some years ago, and presided over by Mr. Matthew Davenport Hill, at which there was a good deal of disorder?—I have a general recollection of that meeting.

1951. It was interrupted by disorder for a very considerable period of time, was it not?—I think so, but I cannot give any distinct evidence upon that subject.

1952. Do you contrast that meeting with the meeting over which you presided, and draw the inference from it, that there is a very considerable change in the feelings and desires of the working classes?—In part; I know that the public meetings in Birmingham in favour of restrictions of various kinds upon the liquor trade, have been much more largely attended of late years, that the opposition has very much diminished, if not ceased, and that the general earnestness and power of that class of people in Birmingham appears to be on the increase. That observation, with regard to public meetings, is supported by my own experience. I have been for some 40 years a considerable employer of labour in the town. I always took a deep personal interest in the history and character of the workmen in the firm with which I was connected, and I know that of late years especially, many of them have earnestly wished that greater restrictions were imposed upon the public-house system, and that less temptations were put in their way. I have not expressed those opinions rashly, or without some thought upon the subject, and as far as I know, those are the reasons which have influenced the conclusion to which I have arrived, that public opinion is advancing in the direction of additional restrictions upon the liquor trade. As we all know it is purely a question of degree, and it has constantly been the subject of legislation, and all statistics are in favour of the opinion that restriction upon the facilities for drinking diminishes drunkenness.

1953. Mr. Roebuck.] With regard to the general improvement of the working classes, are you of opinion that, generally speaking, they have increased in habits of sobriety and good conduct during the last 10 or 20 years?—I think that the working classes have greatly increased in intelligence, and I believe that crime is diminishing. I am very sorry to say that the police records do not show that there is any actual diminution in drunkenness, but I quite concur with the evidence of the chief constable, that we certainly see much less drunkenness in the public streets.

1954. But, generally speaking, I think I gather from your evidence that it is your opinion that the habits of the people have improved, and you would say that they are a more intelligent and more virtuous class than they were some 50 years ago?—I hope so, and I believe so. It is impossible for there to be a more kindly or orderly body of men than the working men of Birmingham, as far as I am acquainted with them.

1955. Mr. Locke.] My honourable friend the Member for Leeds has asked you a question which nobody doubted whatever, whether the persons who came to this meeting which was convened by the United Kingdom Alliance, came from excellent motives, and, although they were total abstainers, that did not interfere with the purity of their motives. I presume you have frequently dined at charity dinners, and so forth?—Yes.

1956. Do you take wine when you are there?—Yes.

1957. Does that interfere with your motives?—I hope not.

1958. And you give credit to persons who dine at charity dinners, and who take wine, for having just as good motives, and pretty much the same, I presume, as those who drink no wine at all?—Certainly.

1959. You do not conceive that that makes any difference?—No.

1960. Mr. Baines.] Was any question asked you that implied a doubt of the motives of those who take wine?—Certainly not.

1961. Mr. Locke.] Did I ask you any questions which implied in the least that the motives of the United Kingdom Alliance were not good?—No.

Mr. GEORGE GLOSSOP, recalled; and Examined.

Mr.
G. Glossop.
1 May 1868.

1962. Mr. Frederick Stanley.] THERE was an apparent discrepancy between the figures of the statistics of drunkenness given by the mayor and those which you have placed before the Committee; can you explain the cause of that discrepancy?—I can; I gave two years, the year preceding the existence of the restrictions of Mr. Wilson Patten's Act, and the year afterwards; and then I gave a recent year in accordance with that, from August to August, and the mayor's return is made up from December to December.

ARTHUR BIGGE, Esq., called in; and Examined.

A. Bigge,
Esq.

1963. Chairman.] ARE you the Stipendiary Magistrate of Brighton?—Yes.

1964. How many years have you been there?—Between 13 and 14 years.

1965. You are aware, of course, of the provisions of the Bill before the Committee?—Yes.

1966. There are a great number of persons, as we know, who resort to Brighton by excursion trains on Sunday, and they perhaps make as much use of the public-houses on Sunday as any class of persons in Brighton?—Yes.

1967. I need not ask you whether the total closing of the public-houses for the consumption of liquor on the premises on Sundays, would be a very important change?—Yes, it would; but it would not affect the excursionists, of course, as they would be travellers.

1968. Are there many cases of drunkenness that come before you weekly?—Yes, but no very great number.

1969. Is the number much greater on Mondays than on the other days of the week?—Yes, I think it is; it certainly was last Monday.

1970. Is it twice as much as on other days of the week, do you think?—Yes, I should think it was; but you will observe that that includes two nights.

1971. Could you say that those cases arise more upon Saturday or upon Sunday?—I cannot exactly; the wages are paid on Saturday, and more money is always going about on Saturday night; but also they have more leisure time to drink on Sunday.

1972. Do you recollect the working of Mr. Wilson Patten's Act of 1854?—Hardly; I just went to Brighton about that time.

1973. You would assume, I suppose, that some further restrictions upon the sale of liquor would diminish the amount of drunkenness; I mean that that is the natural cause and effect?—I think it would.

1974. Do you think that there would be much inconvenience caused to the community of Brighton, by closing the public-houses during the whole of Sunday?—No, I do not think there would.

1975. Do the working people not resort much to the public-houses on Sunday?—Yes, they do, of course; there would be less drinking, I think.

1976. But a great many people who now go to public-houses would be prevented from doing so?—Yes.

1977. Do not you think there are many persons who use the public-houses without drinking to excess, but merely for the purpose of refreshment?—Yes.

1978. Would they not feel it a great hardship to be debarred altogether from procuring refreshment, and drinking it there?—This Act does not propose to debar them altogether.

1979. Yes, it does from consuming it on the premises?—I do not think that would be a hardship; they could consume it in their own houses.

1980. You think that the good which would be done by diminishing drunkenness would be much greater than any inconvenience which would be caused to individuals?—I think so.

1981. Have you any tables, or any knowledge of the distinction, in cases of drunkenness, between excursionists and residents?—No, I have not.

1982. Do you think that much disorder is caused in Brighton by excursionists?—It was so some time ago, but not now; some years ago there were 6,000 or 7,000 a-day came to Brighton, but now there are not above 2,000, if so many; the numbers have so much diminished.

1983. Mr. John Abel Smith.] Is that because the excursion trains did not pay?—They have charged higher.

1984. Chairman.] Is there any common complaint of disorder arising from the excursionists?—Yes, there is.

1985. Do you think that there is much drunkenness among them?—No; they come in great numbers in a hurry, down to the sea; of course if it turns out to be a wet day the public-houses are filled; a good deal depends upon the weather. I should say that, as a general rule, the excursion trains are a very great nuisance in Brighton. Some 4,000 or 5,000 people used to pour down to Brighton, some of them with scarcely any shoes or stockings, roaming about the streets, and perhaps making a great disturbance all day; but I think they are improved now.

1986. Should you prefer to go the whole length of the restrictions proposed in this Bill, to some of a more moderate character; that is to say, such as were enacted in the Act of 1854?—Yes; the people have improved very much since that time; formerly, when the public-houses were closed only during Divine service, there was a vast deal more drinking; people would wait till they were opened after the service, and begin drinking again; but now that they are only opened for the first time at one o'clock, owing to the change in the Act, there is very much less drinking on Sunday.

1987. Has much benefit resulted from Sir George Grey's Act, by which the public-houses close at one in the morning every day in the week?—I do not think it is felt much at Brighton, for this reason, that before that time the police and the magistrates and publicans had come pretty nearly to an understanding that they were to be closed at 12; and that was always acted upon, although there was no law to compel them; they agreed to it pretty well; now that they are allowed to have them open till one, some do keep them open later than they used to do.

1988. Has the general feeling of the people in Brighton been expressed upon this point?—I cannot say that it has.

1989. Mr. Roebuck.] What class of persons, under the present prices, come to Brighton from London on Sunday, and constitute the body of the excursionists?—Respectable mechanics, I think.

1990. A respectable mechanic, I suppose, does not get tipsy?—He does sometimes; it depends a great deal upon the weather.

1991. Will you tell me the difference between the price now and the price when there was the large crowd that came down to Brighton?—I think it was 2s. 6d. to Brighton and back, and now I think it is 4s.

1992. Then the difference between 4s. and 2s. 6d. has made the great difference, for whereas, under the 2s. 6d. system, shoals of excursionists and persons came down you say, and vagabondised about the town, and those people have been kept out by the difference between the 2s. 6d. and 4s.?—Partly that, and partly because the novelty has gone off; they have seen the sea.

1993. But the people who come down in excursion trains, you say, would not be touched by this Bill?—They would not be affected by this Bill.

1994. They would come, would they not, under the head of bonâ fide travellers?—I do not think that there is any such word as bonâ fide in the Act; they are travellers.

1995. During the late years of your official life at Brighton, could you say that drunkenness has or has not diminished?—I think that it has diminished generally, and I think it has very much diminished amongst fishermen of late years.

1996. That has been under the operation of the present Act?—Yes.

1997. To what do you attribute that diminution?—The drunkenness on Sunday has very much diminished, for the reason that the public-houses are not open till one o'clock; they used, formerly, to be open before, and people would lounge about drinking till eleven, Church time, and then they would lie on the beach waiting until the public-houses were opened at one.

1998. The difference in the law may be dated, may it not, from 1854?—Yes.

1999. Has not drunkenness diminished more of late years than formerly?—Yes; I think there is more pains taken with the people by many persons in the place.

2000. That is to say that the education of the people has improved?—Yes.

2001. And, therefore, that their habits have improved?—A great many people have taken great interest in the welfare of the fishermen, and I think, generally, that has improved them.

2002. And that without any change in the law?—Together with the change in the law.

2003. Applying your experience to your own class in life, have you not found that since you were a boy there has been a great diminution of drunkenness amongst what are called gentlemen?—Yes, I think there has.

2004. Has that been done by Act of Parliament?—I cannot say that it has altogether; perhaps the cheap wines have had something to do with it.

2005. Do not you suppose that the same influences may have some effect upon the working class as have operated upon your own class?—No; because I think that persons in our class are able to restrain themselves, at all events in the presence of liquor; whereas those people cannot, and they do not know when to stop.

2006. So that you would say that the great body of the working class of England are unable to restrain themselves in the sight of the wine-bottle?—A great many people are not; they have not the power of restraining themselves as much as educated people have generally.

2007. And those are the people that are to govern the kingdom?—That will do so.

2008. Putting aside the excursionists, what class of people in Brighton, on the Sunday, resort to the public-house?—Fishermen and mechanics.

2009. Does the larger part of those who go to the public-house on the Sunday go there in order to get drunk, or merely for the purposes of refreshment?—They go there for the purposes of refreshment, I should say the greater part of them.

2010. Then those persons would be prevented by this Act from going to the public-house for refreshment; do you think that an inconvenience?—They would be able to take liquor to their own houses.

2011. But supposing a man was two miles from his house, and was walking decently and soberly, and with great propriety, on the Sunday; when he happened to be thirsty, do you think that that would be no inconvenience to that decent man?—That man is almost allowed now to be a traveller.

2012. Then you would really do away with the provisions of this Bill by that sort of evasion; and, if so, of what use is the Bill?—A great many people go into those houses because they happen to be open, and not with the absolute intention of getting drunk; and if they were not open, they would not go into them; but those who are taking a long walk are allowed by the Act of Parliament to be travellers.

2013. So far as regards them, this Act is inoperative, is it not?—Quite so, as far as travellers go.

2014. Then of what use is it?—I cannot say, except that the use is to prevent a great number of people sitting and drinking in a public-house; it does not affect a traveller.

2015. Have you not already told me that the larger portion of those who go to a public-house do not go there for the purpose of getting tipsy, or for the purpose of what we call sopping?—Of course; very often they do not go there for that purpose, but they meet their associates, and remain there.

2016. Is not the public-house a sort of club-house of the working classes?—To a certain extent it is, certainly of the man; but then his wife and family have no share in it.

2017. When you go to your club-house, does it cross your mind that you have left your wife at home?—Yes; ladies are not permitted at the clubs yet.

2018. Do you still go to the club?—Yes.

2019. Do you see any reason why a working man should not do the same thing?—People who go to clubs do not get drunk.

2020. You tell me that, do you?—I never saw them.

2021. There are some persons who go to the public-house who get tipsy, but not all, or any-

A. Bigge,
Esq.

1 May 1868.

A. Bigge, Esq. thing like a large proportion of them; is not that so?—I daresay it is.

1 May 1868. 2022. Would you exclude all those who go to the public-house as their club, from the benefit of the club from which you would not be willing to debar those of your own class; would you exclude those because there are a few persons who get tipsy; and do you think that acting like a wise legislator?—I do not know as to that. They go there and meet their friends, and then the end of it is that they get drunk, because the door happens to be open. People who go to clubs go there for totally different purposes.

2023. According to your own allowing just now, the larger proportion go there merely to use it as a club, as you go to your club; to talk with your friends, and to read the newspaper, and that sort of relaxation which everybody requires that they should have; but, supposing that you were the legislator, why should you bring in a law that would prohibit the decent portion of those classes of society availing themselves of the convenience of a public-house because there are some persons who get drunk?—They go there, perhaps, with a good intention in the first instance, and then gradually slope into drunkenness.

2024. But then, you see, that is the very same answer which you have given me upon all occasions?—That is the real fact. Sunday is their idle day, and they have nothing on earth to do on Sunday.

2025. You have already allowed to me that the larger part do not get drunk. I want you to apply your mind to this, and not to answer me about those who do get drunk. Would you exclude those who do not get drunk from the benefit of the public-house, and why?—If they want the liquor, I think in that case, to prevent others getting drunk, they could have it in their own homes, with more benefit to themselves and their families.

2026. You have already allowed that they go to the public-house for the purpose of meeting their friends, and for proper conversation and the relaxations of life; they cannot take all their friends home, and the public-house is a convenience. Why should they not have that convenience?—I cannot say that; but only it leads to this, that they spend their money there which would be much better spent at home.

2027. Do not you think that you have come to a hasty conclusion?—No, I do not.

2028. You yourself are a lawyer, and you know the benefit of examination; do not you think that examination would suggest to yourself that you have come to a somewhat hasty conclusion?—No; I adhere to the first answer that I gave, that further restrictions would prevent drunkenness, and it is a thing to be desired.

2029. That I find is the phrase always used, whatever question I put?—Because that is the fact of the whole thing. I think that comparisons between clubs of persons in your rank of life, and those people who use the public houses, are not at all analogous.

2030. Do you think that the working men are made up of different feelings and sensations from what are called gentlemen?—I cannot say about what their feelings and sensations are; the one class have a considerable quantity of drunkenness amongst them, and the other have not; that is the effect of it.

2031. In the time of our grandfathers, there were what were called three-bottle men; but that is not seen or heard of now; and all this benefit has been derived without legislation; I want to know why that benefit should not be derived to the working classes without this restrictive legislation, or what there is in the character of a working man that should induce you to treat him like a being who cannot control himself?—I can only speak to the fact that we find that he cannot control himself.

2032. Then you lay it down as a rule that working men cannot control themselves?—I would not say that all working men cannot control themselves.

2033. As a general rule, you say that a working man cannot control himself?—I say, as a general rule, that the working men who assemble in public-houses do not go there exactly for the purposes that you would go to a club; they get into drinking, and there they remain, and eventually are unable to control themselves in a considerable degree.

2034. Mr. Evans.] Do you happen to know whether there are a considerable number of persons in Brighton who are in the habit of taking their meals at public-houses?—No; I think not.

2035. Do you know whether it is a custom in Brighton for people, especially the working classes, to make excursions into the country on Sunday?—Yes; there are excursion trains occasionally to Portsmouth and other places, but not a very great number.

2036. Do they, generally speaking, come back late at night?—Yes.

2037. For instance, if the public-houses were to be closed at 10 on Sunday, would those persons, generally speaking, have an opportunity of getting what refreshment they wanted after their return?—They can always get refreshment as a traveller; any person who goes in an excursion train can do so.

2038. Even people living in Brighton?—Any person who has taken a ticket at a railway station is a traveller.

2039. Even supposing him to be residing in the place?—Yes, if he has taken a ticket at the railway station, he has a right to refreshment in the refreshment-room, as a traveller.

2040. Would he be considered a traveller if he went to a public-house on his return?—I think the courts would say that he was, because they would say that anybody who has gone out and requires liquor for the purpose of refreshment, and not for the purpose of simply drinking, is a traveller according to the present state of the law.

2041. Mr. John Abel Smith.] You have stated, and it is very satisfactory to hear it, that you think that on the whole drunkenness is on the decrease in Brighton; have you any idea at all as to the feelings of the respectable working class in Brighton with regard to further restriction?—I think they are in favour of it.

2042. Has there been any public meeting or any indication of public opinion upon that point?—I cannot say as to that; I am only talking of individuals.

2043. Have you no return with regard to the cases of Sunday drunkenness?—I do not; there are generally more on Sunday, it being an idle day on which people are more likely to drink.

2044. Is there a separate class of public-house, in in fact, for excursionists and residents?—It becomes practically a separate class; the excursionists who arrive at the railway station make their way to the sea, and those houses on their route are the description of houses occupied by them; Brighton being very long, they do not extend to the extremity; I may say that they are confined very much to a certain class.

2045. Very considerable local efforts have been made to restrain drunkenness, have there not?—Yes.

2046. Have you any idea at all of the number of public-houses and beer-shops in Brighton?—There are 255 public-houses and 254 beer-shops.

2047. Do you know at all what the expenditure at those houses is?—No.

2048. Have they ever been watched to know the number of visitors?—No.

2050. Do you not think that there is a very wide distinction between the club-house of a gentleman and a beer-house or public-house in this fact, that in a club-house a gentleman has a certain influence in the proper management of that club-house, and that a poor man has none whatever in a beer-house or a public-house?—Yes; of course the size of the rooms in a public-house does a great deal. You find, every day, people crowded together in a very small space, and that leads much more to confusion and disturbance than in the large rooms in a club.

2051. Do you know, from any knowledge you possess, whether there is much adulteration in what is sold in the public-houses?—That I cannot say.

2052. Do you personally approve of the Bill now before the Committee, or do you think it too stringent?—I think it would be an improvement.

2053. Do you think that such a Bill, if carried into an Act, would produce any disorder or confusion in Brighton?—Not in the least.

2054. Is there a very strict police in Brighton?—Yes; a very good and very well managed police.

2055. And you do not anticipate any public confusion?—No, not the least in the world, I think.

2057. And they are seduced into it by what?—By meeting their friends and the presence of liquor before them.

2058. I think I understood you to say that there has been a diminution of drunkenness in Brighton; do you connect that with the restrictions placed upon the hours of drinking?—Yes; and also I think that the fishermen, who are the most drunken class, are more looked after and cared for than they used to be by the higher classes.

2059. Mr. Locke.] In what way are the fishermen looked after?—There are fishermen's homes and reading-rooms, and things of that sort, which have been established for them.

2060. Are those open on a Sunday?—I am not quite sure whether they are or not. If you ask me generally, I say that an improvement of 0.69.

the men has taken place, and that is one of the reasons certainly.

2061. You are not aware whether those places are open on Sunday or not?—I forget at this moment.

2062. What place have fishermen to go to on Sunday for any amusement whatever; if those places are shut, and the public-houses are shut, they must either stop at home, must they not, or go on to the beach?—Yes.

2063. There is no other amusement whatever for them now in Brighton?—No.

2064. In former days the band used to play on the Steyne, I think?—Yes; the fishermen came home very often early on Sunday morning, and go to bed, a great many of them.

2065. Some of them?—Yes.

2066. Others do not, because they cannot be going out fishing every day in the week?—No.

2067. They only go out on certain days of the week?—No.

2068. It may happen that they may return on Sunday morning, or it may happen that they may return on Saturday in the afternoon, may it not?—Yes.

2069. So that it is a mere chance whether they are at leisure on Sunday or not?—Yes.

2070. I am presuming there are a good many of them who have their leisure on Sunday; what place is there for them to go to for any innocent recreation?—I do not know.

2071. Are you not aware of any?—No, they have got their own homes.

2073. Have you carefully examined this Bill?—Yes.

2074. Will you be kind enough to read the first part of the first clause in the Bill down to the proviso?—"The provisions of the recited Act imposing in England and Wales restrictions on the opening of houses and other places for the sale, and on the sale, of fermented and distilled liquors at certain hours on Sunday, Christmas Day, Good Friday, and any day appointed for a public Fast or Thanksgiving, shall, as respects the sale of the liquors aforesaid, when sold for consumption off the premises, be extended to the following hours, that is to say, from half past 2 till 8 in the afternoon, and from 10 till 11 in the afternoon; and as respects the sale of the liquors aforesaid, when sold for consumption on the premises, to the whole of the said days, subject to the following proviso."

2075. You see that there is no mention whatever made of travellers there?—No.

2076. But have you observed these words: "and as respects the sale of liquors aforesaid, when sold for consumption on the premises, to the whole of the said days; there is no mention made there of travellers?—No.

2077. But you see in the proviso there is mention made of travellers?—Yes.

2078. But that only applies to the metropolitan police district?—Yes.

2079. What effect would that have upon a traveller on the Sunday out of the metropolitan police district?—It would leave him exactly where he is now, I imagine; it is not intended to interfere with him.

2080. Whatever it intends what does it do; L 3 you

A. Birge,
Esq.

1 May 1863.

A Bigge, you see it is expressio unius, exclusio alterius?—I Esq. have always presumed that in that respect the traveller and the lodger should be just as he is 1 May 1868. now.

2081. But you see the traveller and the lodger under this proviso are excepted?—There is a good deal put in more than that; there is something about taking a meal, that does not come into the old Acts at all.

2082. But the other part does, you see, "selling the same to a person lodging in his house, or to travellers" (they are all in the disjunctive), "or to persons bonâ fide taking a meal at his house during the time of such meal." An exception being so made in the metropolitan police district as to those different classes of people, and no exception being so made in favour of them out of the metropolitan police district, do you think it would be safe to leave the clause as it is?—I think that the clause might be amended, but I imagine that the construction of the Act would be that the traveller would remain just as he is in the old Acts, although there are those words.

2083. What is your reason for saying that the law remains the same when there is in the same clause a proviso excepting them as to the metropolis, and leaving the enacting part as to the country in the terms which you see there, which are conclusive, "and as respects the sale of the liquors aforesaid, when sold for consumption on the premises," they are not to be sold in that way throughout the whole of those particular hours, and it says nothing whatever about travellers?—No, it does not, but it imports that new article, the taking of a meal at a house in the London district.

2084. That is in the disjunctive?—Yes; but the preamble of the Act says, "These benefits would be increased by an extension of the said Act." It seems that it means merely to increase the benefits of the other Acts.

2085. It is a very strong extension indeed when it prevents the traveller as well as anybody else?—That may be amended.

2086. I want to have your opinion upon this Bill which has been so well considered; is that clause open to doubt?—As far as I have looked at this Bill I do not think it is meant that the traveller should be in any different position out of London from what he is in at this moment. If it had been so, I think it would have been stated more directly that it is.

2087. You do not think it will have any such effect, but whether it will have that effect you are not prepared distinctly to say?—No; that is a question which will come before another tribunal.

2088. And it might probably come before another tribunal?—It is possible to twist the words into the meaning that you assign to them.

2089. Your attention has been called to decisions which have taken place upon the traveller question; you probably recollect the case of Taylor v. Humphries?—Yes.

2090. That I believe is the ruling case now, and Chief Justice Erle's Judgment upon it?—Yes.

2091. There were, I may say, 50 cases or more were there not, before the police magistrates, where they differed entirely upon the construction of the Act?—Yes.

2092. Subsequently this case of Taylor v. Humphries had been the ruling case by which a definition of the word "traveller," which is what you have stated, namely, that it extends to a man whether travelling for pleasure or for business, going out of his own place?—Yes.

2093. But in his own town he would no longer be a traveller, would he?—I am not sure about that.

2094. That is doubtful still, is it not?—No, according to that judgment if a man goes out and takes a long walk, and comes back to his own town, he is considered to be a traveller.

2095. Brighton is a long place, three miles long in front of the sea, and supposing a man were to walk from Brunswick-terrace up to Kemp-town and back, he would never be out of Brighton, and consequently he would not be a traveller?—I am not so sure about that.

2096. But it is doubtful, is it not?—The Chief Justice said that a man who goes into a house for refreshment is a traveller, if he does not go there for the purpose of sitting down to drink.

2097. But that was to be out of the place, was it not?—It does not mention anything about the place. There was a case at Birmingham where a man went four miles, and he was considered to be a traveller.

2098. But that was out of the town?—Yes.

2099. But I want a case in the town?—Supposing a man went two or three miles out of Brighton and came back again and went to a public-house for refreshment, he might do so.

2100. Brighton is a very large place; you may take a very long walk down in Brighton, and still a man would be prevented taking any refreshment, because he would be in the town, and not be a traveller?—I am not so sure about that.

2101. You are doubtful about it?—I am rather inclined to think that he is a traveller.

2102. If he took a walk up and down the cliff, would he be a traveller?—It does not matter where he walks to, the question is, with what object he goes into the house. If he goes in to recruit his body by refreshment when he is walking out, he has a right to obtain liquor. It does not say anything about where he has been walking if he goes in for refreshment simply to restore himself.

2103. Then, anybody who is tired, according to your idea, might go into a public-house and drink?—For refreshment, not if he goes there for the purpose of simply staying to drink.

2104. Who is to prove that?—That is not our business. Chief Justice Erle has laid it down, and there it is. It is very awkward to prove it.

2105. And very awkward for him to prove it, would not it?—Yes. A person with a railway ticket is always considered a traveller.

2106. But a Brighton man walking about Brighton would have no railway ticket?—He might be going to the first station, and then he is entitled to refreshment.

2107. Take a man ordinarily walking about Brighton, he would be shut out from a public-house, he could not go in to get any refreshment, could he?—That depends upon whether he went in there from exhaustion, and want of refreshment, or not, it does not matter where he has been.

2108. By this Bill a public-house in the country is open, and likewise in the metropolis, for certain hours when beer and and so forth may be taken off the premises, that is, three and a-half hours during the day; do you observe what those hours are exactly?—From half-past twelve until half-past half-past two in the country, and in London from one until half-past two.

2109. Do all the people in Brighton dine within those hours?—I should say yes, all the working classes of Brighton dine between half-past twelve and half-past two.

2110. Therefore you think it would be no inconvenience to them, as that would be an hour when it would be convenient to them to get their beer?—Yes.

2111. It would be necessary for them to do so, would it not, from the public-house during that time?—Yes.

2112. I presume very few of them keep it on their own premises in casks?—I should presume so.

2113. They must get it at the time when they consume it?—Yes.

2114. After that, when you come to the afternoon, are there not persons who dine later than half-past two?—I should not think so; not amongst the class who frequent public houses.

2115. But there are other classes of people above them; do not they likewise want to get beer with their meals?—Not on Sundays, I think. The general habit of the people is to dine after church time, between half-past twelve and half-past two.

2117. Do the visitors?—I cannot say much about the visitors; it does not affect people in hotels.

2118. But the restriction of the hours during which they might get beer or wine or spirits from a public-house to be drunk at lodgings, would affect people who were in their lodgings?—Yes.

2120. Are there not persons who delight in draught beer?—Yes, there are.

2121. And those would be debarred from it, would they not?—Yes.

2122. Ale in bottle disagrees with some people, therefore to those who cannot take effervescent drinks during their dinner that is objectionable, is it not?—I do not think so.

2123. At all events those persons who prefer draught beer and who wish to have that opportunity, it would be an inconvenience to them, would it not?—Very much the greater number of the people who consume it would have it between half-past twelve and half-past two.

2124. But suppose they dine later?—They all, or most of them, dine within those hours.

2125. Do the lodgers?—I do not say about the lodgers.

2126. Those, you say, you know nothing about at all?—The lodgers have most likely wine or ale in bottle for their refreshment, I believe, and there are hours when they can get it.

2127. Lodgers are a very important class of people at Brighton, are they not?—Yes.

2128. Without lodgers, Brighton would be nowhere?—No.

2129. It would be still on the sea, but there would be nobody to see it if lodgers were put an end to; have you really carefully considered this Bill with reference to the inconvenience which may be occasioned to a vast number of persons, irrespective of those who dine between half-past 12 and half-past two?—I do not think there would be much inconvenience.

2130. But it would be some?—A very small amount; the gentlemen who dine later it does no affect at all; probably in lodging-houses they have stores of beer; if they liked draught beer they would have draught beer in casks, and probably they do so to a large extent as it is.

2131. But you are not familiar with the habits of the lodger qua lodger?—No.

2132. Although he is the most important feature of Brighton, you have not given your attention to his habits?—Those are not the habits of the inhabitants of Brighton; they are the habits of outsiders who come there from Friday till Monday.

2133. Brighton is made up of outsiders, is it not?—There are insiders also.

2134. Still Brighton always legislates for the comfort and amusement of visitors, does it not?—Yes.

2135. Do you think that this Bill is a step in that direction?—It would make very little difference to visitors.

2136. Do you or do you not know their habits?—Those who live at hotels, it will not affect, and those who live in lodgings, a great many of them, on Sunday dine at those early hours; it is the ordinary habit of the people to dine in the middle of the day, and go to the churches in the evening.

2137. A person occupying a whole house might want to send out for beer, might he not?—He probably would not send to a public-house for his beer.

2138. If he had none at all at home, probably he would. Are you aware that there is a place called the "Star and Garter" in Brighton?—Yes.

2139. Where they have the best Bass's beer that can be provided anywhere on draught and likewise in bottle?—Yes.

2140. Are you aware that persons send from time to time to the "Star and Garter" to get their draught Bass's beer?—They would not send any great distance on Sunday; Brighton is a long place.

2141. But is there any other place they might send to get it; anybody coming to a lodging or to a house for a short time would not be likely to buy a cask of it?—I cannot say.

2142. Do you think he would?—A person who kept a lodging-house where a good many people lodge, would provide them with beer without sending out.

2143. They cannot provide the best article in that way because they cannot get it?—That depends upon what is the best article; some people think bottled beer the best article.

2144. But others do not like bottled beer?—No.

2145. Therefore those who do not like bottled beer would be inconvenienced?—I do not think it would affect the lodgers.

2146. Do you think it is worth while legislating in this way without knowing what inconvenience persons may incur; for the object which this Bill has in view do you think it is worth trying such an experiment?—As I said before, I do not think it would produce much inconvenience in Brighton, or very great inconvenience.

A. Bigge,
Esq.

1 May 1868.

2147. But it is impossible for you to say?—I think it would stop drunkenness.

2148. You mean that it might stop drunkenness among a certain class?—Yes; they might drink beer at their own homes.

2149. But those who are not drunken people would be inconvenienced to a certain extent?—Not much.

2150. But to a certain extent they would?—Very little indeed.

2151. Although you do not know their habits?—I know their habits; there is a very large number who live in hotels; and with regard to those who live in lodging-houses, whom you mentioned particularly, on Sunday it is the habit of a great many people to dine in the middle of the day and go to church in the evening, therefore most of them dine, or a great many of them, between half-past twelve and half-past two.

2152. But not the whole bulk of the people in Brighton?—No; gentlemen in their own houses have their own beer, and the other people, the lodging people, can send for beer at the time when they are accustomed to dine, and it would not be any inconvenience to them.

2153. It might restrict many of them inconveniently, might it not?—I do not think so.

2155. There are two, are there not?—Yes.

2156. Mr. Hibbert.] Supposing this Bill became law, and any inconvenience of the kind mentioned by the Honourable Member were to arise, would any inconvenience arise if the present hours were altered; for instance, if irrespective of this Bill the public-houses in Brighton were closed at 9 o'clock?—I do not think there would be any inconvenience in that.

2157. Do you know when the greatest number of drunken cases occur; is it during the earlier part of the day or in the later part?—The later part.

2158. Would not you get rid of a great amount of drunkenness if the houses were closed earlier in the evening than they are at present?—Yes, certainly.

2160. Would you think it desirable to restrict the number of hours during which the houses were open, and were to close at an earlier hour, say at nine o'clock, or to open at a later hour, instead of opening at five, to open at six or seven o'clock, leaving them open to 11?—I can hardly say as to that.

2161. If the principal cases of drunkenness arise during the later hours, perhaps your opinion would be that it would be better to close earlier?—Yes.

2162. Do you think that any real inconvenience would arise to the people of a place like Brighton if the public-houses were closed at an earlier hour?—They are generally closed by 12, and the beer shops close at 11.

2163. But on Sundays the public-houses are closed at 11, are they not?—Yes.

2165. Mr. Locke.] You said, did you not, that the greatest number of drunken cases were on Sunday?—No, the two days Saturday, and Sunday together, mostly produce more than any other two days, because of the payment of wages on Saturday, and Sunday being an idle day.

2166. Those persons who got drunk on the Saturday night would come before you on the Monday morning?—Yes, I think the number on those days are more for that special reason.

2167. That applies probably more to Saturday night than to Sunday, as to the number who get drunk?—I do not know that; their having nothing to do on Sunday leads to a good deal of drunkenness.

2168. However, you have no statistics to show whether a person coming before you on Monday had got drunk on Saturday night or on Sunday?—I have nothing to show that; of course I know it at the time, and it makes a difference in the punishment very often.

2169. Mr. Hibbert.] Do any publicans or beer-house-keepers close their places entirely on Sunday?—I think not.

2170. Mr. Evans.] You said in reply to a question, that you did not think that if this Bill was carried into law, it would cause any disturbance or uproar in Brighton; do you think that it would cause a considerable amount of discontent?—No; I dare say it might at first, as was the case when the old Act came into force requiring the shutting up of public-houses the whole of Sunday morning, but they very soon acquiesced in it.

2171. Do you think that they would acquiesce in this?—Yes, I think they would acquiesce in it; they would take it as a matter of course.

The Rev. JOHN GARRETT, D.D., called in; and Examined.

Rev.
J. Garrett,
D.D.

2172. Chairman.] You are a Clergyman, living in Manchester, are you not?—Yes.

2173. What is your church at Manchester?—I am rector of Christchurch, Moss-side.

2174. Mr. John Abel Smith.] I think you have had very large and varied experience in England of the working classes?—I have.

2175. You were first of all vicar of St. Paul, in Cornwall, were you not?—Immediately before I was appointed to my present living, I held the vicarage of St. Paul, near Penzance.

2176. Before that you were a rector, in Lincolnshire?—I was Rector of Biscathorpe, in Lincolnshire.

2177. Before that were you chaplain of the Alton Workhouse, in Hampshire?—Yes.

2178. Before that, were you chaplain and master of Stroodes Alms Houses and school, at Egham?—I was.

2179. Before that, were you curate of Worldham?—Yes; I was curate of East Worldham, near Alton, in Hampshire.

2180. You were four years curate of St. John's, Waterloo-road, Lambeth, were you not?—Not quite so long as four years; I was two years curate of St. John's, Waterloo-road, Lambeth.

2181. Does

2181. Does that take in the New Cut?—Yes, it borders one-half of it upon the New Cut.

2182. Before that you were curate of Wheatley and Garsington, near Oxford?—Yes.

2183. And also curate of St. Mary's and St. Nicholas, Beverley?—Of the united parish of St. Mary and St. Nicholas, Beverley.

2184. And also at Hull?—I was curate of St. Marks, Hull.

2185. And also at Aughton-cum-Cottingham?—I was curate of Aughton-cum-Cottingham, in Yorkshire.

2186. Have you paid very great attention to the working of the Liquor Laws?—I have.

2187. Will you state what you think of the present law, as to its working in rural districts?—I have examined carefully into several cases which have come before my knowledge of fornication, particularly cases arising in rural districts, and the fall from virtue of both young men and young women; I have examined into those cases especially as to the cause of such fall from virtue, and it has been my conclusion from such examination, that in nearly all such cases, it arises from drinking in public-houses on Sunday. I beg to explain my reason for giving that conclusion as to the way in which it occurs; young people at 15 or 16 years of age become acquainted with each other, and they go into the rural walks round the country, I believe, with the perfectly innocent intention of enjoying each others' society; they come at a mile or a mile and a quarter from the village or town to a cross road in which one of those houses is open on Sunday; these young people, as a general rule, drink very little, if any, ardent spirits during the week, but during their walk they go into this place, and a very small quantity of ardent spirits in beer produces an unnatural state of bodily feeling; the passions become excited; and I have traced in many parishes in which I have been the downfall in virtue to that excited state of the passions which arises from such drinking on Sunday; on their way home the young people become demoralised. I have traced those same parties, generally speaking, as the seed, if I may so speak, of prostitution in large towns. A young woman when she falls from virtue is open to two great practical injuries in life, and specially in rural districts; she is open to an unnaturally early marriage, which has its own evils; but she is more generally open to being drafted into the neighbouring large town; and having so fallen from virtue in the country, I have traced them afterwards as the prostitutes in the streets of our large towns.

2188. I do not suppose the Committee will entertain much doubt as to the evil effects of drunkenness on the morals of the people?—I am now specially speaking as to drinking on Sunday.

2189. You think that the effects which you have described are extended to large towns, and that the rural districts are the nurseries of the crime which prevails in towns?—That is quite my experience.

sical effects which are produced upon the population by this drinking on Sunday, particularly as the root of other drinking during the week days; I have found its fruits as the chaplain of a workhouse, and I have found its fruits in a very extensive experience in education. I have been a master myself and have taught a 100 boys single-handed, and I have traced the injury upon the constitution of boys, both mental and physical, to the separation of men from their families during the Sunday which, in my opinion, ought to be naturally their day of rest, and then their coming home to their families again in a state, if not of entire, of partial intoxication.

2191. You know the Bill which has been referred to this Committee?—I do.

2193. Can you tell the Committee what large meetings have taken place with reference to this Bill?—Especially in Manchester and London, very large meetings have been held, and in both those places the meetings have been called by requisitions to the mayor of Manchester, and to the Lord Mayor of London. Therefore they were meetings of the citizens of those great towns, in public meeting assembled, presided over, in their official capacity, by the mayors of those towns.

2194. What induced the Lord Mayor to call that meeting?—The Lord Mayor of London was induced to call a meeting by a very remarkable requisition, a copy of which I hold in my hand; it was signed by 106 of the chief aldermen, merchants, and gentlemen of business in London, in the City of London chiefly. The signatures to that requisition were chiefly in order that the Mayor of London, who is Lord Mayor of the City, should be impressed with the fact that the aldermen and merchants of the City of London requested him to perform this duty.

2195. Where was that meeting held?—At the Guildhall. The 106 signatures were the leading aldermen, merchants, and residents in the City. There were 151 clergymen of the Church of England, all incumbents or curates in actual charge of the largest parishes in the Metropolis, headed by Archdeacon Wordsworth and others; there were 125 Congregational or Independent ministers, headed by the Rev. Newman Hall, and embracing the acting Congregational non-conforming ministers in the Metropolis. There were 66 Roman Catholic priests, headed by his Grace Archbishop Manning, embracing, I believe, the acting priests in the Metropolis; there were 65 Wesleyan ministers, headed by the Rev. William Arthur, president of the Conference, and embracing, I believe, the acting Wesleyan ministers of the Metropolis; there were 60 Baptist ministers, headed by Dr. Angus and the Hon. and Rev. Baptist Noel, and, I believe, embracing the acting Baptist ministers in the Metropolis; and there were 22 other miscellaneous ministers, Presbyterians and others. Altogether the requisition was signed by 599 of the leading magistrates, merchants, and ministers of all denominations in the Metropolis, and signed by that large number within a very few days.

2196. How many people attended the meeting at the Guildhall?—It was computed by the police authorities in the Guildhall that there were over 3,000 people at the meeting.

2197. What class of people were they?—Very largely largely working people; artisans chiefly, I should say. It was an open meeting, called by public requisition, placarded all over the City of London, and the doors were open throughout the whole of the meeting.

2198. Was there a strong-feeling exhibited in favour of restriction?—There was a resolution passed very nearly unanimously, requesting Parliament to entirely close public-houses and beer-houses on Sunday in London; that was the purport of the resolution, the wording of which I have here.

2199. Can you give us any particulars as to the Manchester meeting?—The Manchester meeting was also called by a requisition to the mayor, signed, I believe, by the largest and most influential body of merchants and people in Manchester who had ever signed a requisition upon any subject whatever to the mayor of that city.

2200. Where was the meeting held?—The meeting was held in the town hall, and it was quite full. I am myself not personally aware of the capacity of the town hall of Manchester; then there was also another very large meeting the same day in the Free Trade Hall.

2201. Were there 1,000 or 4,000 persons present in the town hall?—I have always understood that in the town hall there were 2,000 people.

2202. Were they very strongly in favour of restriction?—They were unanimous in favour of the total closing of public-houses. I would wish to guard myself here; I give the opinion that there were 2,000 people in the town hall as a mere guess; I am not myself personally able to speak to that point, but no doubt there are gentlemen in the room who could do so.

2203. Was not there a deputation appointed at that meeting to Mr. Gladstone?—At the great Free Trade Hall meeting in the evening there was a deputation of 20 working men appointed to wait upon Mr. Gladstone to request him to bring in a Bill for the entire closing of public-houses on Sunday.

2204. Did they see him?—Yes. I had the privilege of accompanying 20 working men from Manchester, and we waited upon Mr. Gladstone, and made our appeal to him in the name of a meeting composed of between 4,000 and 5,000 working men in the Free Trade Hall.

2205. Did those men urge very strongly on Mr. Gladstone compliance with that prayer?—They urged very strongly; one artisan in particular put his commission in remarkable words before Mr. Gladstone, the exact words of which I have, and am able to testify to.

2206. Did a deputation also go to Lord Derby?—A subsequent meeting at the Lambeth Baths appointed a similar deputation to wait upon Lord Derby.

2207. There have been other great meetings besides the City meeting and the Manchester meeting in favour of restriction, have there not?—There have been two classes of meetings held both in Manchester and in London; the first under a requisition to the lord mayor and the mayor, and a second class of public meetings at the Lambeth Baths, the Free Trade Hall, and Exeter Hall also, they had a very large meeting, particularly of Roman Catholic working men.

2208. Have the public shown by petition any great feeling in favour of restriction?—Yes; during this session of Parliament they have shown very largely their feeling by petitions. I hold a return in my hand of the petitions during this session of Parliament; for the entire closing of public-houses on Sunday, there have been 651 petitions, signed by 124,426 people; and in favour of this Bill there have been 3,550 petitions, signed by 317,393 people, making altogether 4,201 petitions and 441,819 signatures.

2209. Mr. Roebuck.] Were not both classes of petitions signed by the same people?—No.

2210. How do you know that?—There has been a marked difference in the action of those who are desirous of promoting the total closing of public-houses on Sunday, and those who are endeavouring to have this present Bill passed; a very marked line of difference of opinion, indeed; so that the same people would not sign the two petitions at all.

2211. They ask the same thing; why should not they sign the same petition?—In the estimation of working people there is a very strong difference between the entire closing of public-houses on Sunday, and what is proposed by this Bill.

2212. Mr. John Abel Smith.] Is there any sectarian or other feeling in favour of particular legislation with reference to this subject?—The leading men in the kingdom, in both religion and politics, have declared to me that on no subject has there been known such unanimity of opinion, both in religion and politics. It is shown, very remarkably indeed, at the present moment; in Ireland, for instance, in the remarkable coincidence that you have the signatures of Cardinal Cullen and of Archbishop Trench, the Archbishop of Dublin, to the same requisition; and the remarkable coincidence that here you have the signature of Archbishop Manning and Archdeacon Wordsworth. The Archbishop of Canterbury did not actually sign the requisition to the Lord Mayor, but he has very strongly expressed his opinion in favour of the Bill.

2213. With regard to the feeling of those who are charged in England with the superintendence of the local law; can you give the Committee any information upon that point?—With regard to magisterial opinion, I hold in my hand a copy of an address to Lord Derby, at the time when his lordship was Prime Minister, which was sent in and officially presented to the Prime Minister of England. It is addressed "To the Right Honourable the Earl of Derby, K.G., &c. My Lord,—We, the undersigned justices of the peace in England and Wales, having considered the provisions of the Bill introduced into Parliament for regulating the sale of intoxicating liquors on Sunday, beg leave to state that we believe the measure to be safe and good for the country; and we hope your lordship will secure the assistance of the Government for Mr. John Abel Smith, Mr. Bazley, and Mr. Baines, that their Bill may be speedily passed into law." This address to Lord Derby was signed by 69 mayors of the largest towns we could select in England and Wales, headed by the mayor of Bristol, the mayor of Southampton, the mayor of Newcastle-upon-Tyne, the mayor of Bradford, the coroner for Yorkshire and mayor of Sheffield, the mayor of Sunderland, the mayor of Carlisle, the mayor of Reading, the mayor of Southport, and, if the Committee desire, I could mention others.

2214. Mr. Roebuck.] Did the mayor of Sheffield sign for himself, or for a meeting?—For the mayor, as a magistrate; it was a magisterial address to Lord Derby.

2215. Is that the opinion of the mayor of Sheffield;

Sheffield; because, I think, I know it to be the contrary?—Yes; this requisition was signed, in my own presence, by Mr. Webster, the coroner of Yorkshire and mayor of Sheffield, after going carefully into the provisions of the Bill, and I presented his original signature to this address to Mr. Disraeli. Besides the 69 mayors, there were 11 chairmen of benches of magistrates, including the chairman of petty sessions of Darlington, the chairman of petty sessions of Abergavenny, the chairman of quarter sessions for the county of Flint, and the chairmen of what we believe to be a very large representative magisterial body throughout the kingdom. It was signed also by 148 other magistrates, who are deputy lieutenants, and very prominent in their counties and districts. Altogether, the total number of the magisterial body who addressed the Prime Minister to pass this Bill are 248 of the chief magistrates in the kingdom.

2216. Mr. John Abel Smith.] What knowledge have you of the feeling of the working classes in favour of further restriction on drunkenness?—If you mean with respect to Sunday drinking, having taken the best mode in my power to ascertain their opinions throughout the country, I believe that a very large majority of the working classes are anxious for the entire closing of public-houses on Sunday. There is one point, if you will allow me to allude to it, on which all the meetings have particularly requested me to speak, and as I cannot speak in the House myself, I should like here to take an opportunity of giving this testimony to the Committee. Resolutions have been passed at very large meetings, and the last was passed in the Lambeth Baths by 3,000 men, expressing great indignation at public-houses and beer-houses being called working-men's clubs. I know, as a truth, that the mass of working men consider it an insult and a calumny to call those places their clubs; they have no control over them, and if they had they would not allow them to open on Sunday. I hold in my possession a resolution which was passed at a very large meeting of working men at Lambeth, a short time ago, in which they expressed a desire that that should be impressed upon the House of Commons.

2217. Do you know at all what the magnitude of the drain upon the people's earnings is by Sunday drinking?—Yes, I have had a large correspondence with the publicans and beer-house keepers in London, and I have received letters giving me information as to the amount of money which is received in those houses on Sunday. One landlord, when I asked him to sign a petition from the publicans for the closing of public-houses on Sunday, wrote to me that he believed I must be mad, inasmuch as he was in the habit of receiving more than 30*l.* every Sunday in his one house; but an estimate has been formed, taking 3*l.* a house for all London, and it has been challenged in a large way; and this average of 3*l.* a house throughout London has never been denied. There are 11,000 houses open in the metropolis every Sunday, and at 3*l.* a house, that would be 33,000*l.* every Sunday.

2218. Which makes a total of a million and a half during the year?—Yes.

is a petition to the House of Lords, and a counterpart of it has already been presented to the House of Commons, asking that the public-houses and beer-houses should be entirely closed on Sunday; and no doubt that number could be very largely increased.

2220. With regard to the general feeling of the community, including the working classes, and taking the people as a whole, do you believe that a further restriction on drinking is very much wished for?—I do.

2221. Do you not believe that that exists, although there may have been a decrease in the general habits of drunkenness?—The extent of the decrease, in comparison with the increase of population, is a matter of doubtfulness to me.

2222. With regard to the feeling in favour of increased restriction, you speak with great confidence?—Yes, certainly; I have been implored by large bodies of men to do so.

2223. You speak with a full knowledge of the state of feeling both of large towns and of rural districts?—I do.

2224. Do you know anything particularly of the feeling of working men in Manchester amongst whom you live?—I do.

2225. Do they entertain a very strong opinion upon the subject?—A very strong opinion in favour of the entire closing of public-houses on Sunday exists in Manchester.

2227. And there is a great feeling of that character throughout many of the large manufacturing towns in Lancashire, is there not?—Yes, all over Lancashire there is a very strong feeling; there have been many evidences of it, especially in Liverpool.

2228. You do not believe that if such a Bill as that which is now referred to the Committee were carried into a law there would be any general resistance or disturbance in the country?

—I declare, in the name of the people, that the idea of there being such a disturbance is a calumny upon them. I was in the New Cut, as a clergyman, shortly before the slight disturbances occurred on the passing of Mr. Wilson Patten's Act in 1854: immediately previous to that time I was there for two years, and I knew the people intimately, and if it was legitimate for me to state it, I would endeavour to clear the people from what I believe to be a very great misrepresentation of them in the matter.

2229. You do not believe that the disorders which took place in Hyde Park had anything to do with Mr. Wilson Patten's Act?—I know that they originated with Lord Robert Grosvenor's Sunday Trading Bill, and the reason that they so originated was very peculiar and very special.

2230. Have you ever been in public-houses in the New Cut, or in the neighbourhood of London, on Sunday evening?—I have been at the doors of them frequently, and seen what was going on.

2231. Occasionally was there at that time, still more than now, a good deal of disorder and noise?—Very bad language was the chief feature.

2234. Do you know anything about the connection between crime and drinking?—Only in individual cases. I prefer speaking of things entirely within my own knowledge; but I ascertained that general point by a very careful examination of a large population of fishermen in Cornwall. As I stated, I was vicar of the parish of St. Paul, which embraced a population of 5,000, chiefly fishing people. I made in that parish a very practical inquiry, extending over 20 years past, by an examination of the parish books, with the assistance of my churchwardens; and also examining the history of the various families in the parish, with a view to determine the number of criminals and the number of inhabitants of the workhouse, for whose maintenance the rates were liable during the last 20 years before I left the parish. Within that population it was quite within our power to trace accurately the persons who had been in the workhouse and who had been criminals; and in that population I found that on an average eight out of ten of those cases during 20 years were clearly traceable to drink, or originating in drink. I pursued a similar investigation still further for the coming 10 years, by taking the case of every family then in a state of destitution in a population of 5,000 people; those whose children were not at school, and those whose parents were in the workhouse, and the parish therefore liable for them; all those cases in which the ratepayers generally have to maintain either as criminals or paupers a portion of the population. We came to the conclusion, myself and the parish officers, that, except for drinking, then at that time we should have only one out of 10 persons probably chargeable during the next 10 years; that is to say, we should save nine-tenths of the expense of pauperism and crime to which the parish would otherwise be subject if we could have stopped the drinking. I believe that that is a safe conclusion over the whole country.

2235. Mr. Hibbert.] Do you know anything about the public-houses in which they have music in Manchester on Sunday evening?—Yes. I believe, from information which I have received, there are 46 of them.

2236. Can you give the Committee any information about the bad result which arises from those places being open?—They draw away chiefly our Sunday-school scholars. The music they have generally is of a quasi-sacred character, for the purpose of drawing away the better educated portion of the young people.

2237. Chairman.] What do you mean by music of a quasi-sacred character?—Organs which play the old hundredth psalm, for instance, and music by Handel.

2238. Do they play Handel's and Mendelssohn's music?—Chiefly that class of music.

2239. Mr. Hibbert.] Those places are principally attended by young people, are they not?—Very largely.

2240. Do you know what time those places generally commence their musical attractions on Sunday evening?—Soon after or about the time that the various churches and places of worship are being opened; and their entire action is, that whereas we have 30,000 churches and other places of worship open in the kingdom, there are opened every Sunday 145,000 opposition houses, public-houses and beer-houses throughout England and Wales.

2241. Do you know at what time generally the public-houses commence their musical entertainment on Sunday evening?—The houses are all opened at five o'clock.

2242. Do they commence music at that time?—I think not quite so early; not generally on that day.

2243. Is it not the case that most of those places commence about seven or eight o'clock in the evening?—Earlier, I think, than seven; they begin to make preparations.

2244. Do you know to what hour they continue the music?—I believe the chief portion of the music is as late as they can keep the houses open; it increases in intensity.

2245. You think it is a fact that they continue the music in those places up to the hour of closing, that is, up to the hour of 11 o'clock?—I do.

2246. Have you ever noticed any advertisement about the sacred music at public-houses on Sunday?—I have.

2247. What form has it generally taken; have you seen advertisements in this form: "A free-and-easy on Tuesdays, Fridays, and Saturdays; and sacred music on Sundays"?—Yes, I have seen such an advertisement.

2248. Is it in Manchester that you have seen that advertisement?—I cannot say, myself, that it applies more to Manchester than other towns.

2249. Do you know whether this system of music in public-houses on Sunday evening is more general in Manchester than in other large towns?—I believe it is also very general in other large towns, but there are other attractions of a very remarkable class in London, for instance.

2250. What are they?—Exhibitions of remarkable objects.

2251. What kind of objects; objects of art, or what?—A very remarkable animal is frequently set up as an object for children to see.

2252. Is that done to attract people into the public-houses?—Yes, it is done to attract people into the public-houses, particularly the low beer-houses.

2253. Chairman.] Are those places where they have music, music halls, or is it merely an organ playing in a tap-room?—An ordinary public-house, and very frequently a beerhouse.

2254. They have an organ playing in the tap-room?—Yes, and other musical instruments besides.

2256. Mr. Locke.] I might set you right upon that point; I think in the country a music license is not necessary; it is only in the metropolis that it is necessary?—I believe that is the case.

2257. Mr. Hibbert.] Do you know whether the magistrates have ever taken any means to try to stop the music on Sunday evening?—I believe that the magistrates consider themselves powerless less on that point unless it produces riot or disturbance in the street.

2258. Do you think that in granting a license yearly, they would not be able to impose any conditions upon that license?—That would be a matter for the magistrates' judgment.

2259. Supposing that public-houses were closed earlier in the evening, you would get rid of all those objectionable places, would you not?—That depends upon how early they are closed.

2260. Supposing, instead of closing, as now, at 11 o'clock, they closed at nine o'clock, would you by that means get rid of a large amount of drunkenness?—No doubt, in proportion to the time you close them.

2261. Is it your opinion that it would be better to proceed upon the principle laid down in the Bill, rather than proceed upon a restriction of the present hours to some extent?—I think that the great desire of the people, and I only speak with respect to people's opinions, is that those places should not have any drinking on the premises.

2263. Do you remember the changes introduced by Mr. Wilson Patten's Act in 1854?—Yes.

2264. Can you say anything with respect to the operation of that Act?—As far as I had experience of the operation of that Act, I know that it was most beneficial.

2265. Supposing that the Bill at present before the Committee was not to be passed into a law, would you think that the next most desirable object would be to restrict the number of hours and close the public-houses earlier in the evening than at present?—No doubt it would be so, next to shutting them up altogether from drinking on the premises.

2266. Mr. Frederick Stanley.] You stated, did you not, that in the New Cut there was frequently disorder from persons standing outside the public-house?—I did not mean that the disorder was outside the public-house, but in the place, and persons going into it. I do not think that in the New Cut itself they assemble in large crowds outside the house; there are houses in other parts of London where they do so.

2267. I think I understood you to say, in answer to a question whether you had been in any public-houses on Sunday that you had been at the door?—Yes.

2268. And in answer to a further question, you stated that there was frequently disorder?—I meant in the house loud talking and evil conversation is what I have chiefly observed in those places.

2269. Your answer refers exclusively then to the inside of the house?—That was my intention; I was at the door; I have frequently stood in and about the door, and seen persons going in and out, and have observed the very bad tone of language which they use.

2270. You never noticed any disturbance outside upon those occasions?—I have been, myself, at the Church service the greater part of every Sunday evening, and when I have visited those places as a clergyman, it has been very late at night, consequently I have not, myself, had an

2271. The object of my question is this; it has been stated by some witnesses that very probably the effect of this Bill would be, that during the hours during which liquor is allowed to be sold for consumption off the premises, persons would assemble immediately outside the door, in order to be on the safe side of the law, and that the drinking would take place immediately outside the door of the public-house instead of inside; do you concur in that opinion?—I do not believe that the people of the street would allow it. I believe that the public opinion of the street would utterly forbid it.

2272. That is a matter which you would depend upon public opinion to enforce?—Very largely; the whole of the law would be enforced by public opinion chiefly.

2273. What would be your opinion as to the advantage to be derived from the alternative of either seeing this Bill pass in a permissive form, applicable to particular localities, or in a compulsory form all over the country, but with modifications in its present shape?—The great difficulty, in my opinion, would rest in framing a machinery to put the permissive power in operation. As the Bill at present stands, it stands upon five distinct Acts of Parliament, which legislate simply and only for the number of hours of sale on Sunday. The moment you enter into another principle of operation of the law you involve the machinery of the Bill in many difficulties, and great difficulty would arise in that way. In Birmingham for instance, supposing it were possible to adopt such law for the Sunday alone, the question would be whether the object of adopting it for one day in the week would be sufficiently large to justify putting the whole population of Birmingham to a vote upon the subject.

2274. My question was rather as to whether you consider that most benefit would arise from passing the present Bill exactly as it is applicable to particular localities, or whether you consider that more general benefit would arise from passing it for universal restriction all over the country, subject to modification as to the hours?—I understand you now, and I think the relative advantage of both forms of law would depend upon the number of hours of entire restriction. If you were to pass a law leaving the houses still open for six hours on Sunday for drinking both on and off the premises, I do not think that the advantage of that law over the whole country would be equal to the advantage of a permissive Bill in the shape in which this law is; but if you were to pass a law closing all houses all over the country except for three hours, that is an hour and a-half, which in the opinion of Major Greig of Liverpool was enough, in the middle of the day, and an hour and a-half in the evening; I think an Imperial Act of that class would do more good than a permissive Act of this class; the relative advantage, in my judgment, would depend upon the extent of restriction that you would have in an Imperial Act.

2275. Mr. Locke.] What is the precise object of the United Kingdom Alliance?—To obtain a Permissive Bill.

2276. The Permissive Bill which we have had before Parliament, I think?—I do not know that the United Kingdom Alliance is involved in the particular provisions of an actual Bill.

2277. Are you aware that there is a Bill called the Permissive Bill which has been withdrawn, and which was more than once submitted to the consideration of Parliament?—I know that there was such a Bill brought in by Mr. Wilfrid Lawson.

2278. Or was it by the Member of Hull?—No: that was a Sunday Closing Bill.

2279. The Permissive Bill was to enable local authorities of any place to prevent liquor being brought into the town and being sold in the town at all?—It proposed to give the right to two-thirds of the rate-payers to prohibit the sale of liquor within the district in which those rate-payers reside; that is, to my judgment, the meaning of the Permissive Bill, which was proposed.

2280. If they chose they might interdict the sale of fermented liquor within that town altogether?—Yes, I think so.

2281. That would include Sunday too?—Yes, no doubt.

2282. You were connected with the Alliance, were you not?—I value the principles of the Alliance.

2283. Were you not connected with it?—In what way?

2284. As secretary?—Never.

2285. Or as a member of it?—Only as a small contributor to its funds.

2286. Were you the treasurer?—Never.

2287. What precise position did you hold in the Alliance?—I was only a very small contributor to its funds, and I have spoken at two meetings under the auspices of the Alliance simply to give the general sanction of my position as a clergyman to its principles, without binding myself at all to the immediate details of the Act.

2288. Have you not taken any active part whatever in the Alliance beyond being merely a contributor to its funds?—No, not in the United Kingdom Alliance.

2289. Is there another Alliance?—I do not know of any.

2290. You never had any dispute with the Alliance?—Never with the Alliance as with the United Kingdom Alliance; I may perhaps direct your mind to the exact point that you wish information upon, which I am very anxious to do; I have had a difference of opinion with a body or an association which I myself founded with reference to Sunday sale alone.

2291. What association was that?—A central association in Manchester for stopping the sale of intoxicating liquors on Sunday; that association is not the United Kingdom Alliance.

2292. In what way were you connected with it?—I was the originator and founder of the association.

2293. I believe you have had a dispute with them, have you not?—Some of the members of the executive did not act as I thought they ought, and I separated from them.

2294. There has been a dispute about the funds, has there not?—In what way?

2295. They say that you have not given them up the funds?—I think not. I hope not.

2296. Have you not given them up?—No.

2297. But there has been a dispute?—There has been a difference of opinion which has been investigated by a committee of investigation very recently.

2298. Have you ceased to be a member of it?—

I hold still, I believe, the rightful authority of representing the original conference out of which that association grew.

2299. In what way did the dispute arise; with respect to what?—With respect to the authority upon which I acted as the representative of the association when out of Manchester. That is exactly, as nearly as I can give it you, the first origin of the difference of opinion.

2300. It ended in your being dissociated from them, did it not?—No, it ended in my separating from association with a few members of the executive. A few members of that association met in Manchester when I was not there without any notice to me, and they passed a resolution rescinding the authority which I possessed from the executive at large to represent that association, and do its work at a distance. Those few members having so passed that resolution behind my back without my knowledge, and without giving me notice, I said that I would be no longer responsible for anything that they did.

2301. You do not represent them now?—Not that section of the executive, but I represent the original conference which founded the association.

2302. But were they the majority of the executive?—No, a very small minority.

2303. Your attention has been specially directed to Manchester, as I understand?—All over the kingdom.

2304. In London?—Yes, in London also.

2305. What knowledge have you of the working classes in London especially more than anybody else?—I lived for two years as a clergyman in St. John's, Waterloo-road, Lambeth, with a population of 10,000 people.

2306. When was that?—From 1851 to 1853; that was my period.

2307. Have you not resided in London since?—I have been a great deal in London since, but not actually officially engaged as a clergyman.

2308. Is your view at present in favour of entire closing all the week, including Sunday; are you in favour of the Permissive Bill?—I should wish the public opinion of England to be prepared for it, and to adopt such measures.

2309. Would you wish to adopt such a measure at present?—Not till public opinion was prepared for it.

2310. How do you propose to ascertain that?—Through the action of Parliament.

2311. By Parliament passing such an Act, do you mean?—By Parliamentary discussions of the proposal; I believe that Parliament has the great power of making public opinion in the kingdom.

2312. Are you aware that Parliament has already discussed that question, and that they threw out the Bill?—They very slightly discussed it; I was present at every debate on the subject.

2313. However, they did discuss it as far as they desired?—As far as the initiation of it was concerned; I do not consider that a debate in any one Session of Parliament is a Parliamentary discussion of a question.

2314. However, as far as it goes, the Bill was brought in by Mr. Wilfred Lawson, and it was, if I recollect rightly, read a second time?—No, I think not; I think it was on the second reading that it was thrown out.

2315. The division on the first reading was in favour of the Bill being read a first time, and then when it was discussed again upon the second reading, was it not?—Yes.

2315. And then it was thrown out?—There was a majority against it.

2317. Do you recollect what the majority was?—Not the exact figures.

2318. It was a considerable one against the Bill, was it not?—Yes.

2319. You think that that Bill having met with such success upon that occasion, ought to have been brought in from year to year afterwards, and still further discussed?—I should be glad to have such a measure gradually discussed through the House of Parliament.

2320. Every Session?—I do not mean to say that I should wish it every Session.

2321. It was discussed and it was rejected; and I ask you now what further steps you would desire should be taken as to further discussion?—As soon as those who have Parliamentary experience consider that public opinion has grown from what it then was, I should be glad to see another Bill brought in.

2322. Is it not your opinion that Members of Parliament consider that public opinion has not grown to such an extent as to induce anybody to bring it in again?—I am satisfied that Members of Parliament feel that public opinion is in progress, and growing more strong upon that question.

2323. But nobody thinks that it has grown to such an extent as to induce them to bring that Bill in a second time?—I should think that gentlemen who have experience of Parliament would prefer waiting till the great mass of the householders of England are themselves, through their own Parliament, able to express their opinion. That is my judgment of the case.

2324. Then of course, if you are in favour of a permissive Bill, you would be in favour of this?—I hope you do not take me as saying that I should be myself desirous of a permissive Bill passing until public opinion is so much in its favour as to support its operation.

2325. Do you consider public opinion so much in favour of this Bill as to support its operation?—I believe it to be so.

2326. For the reasons which you have given, that is to say, meetings of members of the United Kingdom Alliance, and different societies of that description, where persons have met under their auspices and have passed resolutions in favour of this Bill?—I should be sorry if you have understood me as saying so. My opinion is, that a meeting called by the United Kingdom Alliance would not be in favour of this Bill.

2327. Then what meeting would be?—What I mean is this, that the United Kingdom Alliance believe that on Sunday those public-houses ought to be closed altogether.

2328. And that nothing should be had to be drunk off the premises either?—Quite closed altogether.

2329. Is that your opinion?—I do not think it would be wise for Parliament to pass a Bill at this present time closing the public-houses altogether.

2330. But you would if you could?—I should not, begging your pardon.

2331. If you could pass it, would you not do so?—I would not; as a clergyman, I should be sorry to be responsible for it.

2332. Because you think it would be distasteful to the public?—I go with respect to that 0.69.

question very much upon the opinion of the Earl of Derby.

2333. What was his opinion?—His opinion was that to stop off suddenly, by one Act of Parliament, all access to beer and spirits from the masses of the population would not only be unfair, but impossible, as a statesman's act.

2334. Did you take the opinion of the Earl of Derby upon this Bill, the Sale of Liquor on Sunday Bill?—Mr. Bazley, the Member for Manchester, accompanied me to the Earl of Derby, and Lord Derby stated, in answer to our request, that he would, on the part of the Government, bring the weight of their support to a total closing Bill, that he did not consider, as a statesman, that that would be right. Then Mr. Bazley suggested that a Bill might be framed for the entire closing of public-houses for drinking on the premises, leaving them open for a reasonable time in the middle of the day, and a reasonable time in the evening, for sale only to be consumed off the premises; and Lord Derby's answer was, that he thought such a Bill would have the mark of statesmanship upon it, and that if a private Member brought it in, it might pass through the House of Commons, and his Lordship did not believe that it would be much hindered in the House of Lords.

2335. But the number of hours was not stated by Mr. Bazley?—Yes, Mr. Bazley stated that from half-past 12 or one to half-past two in the early part of the day was a reasonable time, and from eight till 10 in the evening.

2336. Chairman.] Was it understood that during those hours only the sale of liquor to be taken away should be permitted?—That was clearly understood at the time; and in order to make it more certain, we went with a deputation to Mr. Walpole, that there might be no misunderstanding about it. Archbishop Manning, the Rev. Newman Hall, and other gentlemen of influence came with me to Mr. Walpole, when we had a long consultation with him as to the exact provisions of the Bill, and we obtained from Mr. Walpole an opinion, that he would support the Bill as it is now framed.

2337. Mr. Locke.] Was Mr. Walpole in office at that time?—He was; he was then the Home Secretary.

2338. Did you go before Mr. Gathorne Hardy?—We have not officially been in communication with Mr. Hardy; I mean that we did not bring any large deputation to him.

2339. Did you submit this Bill to him?—Yes, we submitted it to him with this magisterial address.

2340. What was Mr. Hardy's answer?—I could not form a decided opinion as to Mr. Hardy's opinion of the exact Bill.

2341. It was not favourable, was it?—It was very favourable and encouraging.

2342. And yet you could not understand it?—No, I did not mean to say so; but I should be sorry to state, because Mr. Hardy did not himself state as distinctly as Mr. Walpole had done, his direct support of the Bill; that is what I mean. Mr. Hardy, I think, reserved the expression of his opinion.

2343. You do not exactly know what Mr. Hardy's opinion was?—As to the immediate details of the Bill, I do not.

2344. As to the proposed enactment you mean?—The details of the Bill; I have no means of knowing Mr. Hardy's opinions as accurately as

Rev.

J. Garrett,

as I had spoken of Mr. Walpole; but I know his general feeling with respect to it.

2345. What is his general feeling?—In favour of the Bill, I believe.

2346. In what respect?—Altogether I believe it to be so.

2347. Altogether as to the hours?—I believe it to be so but I have no definite proof; I cannot say that I know that.

2348. Did you hear what Mr. Hardy said in the House of Commons about it?—Yes, I always have felt that Mr. Hardy was anxious for this inquiry; but it was a point upon which Mr. Hardy reserved, as I understood, his direct opinion, until the evidence before such a Committee as this, should show whether the provisions of the Bill were really suitable to the country or not; that seemed to me to be the position of Mr. Hardy.

2349. Chairman.] You disclaim, on the part of working men, their use of public-houses as clubs; I asked the question early in the day, which I dare say you heard upon that point, whether public-houses are not used as clubs by those who frequent public-houses; that may be true, but at the same time you may disclaim very properly on the part of those who do not use public-houses that they are their clubs?—I believe that it is a very unfair thing to bring the case of gentlemen's clubs at all into comparison with the position which working men are in with respect to public-houses and beer-houses.

2350. Is it not the case that a great many working men use the public-house as a place of meeting and conversation?—As their place of sitting and drinking, I believe they do.

2351. Is it your opinion that the frequenters of public-houses generally are men who use them for the purpose of sitting and drinking?—Those who use them on Sunday do.

2352. The movement in favour of this Bill is an attempt to impose upon all that which commends itself to one class of the community?—I think not; I think that the right position of the case is this: The movement for the entire closing of public-houses on Sunday would convey to my mind the impression of a desire on the part of a certain section of the community to impose restrictions, which they believe from religious, as well as from temperance grounds, to be advantageous to the country.

2353. You think that one recommendation of this Bill is, that it gives room for the exercise of private judgment?—A much larger body of people support this Bill than would support at the present time an Act of Parliament for the entire closing of public-houses on Sunday.

2354. You do not think that public opinion is ripe for a measure which would be absolutely compulsory on all?—If you mean the entire closing of public-houses on Sundays I do not think it is ripe for that measure.

2355. Mr. Hibbert.] With respect to the proviso in this Bill, giving power to persons in the Metropolitan district to take liquors on the premises and to consume a meal, do you think that it is necessary to give the people of London that advantage over the people in the country?—There are a great number of persons in London who are lodgers, and the lodgers in London are very differently situated, with respect to their Sunday dinners, from lodgers in the country. My own parish in Manchester is largely composed of respectable lodgings for young men in business. In Manchester they invariably have their dinners at home on Sunday. It is a feature of a good lodginghouse-keeper that the lady is able, and keeps a proper servant to make the young men comfortable at her lodgings on Sundays.

2356. Then it is on those grounds that you would agree to the insertion of that proviso for London?—Yes.

2357. Do not you think that the insertion of such a proviso as that would give rise to great difficulties as to what the law meant by a bonâ fide meal; do you not think that it would give rise to great legal difficulties if it came before the magistrates?—I do not suppose that the magistrates would have any difficulty in deciding what a bonâ fide eating-house during the whole week was.

2358. It says that a person taking a bonâ fide meal might take liquor upon the premises; would not it give rise to great difficulty to say what a bonâ fide meal was?—It is a question for the lawyers.

2359. Chairman.] The Honourable Member on my left put some questions to you, in which you were asked if your dispute with a certain society had reference to money matters; I suppose any imputation of that sort is a matter of perfect indifference to you?—Perfectly.

2360. You have no wish, I presume, to say any more about it; of course, your position and character is a great deal too high for you to be caused any annoyance from any imputation of this kind expressed elsewhere?—Except that I should wish this, and I am sure the Honourable Member for Southwark would desire that exactly what is the truth should be known. Such charges were made publicly in a newspaper, and a vote of censure upon me was proposed at a large meeting in Manchester, which is a matter of public notoriety. Some gentleman moved an amendment that a committee of investigation into the whole circumstances, with power to send for the books and papers, should be instituted. That committee of investigation has been held, and a report has been issued by two of the gentlemen forming that committee of four upon the resignation of the fourth, they considering themselves to be the majority of the committee which had then become composed of three members. In that report of the committee they have declared, with respect to that particular point of the funds, that I stand in this position: "The expenditure and cash accounts. We find that the association took authority to collect 5,000 £., that Dr. Garrett incurred no expenditure without express authority, and that he is entitled to receive the sum of 160 £. 14 s. 1 d., as the balance due to him on account of deputational expenses under the resolutions of the executive. We also find that the sum of 30 £. 15 s., remitted to Dr. Garrett in London, from friends in Gloucester, was paid by him to the London Association, the gentlemen in Gloucester who remitted it being well aware that the money would be so applied, and not be sent to Manchester.

2361. You are aware that I asked that question, not from any idea that it was necessary to have an explanation, but, as the matter had been referred to, to enable you to say anything that you thought fit upon the subject?—I know your purpose, and I thank you for it.

SIR JAMES FERGUSSON, BART., IN THE CHAIR.

The Most Reverend ARCHBISHOP MANNING, called in; and Examined.

2362. Chairman.] ARE you aware of the provisions of the Bill before this Committee?—I am.

2363. You have taken a great interest; have you not, in the question of imposing further restrictions on the sale of liquor on Sunday?—Yes, I have taken great interest in it.

2364. Will you state to the Committee your opinion of the working of the present liquor law, and what improvements you think are urgently called for?—My belief is that the sale of drink is less limited on Sunday at this time than the sale of any other article of food; that it is an exception in our legislation, and a very dangerous one. I believe that the evil of drunkenness has been steadily increasing; I am aware that there is a difference of opinion upon that point, and I have attended to the arguments adduced on the contrary, but I cannot say that they have affected my opinion; it is acknowledged that the consumption of beer, spirits, and wine has greatly increased. I believe that to be an undeniable fact, and I believe the connection between that increased consumption and the increase of drunkenness on Sunday can be very easily proved by observation; and although it is not in the Bill, nor is it before the Committee, I feel that I cannot exclude the mention of Saturday night, which is the eve of the Sunday, as the most dangerous time for our working people; it is a time when they have the wages of the week in their possession and their time at their command; and the abundance of evidence taken in 1853 and 1854, confirmed by my habitual observation, proves to me that the evil of drunkenness is far greater on Saturday night and on Sunday than during all the rest of the week. I believe, therefore, that the present state of the law is quite insufficient; I believe that all the moral efforts that we are using are at this moment counteracted and paralysed to a very great extent by the present condition of the law; and unless the Legislature intervenes to undo part of the evil which it has done, what we are endeavouring to do for the correction of drunkenness will be inefficient.

2365. Before proceeding to examine you with regard to the special provisions of this Bill, will you state whether you are aware that the police reports show an actual diminution of the number of persons arrested for drunkenness and offences into which drunkenness enters?—I am perfectly well aware that in Scotland that is the fact.

dence of the metropolitan police; are you aware of it?—At this moment, as to London, I am not aware of that fact; of course my information may be imperfect upon that point.

2367. We have had evidence from Sir Richard Mayne to the effect that there is a gradual and progressive diminution in the cases of drunkenness; that might be true, and at the same time the quantity of fermented liquors sold be still increasing, on account of the greater wealth of the population?—Yes, it might certainly be so; that great efforts are being made to counteract the temptations to drinking, and have been made in the last year, is perfectly certain, and that they have had some effect I have no doubt; I can speak with a knowledge of one particular occasion. Every year the population for which I am more especially responsible, about 200,000 of the poorest in London, are exposed to very singular temptations for about 48 hours; I mean at the time of the feast of St. Patrick every year. During that period we take special and very active steps, if possible, to prevent the entrance of any of our people into public-houses; and, I am bound to say, with very marked success year by year. I can answer for the last three years, in which magistrates and the bench, I believe, have given testimony, that there has been hardly any instance of charges on those days. There is also an association for the suppression of drunkenness among us, one part of the duty of which is to encourage men in a determination not to drink at a public-house on Saturday night and Sunday. I am quite sure that the other religious bodies in London, some members of which, I believe, have already given evidence, or will immediately follow me, have been making efforts of the same kind with very great earnestness and very great success. I am, therefore, quite prepared to hope that there has been a diminution of the instances of drunkenness; I have no doubt of that, but I would observe that the police cases of drunkenness afford no evidence of the extent of drunkenness. The report of the Committee in 1854 distinctly says, that the statistics that they had before them were not sufficient to prove the extent of drunkenness, but that all that was brought before them proved that drunkenness extended far beyond the cognizance of the police; because the police take cognizance only of contraventions of the public peace and the public law, whereas drunkenness which falls short of breaking the public peace in the street is very frequent, and therefore I do not think that the testimony of the metropolitan police would be a sufficient answer to the statement with which I began. I believe that there is a vast amount of domestic drunkenness and drunkenness in every class which does not fall under the cognizance of the police.

2368. Undoubtedly, all will admit that there is a vast amount of drunkenness; the only difference of opinion would be as to the best efforts to diminish it. And, again, it will be admitted that the cases coming under the cognizance of the police are those who are either drunk and disorderly, or drunk and incapable, and that beyond those conditions there may be a vast amount of drunkenness; but you said just now that Saturday and Sunday, being the nights of the week on which the working classes have most money in their possession and most leisure to spend it, are those nights on which the greater amount of drunkenness takes place; but we have it in evidence, from nearly every witness who has spoken on the point, that a greater amount of drunkenness takes place upon Saturday night than on Sunday. With one exception, every witness has said that; therefore this Bill, which proposes to restrict generally the number of hours on Sunday during which liquor may be sold, would not touch the evil, which is most prominent on Saturday evening?—I quite admit that; and I think I am correct in stating that a Bill was lost not long ago by an attempt to insert Saturday night. I believe I am correct in that fact. I regretted extremely that it failed, because I entirely agree with the evidence which has been given, that the greatest amount of drunkenness, measured by hours, will be found on Saturday night, and for this very obvious reason, that the men are sometimes paid their wages in public-houses, or, if not paid there, the men enter the public-houses with their pockets full of the week's wages, and I am sorry to say remain there, in many instances, until they have entirely spent their week's wages. More mischief is done, therefore, upon the Saturday night; that I admit. But when a Bill is offered to us which will at least check the consequences on the Sunday, that I accept as a great boon, though I do not consider that it is an adequate measure. If the Committee will allow me, I will read a few sentences out of a letter. It is an anonymous letter; but I think the Committee will not reject it for that reason; it is written by one of my own flock, who signs his initials.

2369. May I ask whether the writer is known to you?—I could not say that he is known to me by name, and therefore, perhaps, the evidence would not, strictly speaking, be admissible at all, but the moral evidence of the letter shows that he is a person who is in communication with me. I read these sentences, because, as the honourable Chairman has referred to Saturday night, although it does not fall within the scope of this Bill, I, perhaps, may be permitted to make a comment upon that point. This gentleman writes, saying: "I see that you are engaged in the effort to close the public-houses on Sunday. Allow me to say that the real mischief is done on the Saturday night. This is the pay-night of most people in a subordinate capacity. They have money in their pockets, and adjourn to a public-house with a few comrades. It is a pity for the poor wife and family if it rains. He remains a willing prisoner till perhaps he is turned out at 12 o'clock. It is needless multiplying arguments.

A walk from Aldgate to Mile End between 12 and one at night will convince any one. I do beseech you to exert your powerful influence against Saturday night; it is a great deal more dangerous than Sunday to wives and children. Pray try and get the closing hour of Saturday night altered from 12 to 11. I think it would be an easy matter. Had I my will, I would limit any tradesman to 11 o'clock, if only on account of the white slaves who knock out a miserable life in their employ. You may say what you like against Sunday, but, as regards intemperance and poverty, it is Saturday night which does the mischief." I entirely concur in the opinion of that writer; and I believe it is a fact. The present Bill does not include the Saturday, but I am only too thankful to get a partial closing on Sunday, because I know this, that the instances in which men exhaust the whole of their week's wages on a Saturday night, are, I am sorry to say, not few, and there are many who spend what may remain on Sunday morning as soon as the houses are opened. The writer of this letter speaks of the way in which respectable families spend the Sunday, and he argues for the importance of allowing the sale of drink to be consumed at home, in which I believe we are all agreed; and he goes on to say: "But there are persons who get drunk on Sunday mornings. I will explain. It is well known among common people who have their eyes open that drink is obtainable at any hour on Sunday, in spite of enactments to the contrary. If you choose to inquire you may find such places in plenty on the south side of the Commercial Road East, and I suppose in the poor districts generally. I may remark in passing that a large number of such places exist in the immediate vicinity of Saint Ann's, Spitalfields, where you assisted at mass some time last year, on the anniversary of Saint Ann, I think. I may tell you that the publican has the sympathies of the residents in the neighbourhood. A man is posted at the door, and it is an easy matter to dodge a solitary policeman in full uniform, particularly when the public-house is at the corner of a street, as is frequently the case. On entering you find a man at the door, who has opened it in response to a signal from the man outside. The bar is covered with linen cloths, I suppose to prevent evidence in the shape of spilt beer, in case of an unexpected visit from the police. The trade is beautifully brisk, customers not being allowed to dally any longer than it takes them to drink the liquor they have purchased. The beer, as may be imagined, is not equal to that usually sold at the establishment; but I have to speak of Saturday night." Then follows the passage which I have read, and he states that those who are turned out at the closing of the house remain waiting until they can enter on the Sunday again. Therefore I believe that this Bill, although it is only partial, is of very great importance, and would check a great amount of drinking.

2370. Does the writer mean that persons would absolutely remain in the neighbourhood of a public-house from the late hour on Saturday night, where they had remained by an evasion of the law, till one o'clock on Sunday?—I believe it was stated in evidence before the Committee in 1853-4, that there are instances of the kind, that persons remained lingering about from Saturday night until the opening of the public-house on Sunday morning, and enter again. The

The evidence here given is with regard to persons who get in by fraud, and by the connivance of the police.

2371. You take it as the evidence of a person who is anxious to state the truth, that there is already a great evasion of the existing law?—Yes.

2372. Will you look at the provisions of this Bill, to see how far they would, in your judgment, meet the evils; are we to take it that you are of opinion that the restrictions proposed, as far as they would go, would be a step in the right direction?—Yes. The non-consumption on the premises and the limitation of certain hours, I consider a step in the right direction.

2373. But if the present law, so far as it goes, is so much evaded, would there not be a greater temptation to evade it when it became much more stringent?—Probably there would, but I believe that those evasions would not by any means restore the evil to the extent to which it existed before; and if I may be permitted to say so, I should wish to give in evidence, that which I feel would be contrary to the belief of some whom I have the honour of addressing, and that is, that the Forbes Mackenzie Act in Scotland, although greatly evaded, of which I have not any doubt, has so far prevailed, that I am confident that it has diminished the consumption of spirits in Scotland. I think I am therefore warranted in assuming that the amount of drunkenness is less, but for the present I will not say to what extent. I quite believe that there will be evasions of the law under Mr. John Abel Smith's Bill, if it passes, as I hope it may, into an Act; but the first thing I observe is this, that the prevention of consumption on the premises will render it more difficult, and will have probably an effect in checking it, and I think that not only one very important moral consequence will follow from it, namely, the diminution of consumption, and therefore of drunkenness, but the restoring of our poor to their own homes; and that I should hope hereafter to show is one of our greatest dangers at this moment. I believe that no population could be found—I was going to say, in the world, but to be moderate, I will limit it to England—that is more entirely undomestic than the great mass of our poor in all our large towns, and especially in London. And I would beg to state the reason why I think that that is so evident, and why I think our public-houses constitute the first and the chief mischief. I have no doubt that the morals of the people are undermined, and are destroyed by the destruction of the domestic life, and of all that which in England we happily know in our country parishes, where the cottagers have a home and a hearth, and where their families have something like domestic order, is entirely lost among our poor in London to a very great extent. And I am confident that the attraction of the beer-shop and public-house, as stated here in this letter which I have read, drawing the labouring man from his wife and family, is one of the chief causes which has destroyed the homes of our poor.

2374. You think that the manner in which public-houses are used in this country and the general habits of the people are such that, as a rule, the public-houses cannot be used innocently, as they are in some foreign countries; that is to say for convivial meetings, without abusing it?—No, I do not think so. I think that, unfortun-nately, the enormous capital invested in brewing and in distilling, and the enormous increase of beer and spirits, and the consumption of both, has spread the habit of drinking among the lower class of our population; and I am sorry to say it is invading other classes too; and as we not only had positive evidence before the Committee of 1853 and 1854, but as I have evidence in my own daily experience, is invading women upon a large scale, and also, as was proved before the Committee of the House of Commons, is invading children. Therefore, I feel perfectly satisfied that some time will be required before we can reduce our public-houses to such order as that they may be used, as you say, for convivial and innocent purposes without excess. I think that the evil has been done to a very great extent, and is being done every day; and the longer we delay the remedy the more uncontrollable that evil will be. But, it appears to me, that this distinction is to be drawn. Public-houses, as they were originally known in our law, were houses of call, or they were houses of legitimate trade and supply for domestic use; but, after some years, the great facilities of licensing houses for the sale of beer, and also the diminution in the price of spirits, increased greatly the consumption of both; and a class of houses has sprung up which can neither be justified by the necessity of a house of call nor by the legitimate use of supplying a family. We have got now houses, which I must call neither more nor less than drinking places, boozing places, and places of drunkenness. If you take London, I am afraid to say how many thousands there are, licensed for the sale of beer and spirits; and of those many thousands, I imagine the number which are legitimate houses of call or legitimate houses of supply are very small, as compared with the great multitude which are not required for either of those purposes. Mr. John Abel Smith stated a fact of his own observation, and I also stated another, on the same occasion, to the effect, that within about 200 paces in York-street, in Westminster, I counted nine gin shops standing within 200 yards, often two or three doors of each other, and Mr. John Abel Smith counted 14 in about 250 paces in Knightsbridge. It can never be said that those are either houses of call or houses of legitimate use for families; and I therefore believe that this third class of houses, which has been created under the operations of the law for the last 30 years, and has become now exceedingly numerous, houses open on Sundays universally, are not needed for any legitimate purpose, but are sources of unspeakable demoralisation to our people.

2375. The Committee have been anxious not to go into the licensing question, but I think that the answer which you have just given is quite pertinent so far to our inquiry, because you have illustrated a number of houses open on Sunday by what you have stated; but we ought not to go further into that part of the question. You have referred to the operation of the Act called the Forbes Mackenzie Act in Scotland, which is before the Committee, and a witness who has taken great interest in the case in Scotland, Mr. McLaren, will no doubt give evidence upon the working of that Act; but I would ask you whether you have considered the great difference in the habits of the Scotch and English people with regard to the imposition of greater restrictions, particularly in the use of beer; I think I may say from my own knowledge that the great portion tion of the working classes in Scotland are not beer drinkers, and that those who resort to public-houses do so generally for the purchase of spirits, and are rather the intemperate class of the community; whereas there are a large class in England who use the public-houses for the purchase of beer, and by no means with a habit of drinking to excess, who do not exist in Scotland at all: and hence I think it will be admitted that the working of the Forbes Mackenzie Act in Scotland, where the habits of the population are so different, is not exactly a parallel as to the working of a similar Act in England?—Probably that is so; but the purpose for which I would adduce the only fact that I refer to (because I feel that the Member for Edinburgh ought to give his own evidence, and it would not touch his), is this, that before the introduction of that Act, nearly 7,000,000 gallons of spirits were consumed annually, whereas on the passing of that Act the consumption dropped to 5½ millions; I remember stating that publicly last year, and being immediately met by a contradiction showing that in the previous year the amount of consumption had increased; I know it is perfectly true that in the year ending 1867, the consumption had increased over the year ending 1866; but it is equally true that the amount of consumption has never again risen to 6,900,000 gallons, and what is more, the increase of the population of Scotland ought to have brought the consumption to 7,900,000, if it had increased according to the ratio of the previous consumption.

2376. You mean, because the population of Scotland has increased by about half a million since the passing of that Act?—Yes, the consumption ought to have increased, whereas, in fact, it has never reached the consumption of the date of the introduction of the Forbes Mackenzie Act; therefore I think I am warranted in assuming, that the closing of the public-houses on one day in the seven, has had the effect of greatly reducing the consumption of spirits.

2377. Mr. Locke.] Are you aware of the increase in the price of spirits in Scotland?—Yes, I am aware that it has increased.

2378. And the duty has risen from 7s. 8d. up to 10s.?—Yes; I touched upon that matter, namely, the reduction in the price of spirits as being one of the contributing causes of this immense consumption of late years, which I am sorry for.

2379. Chairman.] The reduction in the price of spirits other than whisky, in England, you mean?—Yes.

2380. I would ask you, have you considered that, owing to the habit of the people of Scotland of drinking spirits, the diminution of the consumption which was proved before the Forbes Mackenzie Commission is not an exact parallel with the effect of a restrictive Act upon a population who resort to public-houses in a great degree for the purchase of beer?—Only in this point; that as it has diminished the consumption of spirits in Scotland, so, I believe, it would diminish the consumption of beer in England; the same restriction would do so.

2381. Have you considered the effect upon a population whose habit is to consume every day a great quantity of beer, if you pass an Act by which this habit would be, in a very great degree, infringed upon?—I began by stating, what I believe to be the case, that the amount of beer consumed on Sunday would be very much greater than the amount of beer consumed now upon any other day in the week.

2382. Perhaps you would include Saturday?—Saturday night and Sunday; that the amount of beer consumed by each individual far exceeds the amount that that individual would consume in the ordinary use of every day, even in hard labour; and that therefore it is not a consumption of beer for the purpose of sustaining nature and slaking thirst, but it is the consumption of excess, and of idleness, and of temptation.

2383. That being the habit of a great portion of the people of England, and the restriction imposed in 1854 having given rise to a great amount of complaint, so great that Parliament thought proper to repeal the Act of 1854, do you think that such restrictions as are proposed by this Bill, which would go further than those which were complained of in 1854 and 1855, would be accepted by the people with such an amount of acquiescence as you could hope would enable them fairly to be carried out?—I think you refer to Mr. Wilson Patten's Act; and I am a little disposed to believe a statement which has been made to me somewhat confidently, that the opposition which was made to that Act was not the spontaneous action of the people, but was to a great extent stimulated. I state that only because I believe it. I am not in a position to prove it, but I am very much disposed to believe that the opposition to that Sunday Act was not the spontaneous action of the people. I am led to believe this, first, because the statement has been made to me by persons who were in the midst of the matter at the time, although I was not; but I am led to believe it from facts which are now before my eyes, namely, the very great extent to which the working people of this country are at this moment moving in favour of such a restriction as this Bill now proposes; and I may say that what I am now going to state, are, I think, without exception, facts of which I have been personally a witness, or with which I have been personally in contact; first of all, from the population for whom I am responsible, which, as I described before, is 200,000 of the poorest in London. Within the last two or three months, a meeting was held at Exeter Hall, and most numerously attended, strictly by the working class and their families; and the fourth resolution on that night was a strong expression of sympathy with the Sunday Bill, and a resolution to use all the efforts in their power to promote its passing into law. Consequent upon that meeting, a petition was sent round for signature, and in a very short time there were returned 47 copies of the petition bearing 8,500 signatures, chiefly from London alone. The smallness of that number, I would beg to observe, arises from the fact that the quality of the people with whom I have to do is strictly of the poorest and humblest kind; and perhaps a great many cannot do more than sign their mark, and therefore the smallness of the number is no test whatever of the absence of sympathy with the purposes of the petition. Then further, I may refer to the meeting of last year at the Guildhall in the City, which was attended, I should think, by at least 3,000 persons, of whom a very large number must have been working men, and they were enthusiastic in their desire, and that meeting was held for no other purpose than promoting the Sunday Bill. Again in about November last year, I was present at a meeting in the Free Trade Hall at Manchester, which was crowded to excess. I am afraid to say how many thousand persons were present; and of those, I am convinced by the great majority were working men. They were unanimous and more than enthusiastic in their desire for not only a Sunday Bill, such as is now proposed, but for total closing, because I believe the greater part of them were for the Maine Law. Again, last year; this is a point with which I have had no personal contact, but it is notorious; there was a deputation sent from the Leeds working men to London, expressing the same desire for the Sunday closing; and from Manchester also. Indeed, from almost all of our chief towns; and from Liverpool and Newcastle there were the same expressions. Again, I was present this year at a meeting held in Spitalfields, of my own people, who were unanimous in their desire for restrictions far larger than those in this Sunday Bill. Then again, in Manchester, there was a working man's league established for no other purpose (and I have no doubt evidence has been given on Friday upon that point) than promoting this Bill. When I was in Manchester the other day I met the secretary and several members of their committee, who were urgent in asking me to come and attend a meeting of working men sometime in this summer, at Manchester, to promote this object. I have also another fact, which was sent to me within the course of the last two days, and I do not think that it has yet reached the Committee, although it has just appeared in print. There has been a house to house canvass in Altringham, Barrowford, Brierley-hill, Bolton, Burslem, Buxton, Bury, and, in fact, in many other places in the counties of Cheshire, Lancashire, Staffordshire, Derbyshire, Lincolnshire, Yorkshire, and in a part of North Wales; and in this paper there are between 20 and 30 very considerable towns in which there has been a house to house canvass to ascertain what is the desire of this class of persons with reference to the Sunday Bill; and the result is, that 58,803 persons were in favour of the passing of this Bill, and 9,406, that is not one-sixth, were against the passing of this Bill, and 4,443 were neutral. Here we have the evidence of six to one of a class who may be called the working men of the country. The next fact seems to me to be one of greater importance still, and that is, a workshop canvass of the chief factories and houses of business in Manchester, Rochdale, Oldham, Bolton, and the chief towns of the north; and the result is, that of the working men in those factories 4,221 were in favour of the passing of the Bill, 562 only were opposed to the passing of the Bill, and 241 were neutral. The proportion is nearly the same. I think the importance of this is very great, because this canvass was from house to house among the working men, and in the factories where they were congregated together, where the public opinion is very strong, and it requires a strong conviction in a man's mind to declare, in the face of his comrades, in favour of passing such a Bill as this.

me evidence that working men do take an interest in the matter, and they have sent me this within the last two or three days; perhaps it may be well just to mention one or two of the cases: here are Hall & McKerrow, manufacturers, Manchester, 174 men, all of them in favour of passing the Bill, one against, and one neutral; another, Parr, Curtis & Co., manufacturers of machinery, in Manchester, 341 in favour of the passing of the Bill, 73 against, and 18 neutral; Richards, Parker & Co., cotton-spinners, in Kirkham, 154 in favour of closing, none against it, and only two neutral; in two other cases there were 62 and 66 respectively, unanimous in favour of it; Walker & Barrett, cotton-spinners, at Kirkham, 235 in favour of passing it, three against it, and two neutral; Cleveland Iron-works, 277 in favour, 67 against it, and 19 neutral; and so on, the others bearing about the same proportion.

2385. Are you aware whether any such canvass has been undertaken in any part of London?—I think not, systematically; I am not aware of the fact, but I have no doubt that it will come. And if I may add to that the testimony of the clergy whom I have under me, nothing can be stronger. The way in which this bears upon the homes of the people, upon the condition of the wives, upon the condition of the children, upon the morals of the whole family, and upon the education of the children, is so direct, and I must say, so disastrous, that I can find no words to overstate it. Every week I hear instances of families entirely destitute, the children without education and without maintenance in consequence of the drunkenness of the father or the mother, or both. And lastly, I may say from my own eyes I have evidence of this, because very near to me there is a court which is capable of holding perhaps 20 or 25 families, in which not less than 80 families are crowded together; there are seven families in a house, each occupying only one room, and a family in each cellar. On Christmas eve last I went round to those houses, and the very first latch I lifted was of a room desolate, cold, and almost dark, and I could see a woman of middle age, dead drunk, lying asleep; that was the first sight. I know that in that court cases such as this which I had before me are not at all infrequent. Here is a man who has been in constant work for six years, and never lost a day's work; he receives 23s. 6d. a week, and his wife often earns 10s., and they have only two children, but that man drinks on Saturday night and Sunday; his home is wretched, and all the furniture in his house is not worth 3s., the children go to no school, and he has no clothes, as he says, to go to church. That, I believe, to be a sample of multitudes of families, and I must say that I believe the cause in a great measure of this misery and demoralisation is simply drunkenness. And again I must add, that the cause of that drunkenness is the excessive facilities and the dangerous facilities which are now afforded to the working classes on Saturday night and Sunday, by which they are drawn from their better resolutions and spend their honest wages.

2386. Then you think that if the restrictions proposed in the Bill were placed upon the buying and drinking of liquor in public-houses, to the extent to which persons determined to drink would avail themselves of the power of purchasing liquor to be consumed in their own houses, it would not produce evils so great as drinking in public-public-houses?—I think that if there were a more vigorous execution of the law, it would meet that case, because I quite admit what you have said, that the law may be evaded; and the evasions of that law, as indeed is the case with all laws, may be so extensive that the amount of check upon drunkenness would not be all that we aim at; but, coupled with restrictions such as are proposed, I think there ought to be a much more efficient execution of their duty on the part of the police. Hitherto, I think we have all been aware, from evidence taken before a Committee of the House of Commons, that the police is not sufficiently exact in enforcing the law; if it were so, I believe the amount of drinking, in what I call boosing-places, would be very greatly diminished; and I think that another effect would follow, namely, that the destruction of domestic life and of the families of the poor would be counteracted to a great extent; but a question was asked me just now, upon which I should wish to make the answer which I had intended to make, but did not, because it would have interrupted the subject upon which we then were. There are two things which I feel confident must be tributary to the work which we are about, or we shall not attain what we desire; I believe that one great cause of driving a man to a public-house where he has the benefit of a fire and a clean room, at least, is because the homes in which they live are not fit for human habitation; I cannot use any other words for it than saying that they are not fit for human habitation; this is a question which I know has been brought before Parliament, both last year and in the present by Mr. M'Cullagh Torrens; I do not now pronounce any opinion upon it; I know that there are difficulties in controlling the building of houses, of any class, especially the poorer class, but it appears to me that where houses are built which are neither large enough for the occupation of families, where they are not sufficiently lighted to be kept clean, where they are not sufficiently aired to be healthful, and where there is no provision made for the laying on of water, especially while our water companies supply only for a certain number of hours during the day and not at all for Sunday, which I believe to be the fact; and I think I am not wrong in saying that a Bill is actually before the House of Commons, or will be, on that subject, which I hope may become law; I feel convinced that until the homes of our poor are made fit for human habitation, we shall not counteract the strong temptations to poor men to go and sit by a warm fire, in a comparatively clean room in a public-house; that is one point, and I quite admit that such a restriction as this, taken alone, would only be an inadequate remedy.

2387. What I intended particularly to ask was, whether the persons who are determined to drink would not indulge themselves by buying liquor during the hours when the public-houses are open for sale, and taking it home and drinking it in their wretched houses?—I am afraid so.

2388. So that you cannot hope by this Bill to check that evil?—I think that there is this check. There is no question that a working man when he goes alone to a public-house is entirely without any moral restraint; he loses his own self-control; he has not the eyes or the influence of his wife upon him; the wife, poor woman, is obliged to come and bring him home, probably drunk, at midnight; but if he were to go to his own home, and carry home the beer which he has purchased, the probability is that he has sufficient humanity in him to share it with his wife, and I believe that a very powerful, salutary, and peaceful moral control would be imposed upon the man and upon his habits. I feel quite sure that anything which will reconstruct the homes of our poor, and induce them to take home that which they now drink in excess in a public-house, and to subdivide it among their families, would have a tendency to produce a large amount of comfort and health, and certainly sobriety. Therefore I am not afraid of its being bought and carried home, although I quite admit that abuse may arise from it.

2389. In respect to the widespread movement, with regard to restriction to which the working classes are parties, and which must be well known to everybody, because I believe it goes on in every part of the country, is not that movement one in the direction of restricting others, rather than to obtain restrictions which would be binding on the persons who are asking for them?—Yes; that is to say, the majority of 6 to 1 here would bind the remaining minority, and would deprive them of a certain liberty which they now possess. I do not deny that; and it appears to me that if there were an absolute suppression of the sale of all drink, which is contended for very strongly by many, and has been practised for many years in some eight or nine of the states of America, I quite admit that there would be a sort of forced limitation upon the unwilling: or if it were like the Forbes Mackenzie Act, a total closing and an absolute suppression of the sale of drink upon the Sunday, there again would be a limitation imposed upon the unwilling, certainly more stringently, but it is not so in this case. In this case anybody may purchase during the hours when the houses are open, and carry away what they want; this they are not denied; they are only denied one thing, the drinking upon the premises during those hours, and that for a good, which I think is so obvious to the public, that the hardship is not great. And when I see that in three or four counties in Ireland the population is spontaneously united under the moral influence of those who direct them to close the public-houses absolutely and entirely, not during certain hours only, but altogether; and that that closing movement is not only the act of the drinkers, but of the sellers, and that publicans themselves have led the way in doing it, I am not at all afraid that such a limitation as this would be adverse to the will of the people. I must make one limitation to what I say. I think that this applies to the whole of England, with the exception of London; and I cannot but admit that the population of London is so exceptional, and its moral condition so exceptional, and, I am sorry to say, its moral condition is the subject of so much precaution, that I should be very anxious if there were an attempt to introduce precipitately a sensible limitation to any great amount. I do not think that what is proposed in this Bill would be such a sensible limitation as would produce a recoil of a dangerous kind; but I would earnestly suggest this. Why should not this Act be made a permissive Act if it cannot be made an Act of obligation? Why should it not be made a permissive Act, so that those parts of England which can adopt it may adopt it? If the House

Commons refuse to make it of obligation, I do not consider that the subject is disposed of. I think it would be a very fair case to try whether it might not be accepted as a Permissive Act, and it would be the commencement of a more general application of the law.

2390. There would be great difficulty in putting in force a Permissive Act in the metropolis, would there not?—I admit that there is great difficulty, because there is a population of nearly 3,000,000 of people, and as I said before, a state which is unhappily well known to be very extensively demoralised. I quite admit that there is great danger in anything which very suddenly touches the ordinary habits of a large mass of men; but this restriction appears to me to be a very temperate one; it is only that liquors shall not be drunk on the premises, and that the houses shall not be open except during certain periods of the day.

2391. Are you inclined to think that the opposition to Mr. Wilson Patten's Act was somewhat over-rated?—I think it was somewhat stirred up; I think that there were the influences of those who were interested in the maintenance of open houses, and that induced the demonstrations which were said to be the spontaneous expression of the feelings of the people; I may be wrong, but that has been stated to me by persons who were at the spot at the time, and who observed the facts.

2392. You perhaps think that public opinion has advanced upon the question since then?—Greatly.

2393. Mr. Yorke.] You stated just now that you thought that if, instead of drinking in a public-house, liquor was taken home, the men would be under some kind of moral restraint from the presence of their wives and families; is it not the case that a publican for his own sake to a certain extent acts as a restraint, because he would get into a scrape if people were found drunk on his premises?—Very imperfectly; there is an amount of excessive drinking which calls short of tumult in a house, and is more easily disposed of, and does not require the calling in of the police.

2394. Is not it the case also that unfortunately the men are very often accompanied by their wives to the public-houses?—I think that that is increasing very much; I think that drunkenness is invading, as I said, the class of women to a very great extent, and also children, as we have seen in evidence in 1853 and 1854.

2395. With regard to this canvass, which you spoke of just now, was that a canvass of householders only, or would it include the lodgers in houses?—That I could not answer; it says here, house to house canvass, but it does not distinguish between the two.

2396. As far as I understand your evidence, I think it would go in your opinion to the length of the entire prohibition of the public sale of liquor at all?—I think I have not said that, and on that point I must say I never have been able to go to that length.

2397. Have you followed the effect of the restrictions which have been already adopted, so far as they have gone?—Yes, as far as I am able; I will not touch again upon the question of Scotland, because the Honourable Member for Edinburgh will do that, and in England I am hardly aware; I can speak to the effect upon my own people of an association which keeps them from the public-houses on Sunday; that I can speak to, and I can speak to the effect in Ireland; I have here evidence which, perhaps, the Committee will allow me to read in part, because I think it of very great moment; I think this evidence is of great moment in order to show that the people on their part spontaneously desire that some such assistance on the part of the law should be afforded to them, because the ground on which I take my objection is this: I believe that the Legislature, with the best intention of promoting the comfort and welfare of the poor in supplying them with beverage which they thought healthful and necessary for them, has multiplied the facilities and the temptations to drunkenness; and that those poor people, as Mr. Clay, who was for 30 years chaplain of the Preston House of Correction, has said, have over and over again declared to him, that they wished that beer was 10s. a quart, to put it out of their reach; that the working man, if he could only come to the door of a public-house and find it shut on a Sunday, would be content and go away satisfied; I believe that that strictly is the feeling of the people; that their moral control is not sufficient to stand out against thirst, against temptation, against companionship, against being invited, and pressed and carried off on the Saturday and the Sunday; if those temptations were limited they would be willingly content, and I am confident that the greater number of the wives of the working classes, with the exception of a few, who I am afraid do sometimes go with their husbands, with those small exceptions, I say, I am perfectly confident that they would be the first to invoke such an Act as this. In Ireland this has been done completely by the spontaneous act of the people; the Roman Catholic Archbishop of Cashel wrote this to me on the 26th of February 1867: "You could hardly find any better, any more practical illustration of the moral and social, and domestic benefits, to be anticipated from the closing the public-houses on Sunday, than the working of the temperance law in these dioceses; the dioceses of Cashel and Emly comprise nearly the whole of the county of Tipperary and a good part of the county of Limerick, including within their limits the towns of Thurles, Cashel, Tipperary, Fethard, Templemore, Killenaule, Mullinahone, Ballingarry, Borrisoleigh, and several large villages."

2398. To what extent does the restrictive action go in that district?—To the complete closing on Sunday; it is more than the present Bill; it is the complete closing. He says: "It is not in human nature, but that there should be violations of our Sunday Temperance Law; but, considering the large population subject to it, they are very few and very venial, generally not exceeding one or two pints of porter. The exactness of the people in observing the law is really something wonderful. The pledge was, not to get drunk at any time, nor to frequent public-houses on Sundays and holidays for three years."

which were before very numerous, have become nil. In 'one bridewell every Monday morning there used to be from a dozen to 20 persons for drunkenness on Sunday. Now there is seldom one. For three months not one committal for drunkenness." Then he goes on to say: "The Bridewell of New Birmingham (in the county of Tipperary, within six miles of Thurles) was and is a bridewell for a large district, comprising the Slieveardagh collieries, the workers in which, owing probably to the nature of their occupation, were, before the introduction of our temperance law, noted for habits of intemperance, as they are now for habits of sobriety." The Cashel Bridewell, too, has an extensive outlying district. Committals to New Birmingham Bridewell for offences of every kind, and for drunkenness from 1859 to 1861," which was the date of the introduction of this temperance law—"The total number committed in 1859 was 101, of which 54 were for drunkenness; in 1860 the number committed was 108, of which 44 were for drunkenness; and in 1861, 92, of which 26 were for drunkenness." Then he goes on to say: "In the years 1862 and 1863 I have letters from Mr. O'Kearney" (the Bridewell-keeper, a most intelligent man, in whom the Archbishop of Cashel expresses his entire reliance), "not giving the exact number of committals, but stating that the number committed for drunkenness was less each year and bore a less ratio to the total number committed. In 1864, Mr. O'Kearney was removed from the Bridewell of New Birmingham to that of Cashel, and continued to inform me of the committals for drunkenness. On the 21st of April 1864 he sent me the following return from 1859 to 1863, both included. In 1859, there were committed for drunkenness to Cashel Bridewell, on week days 368, on Sundays 85, total 453. In 1860, on week days 170, on Sundays 35, total 205. In 1861, on week days 143, on Sundays 12, total 155. In 1862, on week days 137, on Sundays none. In 1863, on week days 127, on Sundays none." So that the proportion had declined steadily from 368 on week days to 127, and from 85 on Sundays to 12 in 1861, and the two last years there was not a committal. "In the course of the year 1864-5, I had a communication or communications from Mr. O'Kearney, informing me of a state of things much the same as regards the statistics of drunkenness." That I need not trouble the Committee further with. Then I had a letter from the Roman Catholic Bishop of Ferns, from Wexford; and perhaps I may be permitted to state that the case arose from this fact. During the morning service on a Sunday the Bishop was walking through Enniscorthy, and a young man was carried by him in the arms of two or three others, bleeding; he had been severely if not mortally wounded in a fight arising out of drink. The Bishop then determined to introduce this law, which was an entirely spontaneous act on the part of the people; and he says in his letter: "As might naturally be supposed, there are up and down, publicans who are rather disposed to be restive under the restraint thus imposed on them, and who are kept in order, principally, by public opinion. In the principal town of the county, which is a seaport, some publicans sell spirituous liquors, furtively, to a certain extent; and the same may be said of some two or three localities in the diocese. But, generally, the prohibition of traffic on Sundays and holidays, is observed with a most edifying and consoling fidelity. In this diocese, moreover, the people, unsolicited by me, have transferred fairs and markets for the holidays; the former to the day subsequent, and the latter to the day previous to the holiday on which they were formerly held"; that was with a view of preventing drinking in the public-houses. The bishop says: "I went to all the shopkeepers of Enniscorthy and I can never forget the promptitude and alacrity with which all agreed to abstain from every kind of traffic on Sundays and holidays; there was no reluctance, no hesitation, no starting of difficulties; a ready cheerful assent was given to a proposal, which might at first have encountered coldness and repugnance." If I may be allowed to add to that, I am perfectly confident that the same would be done spontaneously by a great number of publicans at this moment in London; it was taken in evidence in 1853 and 1854, that a considerable number of them, in various parts of London, were prepared to close their houses on Sunday, but they have all said, and some have said to me: "If I close my house on Sunday and my neighbour's house is open, if I lose my Sunday trade I lose my trade in the week; it is not a mere question of the loss of the seventh part of my profits, for it would be the largest part; but I lose my habitual trade;" and, therefore, what I wish to call the attention of the Committee to is this: that the spontaneous efforts of the people and the publicans to diminish the amount of drinking on Sunday is counteracted by the absence of a law which would make others do the same; and the importance of that, I believe, is not only for the people, but the publicans and their families; and I think I am correct in stating that on a canvass of the publicans of Liverpool, out of, I think, 1,400, 900 or 700 at once declared their desire for some law which would give them at least one day of rest.

2400. Mr. Yorke.] How many days in the year would be included in the word holidays?—About eight days in the year, like Christmas-day and Good Friday in England.

2401. Is it your opinion, that under the existing law, drunkenness is increasing or decreasing in this country?—I believe that it is increasing.

2402. But we have had evidence from several police magistrates and others, to the effect that, in their opinion, it was decreasing?—I think the answer to that is, that the cases which fall under the cognizance of the police, are only those which are followed by a contravention of the public law or the public peace.

2403. Would it not be the case, that the greater the amount of public drunkenness, probably the greater the amount of disorderly people who would come under the cognizance of the police?—Not always; some men are furious, others are not. A great deal of drunkenness, of a perfectly ruinous kind, never falls under the notice of the police by any actual violence.

2404. Supposing drunkenness to increase 50 per cent., would you not expect that there would be some proportionate increase in the cases that come before the police?—Yes, in that case, I should.

2405. So far, the charge-sheets of the police office would be a satisfactory test of the increase or decrease of drunkenness?—Yes, I think so; if it went per saltum up to 50 per cent., it would show itself: but it might insensibly increase without the result being very manifest, especially as it it meets with the strong moral counteraction of a very large body of exceedingly zealous men of every religious denomination in London, who are labouring most efficiently among the working men.

2406. As we have seen, both from your evidence and that of others, that Saturday evening especially is the time at which the greatest amount of drunkenness takes place, would it not appear at first sight that if any additional restriction were to be imposed, it should be on Saturday rather than on Sunday?—That would be my wish, I confess.

2407. If you had your wish, you would have restriction on Saturday rather than on Sunday?—I would not say rather on Saturday than on Sunday, because that mixes up another question. There are a great many moral questions, domestic and personal, which mix in with the Sunday.

2408. You would rest the propriety of the restrictions upon other grounds?—I should rest it on both: and I feel that I may do that, because it would not be for a moment supposed that in the mode of observing the Sunday, I should be animated by any feeling but such as would be of a larger kind, and because of what I am going to add to my remarks about the homes of the poor. I believe it to be absolutely necessary that we should provide for the people some occupations and some recreations on the Sunday, which are rational and innocent. There is nothing I should like to see more than a man and his family going out of London on the only day that he can leave it, which brings to my recollection what I used to see in my youth in the country villages. But it is extremely difficult in large capitals like London; and I feel assured that, until we have done something for our people in a way which will relax and refresh their minds on the afternoon of Sunday, after the week's labour, they will be exposed by necessity to the temptation of seeking some grosser pleasure.

2409. I understand it to be your opinion that no intolerable inconvenience would result except in London, from the operation of an Act such as is proposed?—I do not think that there would; I believe Liverpool, and Manchester, and Leeds, large as they are, are very controllable, and that they have a strong desire upon this subject: but London, I quite admit, is so enormously large that the difficulties are greater; but I am not afraid of this Bill even in London.

2410. You cited, did you not, some cases known to yourself of houses in which the police under the present law, either from connivance or from some other cause, or at any rate the authorities, were unable to control the present illicit traffic in liquor?—I suppose that they are in part evaded. In fact, what I observe is, that whenever a new part of London is laid out all the corner houses are taken, or when I say all, a great number of the corner houses, are taken for public-houses; I believe that those public-houses are like Janus with two faces, that they have two doors, and that while the policeman is watching the one, people slip in and out of the other. I have no doubt that the law is evaded to an immense extent in that and many other ways.

2411. Do you not think that if an additional restriction such as this were imposed the difficulty to the police would be enormously increased?—I am not quite sure; I think the law would come in to the assistance of the police in this case; it would give them more to watch in the beginning, perhaps, but the moral habit of abstaining from public-houses would be formed, I think.

2412. Mr. Evans.] I think the Committee understood you to say that you considered that the greatest amount of drunkenness in public-houses took place upon Saturday evening and upon Sunday?—Yes.

2413. During what hours of the day do you think, confining yourself to Sunday, that the greater part of the drunkenness takes place?—I think in the evening of Sunday.

2414. It has been suggested by several witnesses who have given evidence before the Committee, that a salutary effect might be produced in diminishing the amount of drunkenness on Sunday if the public-houses were closed on that day at 10 o'clock instead of 11; do you think that that would be the case?—Decidedly.

2415. Do you think that it would make a considerable difference?—Yes, a very considerable difference.

2416. Although you would be in favour of greater restriction than that, still you think that if even only that was done there would probably be a diminution of drunkenness on Sunday?—I do.

2417. Mr. John Abel Smith.] Your Grace is head of the Roman Catholic Church in England and Wales; do you speak also from personal authority with regard to Scotland?—No, not at all.

2418. Your position gives you a knowledge of a very large number of people?—Yes, of the working people in London and other large towns in England.

2419. Could you state at all what number of people it brings you into connection with?—I do not know, but I should suppose 1,200,000 or 1,300,000 people; probably it might be more, but cannot be less than that.

2420. And the habits and wishes and mode of life of that large number of people is more or less brought under your eye?—To no small extent.

2421. You have stated that the working classes in England, or a very large number of them, at least, are in favour of the closing of public-houses on Sunday?—As far as I have been able to ascertain from the evidence I gave, and I have not met with any counter expression; I believe that even those who are in the habit of drinking, have a desire to be helped to overcome the habit, and I do not think I can give a better evidence than by reference to a fact which is known, that a very large number of our men come immediately after falling into drunkenness, and ask us to allow them to make a promise to keep away from the public-house; it is a spontaneous act on their part; it is not so much that we seek them. Of course it is our duty to do that, and we do it, but they come to us and ask us to put them under an engagement that they will not do it again. There is the evidence of Mr. Haughton, which I think I may be allowed to refer to, and I think I heard that he was to be examined before this Committee. At all events I may refer to what he said in the year 1853 or 1854. Mr. Haughton stated from his knowledge of the condition of Ireland, that if there were universal suffrage in Ireland there would be a Maine law in a year. I quote that, first, to prove what I believe to be the disposition of the working men in Ireland, and next to say that the men with whom I have to do are those men; that 19-20ths are of the Irish population, 2422. Do not you think that the desire for the closing of public-houses on the Sunday implies a desire for improvement which ought to be encouraged by any wise Legislature?—Decidedly.

2423. And it is entirely a respectable wish and well-motived wish, which ought to be encouraged and sanctioned?—Decidedly. First of all, I am quite confident that all the better part of the working population desire it upon the most obvious motives; and I am also satisfied that, even men who themselves have fallen into habits of drinking desire to be helped out of them, except a few who have lost their reason; but the greater number of those who, from time to time, fall into habits of drinking, would only be too thankful for any assistance.

2424. In carrying out the Forbes Mackenzie Act there has been no difficulty whatever, has there, in preventing drinking on the premises on Sunday?—It is said that there is a great deal of consumption in back rooms, and it may be so; but the only point on which I have to insist is this: that be the evasions of that law either on the spot or in the houses of the purchasers ever so great, the amount of consumption has never reached the amount before the introduction of the Act.

2425. And you think that there would be no great difficulty in enforcing a law of the same character in England?—I think not.

2426. You have stated that one great cause of drunkenness in public-houses is the miserable state of the dwellings of the poor, and that the temptations offered by a gin palace are directly addressed to the feelings of convenience and comfort of the most suffering part of the population. And their yielding, therefore, to a temptation of that sort is a circumstance which can excite but little surprise?—That is my conviction.

2427. With regard to the inconvenience to be produced by such a Bill as that which has been referred to this Committee, taking into calculation the large interpretation put upon the words Sunday traveller, do you think that the inconvenience produced by such a Bill as this which is now before the Committee, would at all bear comparison with the amount of public benefit which it would confer?—No, decidedly not. I thought when you began your question it might be whether the amount of exception, which is inevitable for travellers, and for those who for legitimate motives will go, for instance, out of London on Sunday afternoon, and whose need of food must be met, would be so large as to destroy the law, because the exceptions would become the rule; I believe not. I believe that granting great excess and even an abuse in evasions and exceptions, nevertheless, the substantive benefit extending over the whole population would be sufficiently large to make this Bill, if carried into an Act, a great boon.

2428. I understand you not at all to wish to see legislation carried out in any such direction as would interfere with the visits to the Crystal Palace or to Richmond?—No; I have not sufficiently considered, perhaps, any details on the subject; but I have a very strong wish to see honest and innocent recreation given to our working people. I believe that when men's minds and bodies have been in a state of tension for six days in the week, it is absolutely, I will say physically necessary, for them to have more than the simple rest of their limbs. I think they require something that shall cheer life and give them new ideas; but they do not get it. I must say this, and I say it in the interest of religion, that I do not believe that the sharp transition from hard weekly work to the acts of religion on Sunday, unattended by other contributions to their happiness, which I think comes under the greater part of religious charity, is putting them in a fair condition. I think that they want more than they have at this present moment. I must say, frankly—and the only way in which my evidence would be of any use, would be that I should speak with perfect sincerity—I think that the condition of our working people in our large towns on the Sunday is one which requires very careful consideration, and on our part very great tenderness of treatment. I do not think we have done enough for them. In the country, our working people have the fields, and the trees, and the sun; and their children walk with them, as I know from old experience, and I believe that there they have very great mental relief upon their only day of rest; but I do not think that in London, or any of our large towns, our poor working men do get the mental relief that they want. How it is to be given, or in what form, I do not venture now to say. I might only provoke objection, but I am sure we all agree that something ought to be done.

2429. With regard to the restrictions upon the sale of drink generally, is it your opinion that the restrictions already existing have had an influence in reducing the amount of drunkenness; such restrictions as shutting up at one o'clock on Sunday, and other restrictions of that character?—I have no doubt of it, because if on the Sunday afternoon they were open as on the Saturday night I cannot but believe that the houses would be equally full, except that their money had been spent.

2430. And your hope would be that restriction carried further would have the same effect?—I hope so.

2431. And that there would be no hardship in such restrictions having such a result, unless they were carried so far as to intolerably interfere with the convenience and comfort of the community?—Yes, that is my opinion.

2432. You have stated that you think the habit of drinking amongst women to have increased, but you have no statistics at all, have you, to prove that?—No, I have not, it is founded upon observation of a good many facts.

2433. May I ask whether it is the opinion of your clergy generally?—I think so, because drunken mothers are the most frequent cause of the destitution of the children that fall on our hands.

2434. The calamity upon families of drunkenness on the part of the mother is even more sharp and more extensive, is it not, than in the case of the father?—Yes, because young children are absolutely dependent upon the mother in a sense in which they are not upon the father.

2435. Mr. Baines.] You have expressed a strong opinion that the miserable state of the dwellings of the poor is one cause why they resort to the public-houses; may I also ask you if there is not a reaction, and whether you may not, perhaps, transpose the cause and effect, or whether the miserable state of the dwellings of the poor is not caused by the drunken habits of the men?—Undoubtedly.

2436. And that to a very great extent?—Yes, to a very great extent; the instance I gave of a man who was earning 23 s. 6 d. a week, and whose furniture in his house was not worth 3 s., is just a case in point.

2437. Are you aware that there are model lodging-houses in what I understand to be in your district of the town, south of the Thames, which have become almost a wreck and ruin, although exceedingly well built within a few years, through the drunken habits of the poor tenants?—I have heard so; it is not in my district; I am confined to the north of the Thames, but I believe what you state to be perfectly true.

2438. We have generally heard it said that persons who are returning to town from excursions on Sunday evening after 10 o'clock require refreshment from the public-house. I wish to ask your opinion whether it would contribute more to their comfort and happiness if at that time of night they went to their own houses than if they went to a public-house?—I have not a question about it; it appears to me that the excursionists are always provided with what they need; either that the place to which they go will supply them, or that they take their provisions with them; and when they return home, and the excursion is over, and the work of the day is done, I think to go to bed is the best thing, and I see no reason whatever for their going to a public-house.

2439. And therefore it would be no privation to them to close the public-house at that time?—No.

2440. The working men, too, would be much better fitted for their labour on Monday morning if they went home and went to bed than if they went to a public-house, would they not?—It is notorious that many working men are unfit for labour on Monday morning through drink on the Sunday.

2441. You have given some striking evidence with reference to the state of feeling in several ecclesiastical districts or dioceses of Ireland; I wish to know whether the agreements to abstain from drinking at a public-house, especially on Sunday, and the closing of public-houses on Sunday, were spontaneous and voluntary, or might they be considered as in any degree enforced by any species of compulsion?—No, they were perfectly spontaneous. The only case in which there would be any animadversion would be when a man committing the fault of drunkenness broke this law and also committed sin. In that case, of course, he would be dealt with as we should deal with all such cases as dealt immediately under our pastoral correction; but in respect to the law there is no coercion whatsoever; it is simply and purely spontaneous, and attended with no penalty or sanction of a penal character.

2442. I understand you to say that you are acquainted by various means with the state of the Irish population in several of the great towns of the kingdom, Manchester, Birmingham, Leeds, and so forth?—I hear often from the clergy of those towns.

2443. I think I may say, without any undue reflection, that the Irish are generally considered as perhaps the humblest or rather the roughest part of the population of those towns?—They are certainly the poorest.

2444. May I then ask if you are confident that with regard to this population, occupying that social position, we should have nothing whatever to fear from the carrying out of Mr. Abel Smith's Bill with regard to Sunday closing?—My first answer would be, that in last year, at the time I referred to, by a spontaneous act on their own part, I may say they refrained from entering a public-house on Sunday in a very remarkable way; they respond readily to a rule of that sort for their benefit, and I have no doubt whatever that such a restriction would not produce a recoil or a re-action on their part, or anything like a public disturbance. And as reference has been made to the character and quality of that population, I must say one thing, I believe that the Irish working men are tempted into public-houses and habits of drink more from companionship, and from a certain light heartedness and joviality of character than any other race I know of; that they do not set about it with the gravity which we Englishmen show; that I am quite sure of; and that they respond readily to any efforts to correct them, and that they count any man who tries to correct them their true friend.

2445. Do not you think that multiplying temptations to such a race as that, is one of the greatest possible evils that can be done them?—Yes, that is certainly the case; and it seems to me that what I may rest the case on, is this: I think the Legislature, with the best intentions for the working men of England, has multiplied their dangers with respect to all kinds of drink and all forms of consumption of beer and spirits, and what I would earnestly ask is, that the Legislature should retrace its steps, and that it should impose wise, wholesome, and, as I think, benign limits upon that which it has allowed to be so extensively practised.

2446. I think I understand you to speak, not only your own sentiments, but the sentiments of the Roman Catholic clergy in those great towns to which I have referred?—I think so; I have had communication with a great number of them; perhaps as yet the subject is more new to us than it is to others, because our work is very peculiar; it is occupied very much in certain duties of a ministerial character, with very little contact with public acts of the Legislature, or what is passing around about us, not enough so, I think; I think the more we co-operate in large general work the better: hitherto it has not been possible, but now I am happy to say it is very possible. Whenever the subject is brought before our clergy, from their inquiries into the state of children, their mothers, and their houses, arising from drink, immediately they all come to one conclusion, namely, the wish that there were some limitations that would assist us: and knowing that Saturday night and Sunday are the two great times of danger, they desire to see limitations placed upon them.

2447. Mr. John Abel Smith.] They look upon those drinking habits as the great curses of the day?—Yes; I believe that feeling to be universal.

2448. Mr. Hibbert.] You made some observations with respect to the application of restriction to a large number of people of London; I did not quite understand whether your observation referred to Mr. John Abel Smith's Bill, or to the total closing on Sunday?—No; I expressly stated that I do not apply it to Mr. John Abel Smith's Bill; I think that as far as Mr. John

Most Rev.

Most Rev. Abel Smith's Bill extends, it may be safely applied to London: for examples, I gave the Maine Law of America, and the Forbes MacKenzie Law in Scotland, as being more extensive and far-reaching and rigorous; and I should doubt whether the application of those two laws to the population of London would be safe without a progressive approach to them, but I think that Mr. John Abel Smith's Bill is perfectly safe.

4 May 1868.

2449. I think that your observations were to this effect, that if a Bill for the total closing was introduced, it would require to be applied in a permissive form, and that you cannot apply it to London without great difficulty?—I think that a permissive Bill for the total closing might be very well tried, if the present Bill were rejected.

2450. With respect to Mr. John Abel Smith's Bill, you think the provisions in that Bill with respect to the liquor to be taken with a bonâ fide meal on the premises, meets any difficulties which would arise in the Metropolis?—I do think so.

2451. I do not know whether you are aware of the fact that the Metropolis was the first to introduce a restriction with respect to closing the public-houses on Sunday morning?—I do not remember the fact.

2453. Might not that show that there is not the great difficulty in dealing with London which some people seem to suppose?—I confess that the opinion which I have given has been given with excess of caution, and it has been, in deference to the strongly expressed opinion of men whom I respect very much, as men of experience; and it is obvious that in doing what we wish to do safely and solidly, so as to last, we ought to do it gradually.

2454. With respect to that observation which you made about the houses of the poorer classes in London, that you thought they were so very miserable and wretched that it almost compelled the people to make use of the comfortable fire-side and the comfortable room of the public-house, do you think that the provision in Mr. John Abel Smith's Bill is sufficient to carry out that idea?—No, I think not. My strong conviction is, that unless the whole subject of the houses of the poor be taken in hand, as I think Mr. McCullagh Torrens is desirous to do, it will have a comparatively small effect; I think that laws for house property extending down to the houses of the poor, would be necessary as an accessory to anything that we tried to do on the subject of the limitation of drinking.

2455. Would it not be the case that, while the houses are in this miserable state, it would entail a considerable hardship upon the working classes if the public-houses were entirely closed for consumption on Sunday?—They have to dwell in them six days in the week, and I do not know that it would increase their privations to exclude them from the public-houses on Sunday, thereby increasing their means of getting better homes of their own; because, if the money is not wasted in the public-houses, they have the means of furnishing and cleansing and making their habitations fit for their families.

2456. Do not you think that if we were to carry the restrictions further, we should carry the views of the public with us, if we carried out the restrictions in the present manner; that is to say, to restrict the sale of liquors for consumption on the premises to a less number of hours?—It appears to me that if you allow consumption on the premises at all, two things would follow; first, you would have an uncontrollable permission, which would certainly be exceeded; and, secondly, you would draw people away from their homes, which is exactly what we wish now to correct. We want that class of men who would purchase the beer in the public-houses at dinner time or at supper time, to be induced to drink the beer which they may have bought, at home with their families; and I think that to permit the consumption on the premises during those two hours would, in fact, destroy or neutralise the moral effect of the Bill in that particular.

2457. Are you aware that the Committee of 1854 recommended that the public-houses should be open from 1 to 2 p.m., and from 6 to 9 p.m.?—Yes, I am.

2458. And that they came to an unanimous decision upon that?—Yes; they did so; but it struck me, if I may venture to say so, and I have no doubt that the evidence of that Committee is completely in the minds of the present Committee, that anything more complete, more exhaustive of the whole subject, more detailed and more conclusive than the evidence taken in 1853 and 1854, I never saw; and the report founded upon that evidence appears to me to be so wise and so cautious, that I can hardly think that another Committee would have been necessary in the year 1868. It appears to me that there was ample ground for legislation provided by that former Committee; but 14 years have passed, and I think I am right in saying that there have been no steps taken whatever upon this subject, and in that report there are the strongest recommendations upon the subject. I merely mention them historically. First, there was the licensing; secondly, the control of the magistrates; thirdly, the police; fourthly, the disconnection of drinking from all places of public amusement, like music halls, and places of that kind, a matter which I consider is one of the most crying evils, and one of the most terrible dangers of this day, and one which is increasing; for every year we have new places of this sort opened. I refer to concert and music halls, and places of that kind, which are all public places of amusement, and which will become places of great moral danger.

2459. When you refer to Sunday, do musical entertainments take place on Sunday evening in any of the public-houses within the Metropolis?—That I cannot answer; but in the evidence of 1853 and 1854 I remember there were certain facts stated, that in Manchester sacred music was performed in the midst of all sorts of drunkenness. But I was going further to add, that the Committee of 1854 reported in the strongest way for a Sunday closing, quite equivalent to the hours in Mr. John Abel Smith's Bill.

2460. As I understand the report of the Committee, it was the restrictions with reference to the sale of liquors for consumption on the premises, but allowing them to be drunk on the premises between the hours of one and two, and between six and nine; and you are aware, that after the recommendation of that Committee Mr. Wilson Patten brought in his Bill, which was passed in the year 1854?—Yes.

2461. And under that Act I think the public-houses houses were allowed to be open from one to three and from six to ten, making six hours; are you aware what the result of that Act was?—I believe this was the result, that in the metropolitan district 981 persons less were taken into custody on Sunday during the five months of the Act being in operation, than in the corresponding five months before the passing of the Act; that there was a large diminution certainly.

2462. But Mr. Wilson Patten's Act was repealed the following year, and the present hours were imposed. Has your attention been drawn towards the number of publicans in the Metropolis who now close their houses on Sunday?—Yes; I am happy to be able to complete what I said, because I had not the paper in my hand at the moment. In the Report of the Committee of 1854, it is stated that many publicans in Liverpool, Manchester, and Mary-le-bone in London were in favour of Sunday closing to a great extent, and that in Hackney, Islington, Tottenham-court-road, and Hetherly Tydvil many publicans had closed, and with no loss, and that they did it spontaneously. That was at the date of 1854. I do not know how it may be now.

2463. Do you know whether any large number at the present time in the metropolis close on Sundays?—No; as far as I know, they are frightened one of another. They say, "If I close and my neighbour does not, I lose my trade on Sunday, and consequently all the week."

2464. Do you think that we should get any great number of publicans to close, if the system of six days' licenses were granted to them; that is to say, giving them a license to be open during six days of the week, and closed on Sundays; the license to be granted at a less rate than a seven days' license, on the plan of the cabs' licenses?—I think that the same difficulty would be found with regard to the six days' license that has been found with regard to voluntary closing; that those who sell for the seven days would beat those who only sell for six.

2465. You think that they would be afraid of their neighbours?—I think so.

2467. Mr. Malcolm.] Do not you think that as it stands at present, the Bill would interfere largely with that question which you so much advocated just now, namely, the inducing of working men to go out of London, and make short excursions, and so on, seeing that by this Bill they would be absolutely prohibited from getting any refreshment out of London?—I think that is provided for in the Bill, by the word "traveller."

2468. You have referred to some returns from Ireland which show the population; it is a very sparse population, is it not, in the dioceses of Cashel, and so on?—In those three or four dioceses I should not think it was very small; the counties of Tipperary, Limerick, and Wexford are populous.

2469. It is hardly fair, is it, to draw a comparison between a dense crowded city and such a population as that?—I used it in order to show that those for whom I speak would be equally willing to accept it, and would hail it as a boon; that was the use for which I intended it.

2470. Are you speaking more of the class of Irish workpeople in this country?—Yes.

2471. Mr. John Abel Smith.] Is not the population in the neighbourhood of Cashel the very wildest and the most difficult to govern of any part of Ireland?—Tipperary has an historical name.

2472. Mr. Locke.] With regard to what the Honourable Member has just asked your Grace, if you have the Bill before you, will you have the goodness to turn to line 6, page 2, where it says, "Shall, as respects the sale of the liquors aforesaid when sold for consumption off the premises, be extended to the following hours: that is to say, from half-past two till eight in the afternoon, and from ten to eleven in the forenoon. And as respects the sale of the liquors aforesaid, when sold for consumption on the premises, to the whole of the said days, subject to the following proviso." Then the proviso follows which applies simply to the metropolitan police district. Presuming the application of that clause to the country, that is to say, to the remainder of the country which is not within the metropolitan police district, would it be strictly according to these words, namely, that the consumption on the premises would be restricted to the whole of the said days, do you think that that would be objectionable?—I think not. It excludes only one class. The lodgers, and travellers, and persons bonâ fide taking a meal (which is for excursionists), and others, are included here. There is but one class excluded: those who go to drink for the purpose of drinking, without such motive.

2473. But you see that a person lodging, the traveller, the person taking a bonâ fide meal at a house can only get their refreshment, and can only take a bonâ fide meal within the metropolitan police district; supposing that to be so, would not that clause be very objectionable as far as it applies to the country, because it would deprive the lodger and the traveller of the privilege which he now possesses?—I suppose that the object is not to limit either those who lodge in the house, who may be considered a part of the household, or those who, being travellers, have need of refreshment, or those who take a bonâ fide meal in a house, and who go out, not as travellers, but for excursions for the day; what I imagine is intended is this, that inasmuch as in London the great thoroughfares and great outlets will contain houses where travellers, and those who need a meal may call, in all those intermediate spaces in London there are an immense number of drinking-houses of this kind which cannot be classified as houses of call, but merely houses of drink, and the object is to close them on Sundays, without interfering with the others; and it appears to me, that this Bill does so, and that it would not withdraw anything of the rational use of the sale of liquor from the families of our working men, and that they would have opportunities of purchasing during the hours that the houses are open; it would only have one effect, the houses would be closed during the Sunday, with the exception of those hours, against an immense multitude of those who drink, whose habits are not to be justified by any rational motives of necessity or convenience, such as are here specified.

2474. That is within the metropolitan police district; but out of the metropolitan police district, supposing it closed them all for all purposes, poses, what is your opinion?—The Honourable Member for Chichester means to extend it, if it is necessary, to the whole country, because that which is considered sufficient as a reason for the exception in the metropolitan district, he would consider sufficient and reasonable elsewhere.

2475. The Honourable Member for Chichester does not say whether he applies the privilege of taking a meal to the country, as well as to the Metropolis; but does your Grace think that the taking of a meal in London is such a provision that it ought to be extended to the country?—I imagine that the object of inserting this exception of the metropolitan district is this, that it extends for 16 miles round London; and it is quite obvious that, if the poor go out as they do on Sunday afternoons, into the suburbs of London, at any great distance they will need a meal, and this Act will not deprive them of it. In the country, the same necessities do not exist. Let me take the great extent of England; towns are only here and there of any very great extent; and going out into the country to take a meal is not what our country people do. They take their meals at home, and they return home again at night, between dinner and supper. On Sunday afternoon they would not go to a house of this nature to take a meal; and if they do, I do not imagine that it is the intention of the Bill to impose upon them a greater restriction than they at present are under. What is intended with regard to the Metropolis, is evidently to apply to persons who do not come under the category either of lodgers or of travellers, but who are sojourners living in their own houses in London, but who have reason to take a meal at a public-house instead of their own houses.

2476. But it would not apply to any person living in the country; that is, supposing he was living at Manchester or Liverpool, or any of those large places?—No.

2477. Does your Grace think that that, at all events, ought to be extended to the whole country?—Certainly.

2478. As I understand you, you say that the two most important questions with regard to doing away with drunkenness, are the state of the dwellings of the working classes, and their deprivation from any description of innocent recreation on the Sunday?—Yes, I think that those are two causes which powerfully contribute to our present state.

2479. Do you think that it would be important that a remedy for those two grievances should be adopted in the first instance?—No, I think not; I think that in order of time this is the more urgent, and I think in the order of moral mischief it is far more vital.

2480. Does your Grace think that, supposing this Bill were passed into a law at once, a great inconvenience would not be felt by those persons who now live in such miserable dwellings, and who, I think, as you say, are induced to go into public-houses because their homes are extremely uncomfortable; would not that add to the inconvenience which they now endure?—I do not think that the word inconvenience is one which I used; I said, I think, that the bright fire and the comparative cleanliness of a drinking-house is a temptation to a man to desert his home and his family; I do not think that those houses are to be treated as the supplement to bad dwellings; but I think they form a strong temptation to men whose dwellings are bad to leave them, and to leave their wives and children to inhabit them in their miserable poverty; it appears to me that to share in the poverty of his family would not be unwholesome to him; I do not think that ought to be a subject of complaint by a father or husband.

2481. But this would add to the inconvenience, would it not, supposing they go to those public-houses, and do not commit any excess?—I would not use the word inconvenience; I would adhere to what I said at first; I think that they would be relieved of a temptation which is in a very great degree ruinous to their families and to themselves.

2482. If they live in those miserable places, where are they to go to?—Six days in the week they inhabit them, and their wives and children seven days; and it appears to me that a house which is sufficient for a man's wife and children he ought not to judge as insufficient for himself.

2483. But he is not at home generally during the six days, in the day-time, is he?—No, but his wife and children are.

2484. Supposing he has no wife and children, what then?—In that case the privation does not, certainly, fall upon any other person.

2485. But he must be worthy of some consideration though he has no wife and children?—I should be happy to see his home made better.

2486. Where is he to go to get his meals, supposing he is living in lodgings without any wife at all?—In the case of unmarried workmen, their meals, I conceive, are provided by arrangement, either with a neighbour or with some eating-house keeper, and therefore I do not think this would press hardly upon them.

2487. Mr. John Abel Smith.] I presume they do not eat in the public-houses?—No; the public-houses are not the places where they have their meals.

2488. Mr. Locke.] In those eating-houses they take beer, do they not?—I do not know that the Bill would affect a man bonâ fide taking a meal in any house, I think not. If my memory does not fail me, that clause was inserted in order to meet a class higher than the working man, because there is a very large class, and I believe a very honourable class of legal students, who take their meals at some house of this description, and it was intended to include this class, and it would meet their case.

2489. Therefore it is more necessary that that provision should be extended to all large towns throughout the country?—Yes.

2490. You stated that the sale of drink is less limited on the Sunday than that of any other article. There are certain articles sold on that day, are there not, without any restriction; for instance, by pastrycooks, in fact all those things which are called necessities of life?—I was thinking of bread and meat, sold by the butcher and the baker.

2491. But places for refreshment, such as pastrycooks' shops and so forth, are often open longer than public-houses?—I think they are.

2492. And tobaccoconists' shops also?—Yes.

2493. You meant bread and meat?—Yes, which appears to me to be the most urgent, because it is the most substantial need of men, and the least open to abuse.

2494. You said that on St. Patrick's day there was a great diminution of drunkenness, and that you attributed, I think, to the influence of persuasion suasion and good advice on the part of the Roman Catholic clergy?—And to the spontaneous action of good motives on the part of the people; if it had not responded to most heartily and universally by the people our efforts would have fallen dead.

2495. Do not you think that that is a mode of inducing persons to give up drunken habits which is more calculated to be successful than direct coercion?—I think that both moral and legislative means, voluntary and coercive, are required, because I have before shown you how voluntary efforts are counteracted by two things; in respect to publicans, if we induce any publican voluntarily to close, and his neighbours keep their houses open, it renders it impossible for him to live; it is his ruin, and the moral evil is not limited in extent. In respect to drunkenness, so long as the facilities for drinking, and therefore, as I say, the temptations to drinking, are multiplied to so great an extent, I believe that all our persuasion extends over a very small part of the great field, and that the evil is of a magnitude too great to be controlled by us; and we must have the assistance of the Legislature in doing what I described before as retracing its own steps.

2496. With respect to the Legislature; what are the steps which you think the Legislature has taken which have tended to increase drunkenness?—Speaking in submission to the Chair, I must say that the whole state of the licensing law has in the most formidable way multiplied houses for drinking everywhere, and that the facilities with which licenses have been granted is enough to account for our present state.

2497. That is not exactly the act of the Legislature, is it?—It is under an Act of Parliament.

2498. It is under an Act of Parliament, but it is left to the licensing magistrates?—Yes; I think that the large power so left to them rather needs another tribunal. I must not go too far, under correction, but it needs, I say, another tribunal, which cannot be influenced either by local or political considerations; and I think it needs a control on the part of the magistrates in boroughs and counties which shall be efficient, and the entrance of the police upon all such houses. Those things, I think, have not hitherto been done adequately by the Legislature, and I think, therefore, that the Legislature has to retrace its steps in those particulars.

The Reverend NEWMAN HALL, called in; and Examined.

2505. Chairman.] You are Minister of the Independent Church in the Blackfriars-road, are you not?—It is not exactly an Independent church; it is called the Surrey Chapel; Rowland Hill's Chapel; it is more a free Church of England.

2506. Are you aware of the measure proposed by the present Bill?—I am.

2507. Mr. John Abel Smith.] You are very largely acquainted, are you not, with the habits and wishes of the working population on the south of the Thames?—I am.

2508. Do you believe that there has been of late years an increasing desire to see further restrictions upon the sale of beer and spirits on a Sunday?—Most certainly.

2509. Are you acquainted with the Bill which is referred to this Committee?—Yes.

2499. Are you aware that the licensing Act is a very old Act indeed?—Yes, I know it is an old Act.

2500. It is an Act of the 9th of Geo. 4; so that, in point of fact, the Legislature has not done much lately in that direction?—No, the evil is of long standing.

2501. You were asked a question by the Honourable Member for Leeds, with regard to the houses of the working classes, whether they had not got, many of them, into the dreadful condition in which they are in consequence of the drunkenness of the inmates; that could not apply to the fabric of the house, could it?—I can hardly limit it so far; because, to begin with the staircase, it is often broken and hardly safe; also the doors and windows, the wood-work and the furniture of the houses are destroyed in times of drunkenness or sold for drink; even the wall is defaced, and often the whole house reduced to a condition not fit for habitation. All this comes from drink.

2502. Is it not the fact that the house itself from its size, the smallness and wretchedness of the rooms, and the very small quantity of air which can circulate within those rooms, without reference to its furniture or its decorations, or anything else, is frequently altogether unfit for the habitation of persons, though in point of fact they do live there?—I believe that in some courts at the back of our richest houses in the West End, as well as in the courts near Rosemary-lane, Tower-hill, and a great many dwellings on the south side of the river, they are not fit for human habitation.

2503. The Bill which you allude to, and which I have the honour of having my name on the back of, namely, Mr. Torren's Bill, is directed to the doing away with those very fabrics?—Yes.

2504. But so long as they exist the grievance must exist, must it not, with respect to the working classes; for, however well they may conduct themselves in those houses, they are not fit places to dwell in?—Certainly; but I must press once more that the argument that the public-house is an alleviation to a poor man and a supplement to his bad dwelling is not to be accepted; because his wife and family are doomed to inhabit those houses, and a father and a husband is bound to consider a habitation that is sufficient for them to be sufficient for himself.

2510. Do you believe generally that it would be received with anything like disorder or confusion on the part of the working population that you are acquainted with?—I do not know what the publicans might do, but if it were not for the publicans I am sure that it would be received with thankfulness.

2511. You were in the chair, were you not, at a very large meeting of working men in Lambeth some weeks ago?—I was.

2512. Were there 2,500 or 3,000 persons present at that meeting?—I should say quite 2,000 men.

O 4

2514. And

Rev.
N. Hall.

4 May 1868.

2514. And was the feeling of that body of men zealously unanimous in favour of further restriction?—Most undoubtedly.

2515. Have you any doubt that the existing restrictions have worked usefully, and that there ought to be some restriction on the sale of beer and spirits?—I believe that every restriction is beneficial in proportion to the direction and the extent to which it goes.

2516. And that restriction might be carried further usefully to the people, and without any formidable resistance on their part?—I think that every restriction would be beneficial, but that a moderate measure like this would be carried without any trouble or resistance unless the publicans, as before, were to organise a system of riot which they could easily do, but if the working people were left to themselves I am persuaded that they would receive it as a boon from the Legislature.

2517. I presume there would be a strong feeling on the part of the wives in favour of any restriction?—I should say that the women would be unanimous in favour of restriction.

2518. Have you heard the evidence which has been given by Archbishop Manning?—Partly.

2519. Do you endorse his opinion, that drunkenness is increasing amongst women?—I am not able to say; my personal knowledge of the facts would not warrant me in drawing a general conclusion; I see many instances of drunkenness amongst women, but I am not able to say whether it is increasing; the prevalence of it is very sad.

2520. Have you any statistics to enable you to speak with authority upon the actual increase of consumption?—I have not, but such evidence will be forthcoming in the course of this investigation.

2521. Has there been any canvass of any district of London with which you are acquainted?—A canvass is now going on in London in the neighbourhood of Poplar and Limehouse, up to the present time, and I am informed just now that there is a majority of two to one in favour of total closing; the figures are to be obtained, and they will be brought forward in the course of this inquiry; I have also just had put into my hand the result of a canvass at York; the number of houses in the city being 8,000, the number of houses visited being 7,155, the schedules returned affirming the principle of total closing being 5,390, against 707 negative, and giving a proportion of $7\frac{1}{2}$ to 1 in favour of total closing in the city of York.

2522. Have you any doubt that the opinion in the country with reference to further restriction has been making large progress within the last few years?—Very great progress I think, indeed.

2523. Do not you consider that a feeling which ought to be very respectfully treated by the Legislature?—Certainly, because it is a feeling amongst the very working classes who no doubt will be very much pressed by the restriction, and yet they themselves are those amongst whom the desire is spreading for further restriction.

2524. Do you recollect the opinion expressed at the meeting in Lambeth to which I have alluded, with reference to the question of considering the public-house the poor man's club?—They repudiated the notion altogether.

2525. On the ground that the public-house was not under their own control?—That a public-house was a public place, whereas a club is a private place for the members of the club. They regard it as absurd; such an argument is brought forward by those who must know very little what a public house is.

2526. As an excuse?—As a mere excuse; they themselves repudiate it most entirely. I may say that that meeting was entirely open; there was no attempt whatever to pack it; the doors were never shut. All were received without any ticket; persons knew that they might all express their own opinion; and any amendment might have been proposed; it was a meeting called in the very densest part of South London, and crowded with working men; it is not to be supposed that those men were teetotallers; many of them were no doubt, but the whole meeting was entirely in favour of closing on Sunday.

2527. Chairman.] Do I correctly understand you to say that the notion of a public-house being a club to working men is repudiated by the working classes at large, or that it was repudiated by the meeting called for the purpose of closing public-houses?—It was repudiated at that meeting. It was a meeting called to consider the question of closing; it was not a meeting called for the purpose, as I understand, of advocating and supporting the measure, but of considering the measure so that we might have the genuine expression of opinion from the working men of South London. It was quite open to anyone to try to turn that meeting into a meeting to petition for further extending the hours of drinking rather than for closing the houses.

2528. Mr. John Abel Smith.] Do you believe that that feeling extends to Southwark and other districts lying on the south of the Thames?—I believe it is very extensive in Southwark and Lambeth.

2529. Do you recollect Mr. Wilson Patten's Act in 1854?—I do not remember, personally, much of it.

2530. You do not recollect the circumstances that attended its being passed?—No; I am not able to give evidence upon that subject.

2531. Do you know anything of the state of feeling on the subject of further restriction out of London?—Not distinctly; but as far as I know, and I visit the country a good deal, I should say that the feeling of the working people generally is in favour of restriction on Sunday.

2532. Are you not largely in communication with other ministers in the country?—Yes; but I cannot speak positively.

2533. But your impression is that it is so?—Yes; I was appealed to only on Saturday as I was returning from Yorkshire; one of the porters at Milford Junction station appealed to me, fearing that I had expressed myself as though I was not in favour of restricting laws in this country, because I had said something with reference to the working of restrictive laws in America, and he seemed most earnest about it, that I, and such as I, should advocate the cause of restriction. I was struck with the zeal of this man, who addressed me as he was looking at the tickets.

2534. You did not know him before?—No, I did not know him at all; he knew who I was, and he appealed to me, fearing that I was not in favour of that which he and his class evidently seemed so much in favour of. I took that as indicating the desire of his class to see further restriction.

2535. Speaking with that authority which you you naturally do, first of all as a minister of religion, and secondly as one commanding an establishment of a very large body of men, do you give your sanction to the Bill now before the Committee?—I should most earnestly hope that this Bill will pass into law.

2536. And you do not believe that such inconvenience as is of course incidental to every restrictive law, is to be put against the large public advantage which it would confer?—Not for a moment; of course there would be some inconvenience; but every useful law might be prevented if it is a valid argument that some inconvenience will result. The balance of benefit can have no question of at all; and I believe that every class in the community would admit that, after it had been working a little while.

2537. You heard, probably, what Archbishop Manning said as to the state of the habitations of the poor?—Yes.

2538. I presume that it is hardly necessary to ask you whether you agree in deploring the lamentable condition of those habitations; but do you not think that drinking has a large effect in compelling those people to have recourse to those habitations?—A man who drinks, in proportion as he drinks, goes down from one mode of dwelling to another, until he gets to live in the very worst and vilest hole; and when he becomes a temperate man, the very first thing he does is to provide himself with a better lodging, and that is invariably the case. If a man takes the total abstinence pledge, and keeps it, in three months you will not find him at his former address. The best institution for improving the dwellings of the poor is the total abstinence pledge.

2539. Have you ever been in the habit of walking down the great thoroughfares in Lambeth on Sunday evening?—I am there constantly, and I was there last night.

2540. There is a great traffic in the public-houses on Sunday night, is there not?—An enormous traffic. Any gentleman may inform himself of the state of things on a Sunday night by crossing Westminster Bridge between eight and nine o'clock, and, going along Westminster-road, he will see thousands of young people in bands, and the public-houses and gin-shops at the corners are all open, and tempting those young people. The clerk of my church some time ago saw six or eight young lads in front of a gin-palace on Sunday evening. The eldest had got some gin out of the place, and he was pouring it into a little glass and handing it round to his companions. I consider that public houses being open on Sunday night, when the masses of the population are turning out, to be most incalculably injurious morally, and that there can be no wonder at the prevalence of licentiousness when we have those places open for drinking at such times.

2541. Do you endorse the opinion which has been expressed by so many witnesses, that an immense proportion of the crime of England arises directly and indirectly from drunkenness?—There can be no question of that; our judges gave that testimony, and I endorse it myself most certainly.

2542. Mr. Baines.] Have you ever heard any complaint made amongst those whom you have mentioned, of the existing restrictions with regard to the opening of public-houses?—I never heard such a complaint made either privately or publicly.

2543. Perhaps you are aware that there are restrictions, and considerable ones, which have been imposed by your law since the year 1831?—Yes.

2544. Up to 1831 the public-houses were open 24 hours, namely, from four o'clock on Sunday morning until four o'clock on Monday morning; but since that time they were reduced to 15 hours, and since then they have been reduced to eight hours; and I wish to know whether you have ever heard any complaint made of the operation of those existing restrictions?—I never hear of such a complaint.

2545. If you were told that the number of cases of drunkenness had diminished at the same time that those restrictions were passed, would you think it likely that further restrictions would cause a diminished number of cases?—I should be certain of it. Every restriction of public-house traffic is followed instantly by a diminution of crime.

2546. From what you know of London, should you think that there is any necessity on the part of those who have been in the country during the Sunday and are returning home again, for the public-houses to be open after 10 o'clock at night?—Certainly not. There are eating houses where persons can get meals if necessary; but I think there is no necessity whatever for the public-houses to be open; there might be some little inconvenience, but the injury connected with their being open far preponderates.

2547. Do you believe that it would be better for working men in regard to their health and to their circumstances, and to their families, that they should go home not later than 10 o'clock on Sunday night, than that they should go to a public-house?—There cannot be a question about it. We know that a great number of men are not fit for their labour on Monday; and many a job has to be done, but the master cannot get it done, because the men are not fit for working, and Sunday, instead of being a day of real rest and preparation for a new week, is a day which in many cases unfits men for their ordinary work as well as deprives their families of that which should be the result of their work.

2548. Does it further induce men to get into that unsettled habit which leads them to prolong their debauch, and to renew it on Monday, and go on through the week?—Of course it has that effect.

2549. Would your experience, as a minister of religion, lead you to say that Sunday drinking is adverse to the interests of religion amongst the working population?—Undoubtedly, in this way; first of all, it is frequently an invasion of religious liberty; the wife may wish to go to a place of worship, but her husband drinking on Sunday prevents her continually; the drunkenness of the man interferes with the religious liberties of the woman; I have frequently had women tell me that they had not been able to come to church till their husbands had become teetotallers, for while they were drinkers they would persecute them if they were not at home all day, or if they found them going to a place of worship. In the next place, of course, it is a great counter-attraction to the church; some people think religion is very important; some think that the State should support it at a great cost, and others feel that the greatest privilege they have in their power in respect of money is to support religion and churches, and so on; but the greatest impediment to the progress of religion amongst us, is the influence of the public-house; any one may see that the working classes are there neglecting public worship; they may be seen crowding round the door of the gin palace at one o'clock; those have not been at church at all; and if you go in, as I have done, or look into the door of those gin palaces on Sunday, you will see persons of the very class, whose absence from church we lament, crowding those places.

2550. Do you think it right that whilst other trades are suspended on Sunday by law for the general good of the population that that trade, which is considered the most pernicious of any one, inasmuch as it presents so much temptation to immorality, should be left free?—In reference to legislation I am strongly of opinion that the Government has nothing to do with the religious convictions of the people, and that they in no degree should impose a religious duty nor deprive people on the ground of any religious precept of their rights; but I think that a Government has a perfect right to legislate for the social well-being of the population, and the Government of this country has recognised that principle; it has legislated for the social welfare of the people, and has prescribed a day of rest, and a man has a natural right to do as he pleases with that day. For my own part I may have my opinions of recreation. I consider that a religious person finds the highest recreation and the healthiest recreation in religious exercises, but I would not for one moment by legislation hinder other kinds of recreation in the case of those who are not capable of enjoying those which I think the best recreation, supposing it does not interfere with the rights of other people. If the opening of places of amusement interferes with the equal rights of others, and necessitates the employment of a number of doorkeepers and attendants, hindering them in the enjoyment of their equal rights, imposing labour upon them, and keeping them from the House of God, I should say that impartial legislation would not sanction the providing of recreation for people if such providing recreation for one class of the community would impose Sunday labour upon another class. On that principle, and on that principle only, would I act legislatively, and not because of my principles of religion. I would not by law deprive people of any recreation that may not involve the invading of the liberty of others.

2551. You consider, as I understand you, that Sunday drinking is excessively adverse to the domestic comforts of the female part of the population, the wives of the working men?—Certainly. If you will allow me, I will answer that question presently; but I had hardly finished my answer to the former question. The Government has recognised the principle of legislating in connection with one day in the week for rest, and it seems to me that if other trades are interfered with, so that they are suspended during that day, that trade of all others should be included in such restriction which of all others is the most pernicious, which all persons tell us is the chief cause of crime, of poverty, of insanity, and of suicides; and surely that an exception should not be in favour of that particular trade which of all other trades is most injurious to the population at large, and their social interests.

2552. Do you consider the habit of Sunday drinking to be especially adverse to the comfort and happiness of workmen?—I think that Sunday drinking has special evils. In the first place, men are at leisure; and in the next place they have money, that they have received on the Saturday, and then an opportunity is presented to those persons, and therefore it is not surprising that they should drink a very great deal on Sunday. Sunday drinking deprives the wife and the children of much money which otherwise would go to the comfort of the household; it interferes, as I have already said, with religious liberty, and religious life of the women, who are frequently, by their husbands drinking on Sunday, prevented from being at the House of God. The husband ought to take his share in attending to the little children, that the wife might come to church; but as it is, the wife is left at home, and therefore prevented altogether from doing so. I have known cases in which for years women have been prevented going to any place of worship, because their husbands have been spending the Sunday in drunkenness, and their money also.

2553. Does it operate upon the food, clothing and education of the children favourably or unfavourably?—Most unfavourably. We have always discovered that in the case of the children who attend the Sunday school. Although it may be the case that Sunday school instruction is of a very inadequate character, and there are some persons who look with some degree of contempt on Sunday school instruction, yet I am able to say that there are many poor children in Southwark and in Lambeth who would not get any instruction except for the Sunday school, and who would never learn to read. We have got some children who, in consequence of being deprived of other privileges, and having to get their own living by the exercise of their wits, have such marvellous wits, that by an hour or two's instruction on Sunday, in a few months they pick up the elements of reading; but the children who are most irregular at those Sunday schools are the children of drunken parents. That is the experience of all those who instruct those children, and those children who are ragged children rambling about the streets for whom it is necessary to provide gratuitous instruction, almost leading people to wish to have a law compelling them to go to school, will be found in nine cases out of ten to be the children of drunken parents; and drunken parents are made more drunken by the facilities of Sunday drinking.

2554. Have you large Sunday schools connected with the Surrey Chapel?—Yes, very large; we have 13 schools in the district round about, with about 5,000 poor children or more perhaps, taught by about 450 voluntary teachers, all of whom feel that this Sunday drinking is in direct antagonism to their benevolent labours, and they work unpaid and with very little praise.

2555. Have you ever heard them say that by the habit of Sunday drinking, by the public-houses being open, and by the presence of temptation on Sunday evening, young persons whom it is specially desirable to retain longer in their schools are seduced away from them?—I have often been told, and I have seen statements which I cannot doubt, that very many children, who have been instructed at the school during the day, are beguiled into those public-houses on Sunday evening.

2556. Have you several agencies for the moral and and religious improvement of the people who live around your place of worship?—Yes, a great many.

2557. Are they of the nature of city missionaries, or of what nature are they?—We have four city missionaries connected with my church; we have a missionary specially devoted to the interests of the working men of South London, and we have a series of meetings of various kinds, such as free concerts, secular lectures, tea meetings, and various entertainments, to serve as a counter attraction to the public-house; but in all these efforts we find that the facilities afforded to the population for drinking are such that they interfere with every effort that we put forth to elevate the people around.

2558. Will you state to the Committee whether you have heard the testimony of the agents whom you thus employ for the improvement of the moral and spiritual condition of those around you, upon the subject of Sunday drinking; can you speak as to their opinion generally upon the subject of Sunday evening drinking?—I can speak most emphatically of the universal testimony of all persons engaged in that work; anyone here or elsewhere who would undertake to devote two or three hours on the Sunday to elevate the people, socially and intellectually, just to raise them up from their degraded condition, and endeavour to do them good by personal effort, would at once find the great antagonism of this Sunday drinking, and would at once feel the importance of such a movement as this.

2559. Mr. Hibbert.] Do you approve of the Bill which is now before the Committee in its entirety?—Yes, quite so.

2560. The principle of the Bill is to close the public-houses for drinking on the premises entirely, except in the Metropolis on certain conditions; do you approve of that principle rather than the principle of restricting the hours of allowing liquors to be drunk on the premises as at present?—Yes; I quite approve of the principle of the Bill, and I quite approve of allowing the liquor to be taken to people's homes when they desire it, and feel that they require it, to be drunk off the premises.

2561. You think that that is better than allowing the houses to be open at all for consumption on the premises?—I think so.

2562. Mr. John Abel Smith.] In your opinion is it better to close the houses altogether for consumption on the premises, or to confine the Bill to limiting the hours now existing; that is to say, to allow the premises to be open a certain number of hours for consumption on the premises as well as for purchase, to take off the premises?—I think it is very important to close them entirely for consumption on the premises; I am strongly in favour of allowing persons to obtain drink to carry home; I think it would be going too far at present to deprive the poor of that privilege; it would cause a reaction which perhaps might destroy the good intention of the Bill; but I am quite in favour of entirely closing the public-houses so far as drinking on the premises is concerned; there is very great danger in drinking on the premises; men provoke one another, and although there would be, of course, some excess of drinking at home, the temptation is not nearly so great as when they provoke one another and treat one another under the stimulus of the public-house.

2563. Mr. Locke.] You are aware, I presume, that under the present law the public-houses can be open during eight hours on Sunday in the Metropolis, and 8½ hours in the country; do not you think that if you close them entirely for drinking on the premises, and merely allow them to be open for a short time in the middle of the day, and a short time in the evening, for the purchase of drink, to be drunk off the premises, it might lead to a sort of re-action in public opinion against the change?—I do not know what the publicans might do in the way of organising opposition; they are very powerful, and they can make an uproar. A publican said to me the other day that 50 of his customers, working men, would give a vote for any man for an extra pot of beer round; and I believe that the publicans might combine, and with their great influence over their customers, and especially if they treat them with a pot of beer round, they might get any demonstration in Hyde Park to insult the Legislature of this country, and try to terrify them into repealing a useful law; but if the people were left without the influence of an organised opposition by the publicans, I should have no hesitation whatever to believe that the working people for whom this measure is proposed would very thankfully accept the change in the law. Many men have said to me of those who go to the public-house on Sunday, "You may tell us that we ought not to go, but so long as it is open, and we have money in our pockets, and our companions are in the way, we do not feel able to resist, but if you would only shut those houses up for us on Sunday, we should be very much obliged to you."

2564. Mr. Hibbert.] Do not you think it would be wiser for the Legislature to pass such further restriction as they would be able to retain, than to pass a law for a greater restriction, which might have to be altered in a very short time afterwards?—I am perfectly aware that what is abstractly desirable in point of legislation, may not be practicable, and therefore legislatively it may not be desirable, because it would be going too fast; but I think that this would not be going too fast; the proposed Bill, I believe, could be carried out very effectually. I do not say that there would not be at first an organised opposition, perhaps to the law, but if the Legislature were firm, in the course of a very few months things would settle down, and the whole nation would be benefited.

2565. Mr. Malcolm.] I gather from your evidence that you would like, if you could enforce it, to have entire restriction, in fact, to close the houses altogether on Sunday?—In the present state of the question I do not know that I should. I think it is a useful thing to allow the drink to be taken to people's houses, as there are a number of persons who feel it necessary for their health, or at any rate for their comfort.

2566. You think it impossible to teach the working classes self-restraint, without what I may call paternal legislation, because it practically amounts to that?—I would not have paternal legislation exceptionally, but as we have paternal legislation with reference to drapers' shops, I would have the same paternal legislation with reference to that which to multitudes is absolute poison, or an incentive to crime.

2567. You gave the Committee an instance of some one who spoke to you upon this subject at the Milford Junction, and you argued from that that it was the opinion of that class; do not you think think that that is rather a small premise?—Very small.

2568. It is rather arguing from a particular to a general conclusion?—But I have so many of those particulars, that that was only an illustration amongst a good many others; by itself it would be a very poor argument of course.

2569. The other instance which you gave, and which was a very curious one, too, of a young man bringing liquor out of a public-house, and supplying his comrades with it in the road, I am afraid is a case which would not be met by this Bill; in fact, it would be exactly the thing which could happen under this Bill, and several of the police authorities who have given evidence before this Committee have rather objected to it in consequence, because it might lead to drinking off the premises in the neighbouring street?—I am not able to give an opinion upon that. I may also mention, with regard to the opinion of the working people, in some degree to support my single witness, that meetings in the open air are held in my neighbourhood in the New Cut, and so on; and they have frequently been appealed to as to their opinions of the propriety of closing the public-houses on Sundays, and those audiences gathered promiscuously from the crowd have always been in favour of closing the public-houses on Sunday.

2570. Mr. Baines.] Do you say that of your own knowledge?—I said that with the information of my friend Mr. Murphy, who is connected with me in holding those meetings. I have been the organiser of those meetings, and although I have never happened myself to appeal to a crowd of that sort, I know as a fact that they have been appealed to.

2571. Colonel Fane.] You have stated that there has been a house to house canvass carried on to a considerable extent; there was some very valuable evidence given here by a gentleman on Friday, who was in favour of Mr. Abel Smith's Bill, namely, the Mayor of Birmingham, and he held that a house to house canvass was not to be relied upon the least in the world; do you indorse that view of his?—My information has been given me, and I am not able personally to give evidence as to the nature of the canvass.

2572-3. He was asked, "Has any canvass been made of this town with respect to that?" and his answer was, "Yes, canvasses have been made, but I am not at all prepared to say how far they are reliable, because they were made by persons who entertain very strong views upon the subject. The result of the canvass, I believe, was very strongly in favour of such restrictions. Q. Would you distrust the figures?—A. I always distrust evidence where there is very great zeal." Do you indorse that view?—I believe that those statistics are being prepared with great honesty of purpose; I am of course quite aware how it is possible through great zeal to represent matters according to your wishes, without any intention to deceive, and therefore I should be very careful as to the mode in which those statistics were obtained.

2574. But very zealous persons who take a peculiar view of any particular question would be rather inclined, would they not, to see every answer in a very favourable light with respect to their own view?—I should always be disposed to take off a little per-centage on each side; I may also mention, as another single witness case, that petitions were lying in the public-houses a little time ago against this measure, and one of Maudsley's men, in my neighbourhood, was asked to sign a petition, and he said, "No, I will not; if your place was shut up I should save 4 s. every Sunday."

2575. Mr. Locke.] He was a man who probably could not restrain himself?—Yes, and unhappily there are many such.

2576. But there are persons who can, are there not?—Of course there are.

2577. Do you think that the persons who cannot restrain themselves are the majority?—I am not able to say that they are the majority; there are a great many who whilst the public-houses are open on Sunday feel that they cannot refrain from going into them, and when they are there they very often spend more than they should spend; and they say that they should be very glad if those places were closed, that they might not be exposed to that temptation.

2578. The question is this, is it not: whether in legislating for this class of people, who cannot exercise self-restraint, you are not inconveniencing a vast number of people who can, and who would consider themselves to be deprived of a privilege which they had a right to enjoy?—On the contrary, I think you are legislating for the latter class; the decent people are annoyed by the drunkenness of those who frequent those places; in my own house, on Sunday nights, I am annoyed by crowds of people who have been at the public-house till 10 or 11, going home singing and making a noise in the streets, and it should be a question whether decent Sunday-keeping people are to be preserved from those annoyances.

2579. Are there not a great number of decent persons who would wish to have the opportunity of going into a public-house to take some refreshment within the house on a Sunday?—I think there are very few decent people who would like to go, or, if they went, to be seen in gin palaces or beer-shops merely for the purpose of getting some drink on Sunday, apart from a necessary meal.

2580. Are you aware that this Bill would apply to all licensed houses whatever; that it would not be confined to beer-shops and gin palaces, but would affect every description of house throughout the country, as, in point of fact, the present Act does?—I think it would be very fair to do so; I think that there should be no partial and exceptional legislation; I think that the inconveniences would be very small; orderly persons generally are able on that day to have their drink at home, if they wish it, and they would be very glad to have greater peace and quiet in the streets and neighbourhood, and diminished poor-rates to pay.

2581. You do not think that the majority of those public-houses are places that are necessary for the population?—I am perfectly convinced that the majority are utterly unnecessary, especially when I find three or four within a stone's throw of one another.

2582. But there a great many houses that are necessary, are there not, to persons who are living in lodgings for instance?—No doubt.

2583. Take those houses round about the Temple, where there are clerks and different persons residing who may have no opportunity of getting refreshment unless they go into a house of that description, if this Bill were passed they would have no means whatever in the Metropolis

Rev.
N. Hall.
4 May 1868.

polis of going into a house of that kind, unless they have a meal; would not it be convenient to those who are not drunken people at all, to be able to go into a very decent and respectable house and take some refreshment on Sunday afternoon, where they would meet their friends; and would it not be a great restriction to them to be stopped from that convenience, because there are persons who cannot go into a public-house without getting drunk; do you not think it would be unfair to them that they should be legislated for in this way?—I am not supposing that all people who go to a public-house on Sunday get drunk; I would suppose that none of them would get drunk; I say that it is a bad thing to go to a public-house on Sunday to drink, apart from getting drunk, though a great many do get drunk.

2584. I am speaking of persons who go there to sit for half-an-hour in the evening, probably, and who would not be able to do that if this Bill were passed?—There are eating-houses open where persons can go and get a meal if they wish.

2585. Supposing, for instance, a man only wants a pint of beer?—I should say that it would be better for him to go without his pint of beer on Sunday than that all the evils connected with Sunday drinking should continue; I am not wishing at all to legislate in the interests of total abstinence.

2586. Therefore those persons would feel that they must give up drinking themselves, for the purpose of preventing this evil, although that which they do is not open to objection?—I think that the decent, sober people, who might be inconvenienced in this way would, by a great majority, be in favour of this measure; at the same time, a multitude of persons who do go to those places, and are not always sober, wish it for their own protection. I do not deny that there would be difficulties, and some personal inconveniences; but I consider that those personal inconveniences would be far more than atoned for by the general benefit arising from closing the houses.

2587. Have you any idea of the number of persons living in London, in lodgings, where they really can obtain no refreshment of any sort or kind, where they do not take any meals, and where they do not have anything to drink in the place; and in point of fact, so far as they are concerned, that particular class of public-house is really their club, and is the only place that they have to go to?—I do not know how many there may be.

2588. There must, necessarily, be a very large number of such persons, I do not mean to say of the working classes exactly, of course there are a good many amongst them who are single men; but I mean clerks and persons of that description, who daily use public-houses, or eating-houses, for the purpose of obtaining their meals, or for any refreshment and drinking that they may desire?—Certainly there are a great many, and they would still be able to get their meals; they could buy a bottle of beer on the Saturday, and have it in their own room if they wanted to drink at any time of the day without a meal, and therefore the inconvenience would, I think, be slight, compared with the immense educational, religious and social benefit resulting from such a measure.

2589. Getting it on Saturday would inconvenience a person who does not wish to have the trouble of doing that, if he has to go to a public-house and get a bottle of beer and carry it home; he would wish to have an opportunity, wherever he might be about London, of going into a public-house, not for the purpose of drinking, but just to take some refreshment in the way of a glass of beer; and when out of London, if this Bill were to pass, he would be entirely prevented from doing that, because he would neither be a traveller, nor would he be a lodger in this public-house, nor would he be a person going in to take a meal, so that a vast amount of persons would clearly be inconvenienced, would they not, if this Bill were to pass?—No doubt we all are inconvenienced by legislation in some particular; we do not get our letters on Sunday; that is an inconvenience; but people generally admit that all those personal inconveniences are more than counterbalanced by the general benefit resulting from the law of rest on the Sunday.

2590. You say that they should be permitted to buy this liquor to be consumed off the premises; are you aware of the evidence which has been given before us on this inquiry, that the police have said that if it were not permitted to persons to consume on the premises, liquor would actually be brought out of the public-house and drank in the streets, and great drunkenness and inconvenience and riot would take place, which at the present time is restrained within the public-house?—I do not think that would be the case to any great extent; I think obviously there would be difficulties in the way of that; it would be too inconvenient, and people would be ashamed to stand about on the pavement; at any rate, all wet days would be days of exception; cold water would then gain the victory.

2591. Have you given any attention to Mr. Forbes MacKenzie's Act in Scotland, and do you know what the result of that has been?—I am not able to give evidence upon it.

2592. The public-houses are closed altogether on Sunday; but are there not places in Edinburgh and in different towns called shebeens, where drink is carried and consumed illicitly to a very great extent, and there is no person, publican or anybody else, to restrain these persons who go in there, and a vast amount of drunkenness takes place; do not you think that if the total restriction of consumption on the premises on Sunday in London were carried out it would create similar places in the metropolis?—I have no means of knowing. I do not feel that I am able to indorse the evidence which you have just brought forward about Scotland.

2593. Setting Scotland aside, supposing persons were prevented from going into a licensed public-house to take any drink on a Sunday, do you think that they would not have it in other places over which the police could have no control; because, you are aware that the police have a right to go into a public-house if there is any disturbance or any case of drunkenness, and have a right to remove a drunken person, who is liable to be fined by a magistrate the next day; do you think that there would not be houses of the description I have mentioned established, where those drunken people would go and commit vastly greater excesses than are now committed under the present regulations?—I suppose that everyone now has the same right, all classes of society, if they please, can shut themselves up in a room and drink by themselves; the upper classes as well as the lower classes can do that at home.

2594. But then those are persons who, practically, tically, do not commit any excess, although, of course, we know that people do get drunk in their own houses, what they call boozing about; but if this Bill were passed into a law, seeing that they would not be able to obtain any drink in a public-house would they not resort to similar places to those which have been established in Scotland?—I think it is very possible they might to some extent, but, I should say, in reference to the other admissions which, I should think, any man of common sense must necessarily make, that the evils would be comparatively trifling, in view of the great benefit resulting from this legislation.

2595. You think that the advantages would counterbalance the evils, though you admit that evils necessarily would arise of the nature which I have described, if this Bill were passed into a law?—No doubt every law has evils connected with it.

2596. Chairman.] You stated just now, that you were not able to confirm the statement of the Honourable Member for Southwark, with respect to unlicensed houses in Scotland; did you mean by that, that you were not able to confirm his opinion that unlicensed drinking had increased to a very great extent?—I am not able to confirm the Honourable Member's opinion one way or the other; I have no personal knowledge of what is going on in Scotland; I have not been there for several years.

2597. Although you say that the disturbances which might arise from the imposition of fresh restrictions might be got up by interested parties, still you are not insensible to the probability of their recurrence?—It is quite possible that they might occur.

2598. You think it would be very probable that there would be considerable agitation if restrictions, even to the amount proposed by the Bill, were imposed?—I cannot say that it is very probable; it is possible, judging from past experience.

2599. Judging by what you have seen in your own time, of the effects of the Sunday Trading Bill for instance?—Judging especially from the demonstration in connection with Lord Ebury's Bill.

2600. There would be some fear, would there not, that there would be a manifestation of what some people would call public opinion?—It is quite possible; organised and got up by the publicans.

2601. And whether it be got up by interested parties or not, such manifestations about public-houses, or about reform, or anything else, do exercise considerable influence, do they not?—Some influence; I do not think in this case they should produce much effect. I think it would be impossible to get up a public manifestation against this Sunday Bill by way of public meeting to which all persons should be summoned, and at which there were no class efforts made. I think that the genuine expression of public opinion would be in favour of this measure, and therefore that any opposition got up by the publicans would be of a very evanescent character, and that after once showing itself, it would not be repeated. There would be no real heart and soul in it, and thus it would cease.

2602. But the Bill which was brought in by Lord Ebury, and which was the cause of those demonstrations, was withdrawn in consequence of them, was it not?—It was; and I think this was very much to be lamented.

2603. Do you not think that harm is done to a good cause, if, by going a step too far in advance, you are obliged to take one back again?—Very great harm indeed, if you are obliged to do so; but the question would be, whether in that case the Legislature was wise in retiring before a mere mob in Hyde Park. I think if it had been persevered in, the opposition would have ceased to repeat itself. Opposition arising from a conscientious principle will of course increase, but opposition arising from mere interested motives on the part of a clique will soon die out.

2604. But, seeing that you only wish us to put down an enormous evil by moderate legislation, and considering what has passed on this same subject, that after deliberate inquiry Parliament passed an Act in 1854 which, after one year's trial was repealed, in consequence of the complaints made, not only by the mob, but by respectable classes, would there not be considerable risk of a similar retrogression if this Bill were passed?—I think that public opinion has changed considerably, and is now more in favour of restrictive measures than it was then. I think that the new Parliament, being more a representation of the masses of the people, will be still more favourable than the old one.

2605. But is it your deliberate opinion that public opinion has so far advanced now that it would carry and maintain an Act more stringent than that which was obliged to be repealed in 1855?—I think so.

2606. Are you conversant with the proceedings, and the Report of the Committee of 1855?—I am not personally.

2607. Are you aware generally that it inquired into the working of the Act of 1854, and recommended its repeal?—I am not able to answer questions about that.

2608. Mr. John Abel Smith.] Do you know the fact, that there was but one person examined out of London?—I do not.

2609. Chairman.] Something has been said about clubs; I presume you do not see that there is any real distinction in the use of a public-house on Sunday, whether a man calls it his club or not; if he goes and sits in a public-house to drink on Sunday the result is very much the same?—I think that a club is in the nature of a private house; I may have a house in which only one individual may live, or I may associate myself with 12 other people, and we may control one another, and forbid any one else to come in. That may be as much your private house as if it were a private house of your own; but a house open to all the world is of a very different character, and the working men seem to see the distinction between the two, and that it is not a fair argument to say that if clubs are open on Sunday, therefore, public-houses must be open on a Sunday.

2610. It would be very difficult, would it not, for the working classes to establish clubs on similar principles to those to which the richer classes belong?—It would.

2611. Then a great many who use those places on Sunday may perhaps look upon them as their clubs, and say this is our club, like the Carlton Club in Pall Mall, or other rich men's clubs?—They may look upon it so.

2612. Do you not think that there would be considerable irritation amongst such a class, if they they found what they considered their clubs shut to them, while they saw those larger establishments remaining open?—I have had a great deal of experience of the feelings of the working classes, by intercourse for some years with them, and I hope, in some degree, having their confidence; and I should have no difficulty whatever in meeting any number of working men in my district of London, promiscuously gathered together in any large meeting, and ascertaining their opinion. I feel quite sure that the general result would be, that a vast majority of the working men would approve of such a measure as this, and would not feel any indignation at all.

2613. I am granting the object to be gained to be a good one, and granting (which is within my own knowledge) that there are a large number of persons of the working classes extremely anxious for such a Bill, or even a much more stringent Bill; but, at the same time, I am asking you those questions upon the admission which you have made, that the passing of this Bill would, in all probability, lead to considerable agitation; and without in the least denying that there are large bodies of persons whom you and others would influence to see the wisdom of such an enactment, would there not be a great many more who would consider it an injustice?—I am not quite sure that I said that, in all probability, the passing of this Bill would lead to demonstrations against the measure; I intended to say, and thought I said, that it would possibly do so. I am not able to say that it would probably do so. It entirely depends upon the secret determination of—the licensed victuallers, perhaps. I cannot tell what the result may be. It is possible that there may be an organised opposition, and it is possible that there may be nothing. Therefore, I should not say that it is probable that it would lead to excitement and opposition.

2614. Supposing Parliament preferred to take a step in the direction which you advocate, but not to go so far as this Bill, would you rather have that than nothing at all?—Yes, certainly; every step towards restriction is a benefit.

2615. You qualified, I will not say your approval, but your acquiescence in the idea of opening places of secular amusement on Sunday, by saying that one great objection is the employment of persons as attendants there. Is not that the argument which is always used, and with considerable effect, when such a proposal is made?—I did not wish to imply acquiescence in any opinion that had been expressed with reference to places of recreation on Sunday, but merely to say that I should not wish to legislate against such recreation, and I should think that that is not the province of the Government. I should certainly object to the Government interfering to provide such places of recreation, when, having such places of recreation would necessitate Sunday labour on the part of those who have an equal right to Sunday rest with those who enjoy the recreation.

2616. Was I wrong in understanding you to express an approval of what was said by the witness who preceded you, to this extent, that you would rather see the public-houses closed and places of innocent recreation open, than that things should go on as they are now?—I certainly think it would be much preferable.

attend there which would be involved in it?—I do not think that the opening of places of recreation is a necessary alternative; we might have public-houses for drinking closed without necessarily having places of recreation opened. But if I were asked whether it would be better, supposing you must have one or the other, I should not for a moment hesitate to say that it is better to have the places for drinking closed and places for recreation opened; but I have an objection on principle to opening places of recreation which require the attendance of the officials, and thus necessitate their losing their Sunday rest for the purpose of furnishing amusement to another portion of the community.

2618. Supposing Parliament shut public-houses, and there was a sort of understanding that those other places were to be opened, do not you think there would be sure to be some opposition made to their being opened on the ground that you have mentioned?—I think that the opposition to having places for drinking opened on Sunday is of a different character to the opposition to opening places of recreation.

2619. But is not that the objection that is urged by portions of the working classes to closing the only place of meeting that they have, that we shut all places of innocent recreation by law, and condemn the only one which they possess?—They may make use of that argument, of course.

2620. You must have so very large an acquaintance with the habits of the working people in London, that I should like to ask you whether you have known any working men who have conscientious objections to buying beer on Sunday, resort to the expedient which I observed was stated to be possible before the Committee of 1853; it was said that there was no real difficulty in beer being bought on Saturday night for consumption on Sunday, because many publicans within the knowledge of the witness had furnished their customers with stone bottles in which the beer was run off fresh, and being corked tightly and turned upside down, would keep fresh during the Sunday; do you know of that expedient having been had recourse to?—I have no personal knowledge of it.

2621. Mr. Yorke.] You stated just now that you thought where great public good was to be accomplished, the inconvenience of a comparatively small number should be disregarded?—Yes, certainly.

2622. Applying your own principle to the case of places of amusement on Sunday, would not the opening of such places as the Crystal Palace, the Museum, and places of that kind be a great public good, in your opinion?—I do not think it would be a public good; the preceding witness thought so, but I have not said so; I think that the Saturday afternoon half-holiday, in which all sorts of recreation should be provided for the people, would be a very great boon; but my own private opinion is that the more Sunday is kept as a day of rest and of worship the better it is for the community at large in every sense, political, social, and intellectual, as well as religious; although I would not for a moment have any legislative action to compel people to keep it religiously, or to prevent them from enjoying it just as they pleased.

2623. At present such places as the British Museum and the Crystal Palace are closed by legislative enactment, are they not?—I said that I would not have the Government interfere with the private rights of individuals in any way in which they wished to have recreation, so far as it did not interfere with other people's rights; but the opening of those places would require the attendance of people; which I think interferes with the rights of other people, and on that ground I should oppose the Government allowing them to be opened when it would necessitate Sunday labour.

2624. I understood you just now to state that the inconvenience of a few ought not to be considered in the case of advantage to the public resulting from an act which would involve inconvenience?—Certainly.

2625. Would not you consider, in that case, that the advantage of opening those places would more than counterbalance the disadvantage which would accrue to the keepers and other persons who might necessarily be employed on the Sunday?—On the contrary, I do not think that it would be a public advantage. I think it would tend to secularise the feeling with respect to the Sabbath day, and thus to induce a state of feeling and practice in the country which would very much tend to deprive us of what is the great glory of England, which, I think, tends more than anything else to uphold us in moral integrity and greatness as a nation, and that is our British Sabbath.

2626. When you say that you do not approve of the principle of legislative interference in such matters, you do approve of the existing interference of the Legislature with opening such establishments?—I approve of the Government, if it is found to be expedient, appointing one day of rest in every week. That is the law of England, and, therefore, I wish to have it carried out fully, and let every man have a right to enjoy his day as he pleases without interfering with the rights of his neighbours; therefore, I should quite approve of, say, opening the parks if they were closed on Sunday, and did not need any keepers; and I would let people have any enjoyment that they chose to have, without interfering with the rights of their neighbours.

2627. Is it not a legislative interference with the rights of persons in the case of places like the Crystal Palace, when a law is in force which prevents the Crystal Palace being open on the Sunday; is not that an interference with the rights of persons in the way you put it just now?—I think that all legislation with reference to the rest day of the week is an interference with individuals; but then I justify that on the ground of social advantage, not on the ground of religion at all. I would entirely separate all religious convictions from the action of Government.

2628. You said just now that you would not disapprove of the opening of the parks on Sunday?—So far as it did not interfere with the labour of other persons; I merely meant to illustrate it thus: It would seem to me an utter absurdity for the Government to interfere with the liberty of individuals as to the way in which they should spend their time on the Sunday. If a man chooses to walk out into the fields, or go to church, it is entirely at his own option; or if he likes to stay at home and enjoy himself with his friends, it is his business between himself and God.

2629. As I understand, you have said that you would not object to the parks being opened on Sunday, and to individuals exercising their right of walking there, but, as you are aware, involves the attendance of persons like the police and park keepers and others, who are interfered with in the same manner that you said would be the case with the keepers of the Crystal Palace or the British Museum; is not that principle involved in the case of the parks quite as much as in the case of the Crystal Palace and other places?—I should not have thought that that would have applied; there must always be police if people are about. There are some works which are absolutely necessary, and there must be a certain number of police to a certain number of the population, whether in the parks or whether in the streets. Therefore, supposing no additional police were wanted if people were walking in the park rather than walking in the streets, they would simply have to have their station in the park rather than in the streets.

2630. Chairman.] Supposing the police had their stations all over the town; for instance, there must be policemen on certain beats in certain streets, and those policemen must be on those beats the whole of Sunday, whether people are walking in Piccadilly or Oxford-street, or wherever they be, and, if so, if the people congregate in Hyde Park or Kensington Gardens in great numbers, the presence of those numbers would require the attendance of an additional body of police; wherever there is an aggregation of people there it is the duty of the police to be present in increased number; does not that interfere with the Sunday liberty of those policemen, just as the presence of the keepers of the Crystal Palace would do if the people went there?—I do not think that it interferes in the same way; of course when we enter into particulars, there are always difficulties which arise to discriminate between one and another; a mass of people always require a certain number of police for the purposes of order. If the principle involved were the same, I should carry out the same rule; but my simple idea was to endeavour to explain that I would not legislate to interfere with the liberty of individuals as to the mode in which they should spend the day of rest, but that I would endeavour to protect all classes of the community in the enjoyment of their liberty on the day of rest. There are some works which are of absolute necessity; there are other works which are not of absolute necessity. There may be difficulties when we come to the margin line to determine what is absolutely necessary, and what is not; I might be in doubt myself; but I think that there is a principle of distinction between what is of absolute necessity and what is not of necessity.

2631. Mr. Yorke.] Would you not before going further in restrictive legislation, with regard to public-houses on Sunday, prefer trying another expedient, such as the opening of places of public amusement and other attractions of that kind, so as to endeavour to draw people away from going to the public-houses on Sunday; do not you think that if it could be done in that way, it would be preferable to restrictive legislation?—I think that the opening of the Crystal Palace, and other such places, on Sunday would be in itself an evil, and that this would be only creating an additional evil, certainly not so great an evil as the first, but an extra evil. Though it might in some little degree diminish the first evil, yet it would not at all remove it.

2632. Chairman.] Would not people say that you have shut by law every place of innocent recreation, recreation, and you now close the public-houses by law, and we have only to choose between the churches and the streets; is not that what they would say?—Some of them might say that; but I still think that the great masses of the people would not say it.

2633. Mr. Evans.] Are you aware whether, in that part of London with which you are best acquainted, any considerable number of persons are in the habit of taking their meals, or any of their meals at the public-houses?—I do not know that; a great many of them take their meals at eating-houses; but from my observation, of the public-houses near my church I should say are frequented simply for drinking and not for meals.

2634. I was not speaking exclusively with regard to Sunday, but with regard to the week?—On Sunday, I observe frequently large crowds of persons in those places; and I never see them eating; they are always drinking.

2635. I think I understood you to say that, supposing the question were, whether you would have the present Bill or whether you would have some part of its restrictions only, you would prefer to have the present Bill?—Yes, the present Bill.

2636. If that were impossible, I suppose you would think the use of moderate restriction better than leaving things as they are?—Yes.

2637. During what hours do you think the greatest portion of drinking at the bars of public-houses takes place on Sunday; is it late or early?—I should think late.

2638. It has been suggested by some witnesses who have been before this Committee, that good effects might be produced if the public-houses were closed on Sunday at 10 instead of 11; do you approve of that?—Of course it would be a very great advantage, so far as it goes.

2639. Supposing that that was the only thing you could obtain, you would rather have that than nothing?—Certainly. Perhaps I may be allowed to mention to the Committee, as I have recently been in New York, what I observed there as to the action of licensing and restrictive measures.

2640. Chairman.] We must not go into the licensing question, except only as regards the Sunday?—On Sundays there is no open bar drinking allowed in the State of New York; and I may say that on days of election it is like a Sunday; there is no public drinking on an election day, so that there is great order; and also drinking is separated from amusements, and by all persons interested in the morality of the community that separation between drinking and amusements is most highly spoken of. The result has been that many disreputable houses have been closed in consequence of the separation of the two. In company with a couple of policemen, and a missionary, and a clergyman or two, I investigated some of the very worst parts of New York; and I must say that they are better than the worst parts of London, in consequence, I think, of the fact that all the dancing rooms and singing rooms are separated from the drinking of intoxicating drinks.

2641. Mr. Malcolm.] Are you referring to the lager-beer saloons and gardens?—No, I was not referring to them.

2641. Is not the lager-beer sold in the dancing houses and saloons?—There may be a band of music where it is sold.

2643. Chairman.] We ought not to go into the case of public amusements, except as regards their being open on Sundays, simply because we are told by the Order of Reference to confine ourselves to Sunday?—The question had been referred to by an Honourable Member, as to the separation of amusements and drinking, and I was simply using it as an illustration, showing that the separation in the State of New York had been attended with the most beneficial effects, in shutting up very many disreputable places, and in improving the morals of the people.

2644. Mr. Locke.] At New York do they have rooms for refreshment separate from the room in which the music is going on?—Not in the same house, not under the same roof; you must go to another place. I went into one of the worst streets in New York, and there would be one place for drinking on the one side of the road and a place for low dancing on the other; but in the place for dancing you cannot get anything stronger than ginger beer; and I observed that there were very few people at those low haunts. I was told that many of them were being shut up, and that many of them had been shut up; and that it was the connection of very low amusements with drinking which was the great cause of injury to the people.

The Reverend CYRIL PAGE, called in; and Examined.

2645. Chairman.] You are Incumbent of Christ Church, Westminster, are you not?—I am.

2646. You have been for a great number of years a clergyman in Westminster?—I have.

2647. For how many years?—Since the year 1834, when I came into this parish.

2648. Will you state your opinion as to the object which is sought to be obtained in the Bill before the Committee, and your opinion as to the machinery by which it is proposed to be attained; you probably know it is intended by the Bill to close the public-houses for sale for consumption on the premises during the whole of Sunday, and to limit the hours during which liquor may be sold at all to three hours and a half in London?—I have not seen the Bill.

2649. That is the general object of the Bill, with provisions in favour of persons resorting there for bonâ fide meals, and for travellers, and lodgers in the house; I will ask you at once whether you think that the object of reducing drunkenness would be likely to be attained by that measure?—I should doubt it very much.

2650. You have in your district in Westminster a very poor population, and I suppose that there is no part of London where on Sunday, perhaps, there is more of what is called Sabbath desecration?—It is much the same as it is throughout all the low parts of London. I do not think there is much difference.

2651. It is the habit of the people there, to a great extent, to resort to public-houses on Sunday, is it not?—No doubt it is.

2652. What should you think would be the result, if those people were to be debarred altogether from the public-houses, except for 3½ hours on Sunday?—I think that means would be taken to evade the law.

2653. You think that the class of the population tion who live in a part of your parish would somehow or other get liquor?—Yes.

2654. Supposing that they got it by buying it on Saturday night or during the open hours on Sunday; do you think they would drink largely in their own houses?—No doubt a great portion would.

2655. Do you think that that would be a lesser or a greater evil than is produced by the present law?—I have not sufficiently considered the point to say which I believe would be the greater evil of the two, because it would depend upon the extent to which it was carried; of course it is merely a matter of opinion, because I have no data to go upon as to what I believe actually would take place under the circumstances supposing this law were carried; but I believe that there is evasion of the law at times even now when there is not the same necessity for it; and I think that the persons who do use the public-houses for drunkenness are persons who would be extremely discontented, and who would do their utmost to evade the law; how far they would be able to do that, I do not know.

2656. Do you think it would be likely to lead to rioting?—Not impossible, I think, here and there.

2657. At all events, the population of some of those back streets, taking advantage of the open public-houses to a great extent on Sunday, would be likely to be very dissatisfied at being absolutely prevented from entering them?—I think they would be.

2658. Of course there can be no two opinions as to the desirability of reducing drunkenness, and even of reducing the consumption of strong liquors, and the waste of the wages of the people; but is it your opinion that the difficulty of forcing people to amend their habits in that respect is so great, that the restrictions proposed by this Bill would go too far the other way?—As far as I understand it, I think the Bill would perhaps go rather too far. I think that a small additional restriction to what exists now, might be a benefit without interfering with any enjoyment which people might fairly claim as a sort of right, without interfering with their liberty and so forth. For instance, at the present moment, public-houses are not closed during the evening service, or after five o'clock. The object of the law was to close public-houses during the time of Divine Service, the morning service and the afternoon service; but really now in these days, afternoon service is much less attended, and in some cases scarcely attended at all, compared with the evening service, and if the houses were shut up during the evening service, it would be a great gain to many people, and a gain to the publicans themselves; because although there may not be many, there are some religious publicans. I know one instance in my own parish. I have had a pot-boy who attended church regularly, but if the public-house is obliged to be open, he cannot attend.

2659. You would like to see the present law made more restrictive, and I gather from what you say, that you think it should be in the direction of decreasing the hours still further during which the houses may be open, but not of prohibiting the sale of liquor to be consumed there in those hours?—No, not altogether.

2660. Am I to understand, that what you have now stated is your opinion generally upon the Bill?—Yes.

2661. Is there anything else that you would like to add?—I should say that my opinion is not very much worth having, for I feel amazing difficulty in ascertaining the facts to go upon. I can only state this, that the Police Act which did close the public-houses some years ago, was a very great benefit to the neighbourhood, as to decency, whether it hindered much drunkenness I cannot say.

2662. The closing of public-houses, as they were closed by the Act of 1854, you think was a great benefit to the neighbourhood?—I forget what the date of it was. I mean the Police Act.

2663. There was an Act in 1854 which, for one year, until it was repealed, closed the public-houses, except from one to three and from six to 10 at night, on Sunday; then the Act of 1864 closed all public-houses every night at one, and on Saturday night at 12, leaving them open from one to three and from five to 11 on Sunday night; do you refer to the Act which closed them on Sunday, except for six hours, or to the latter Act?—I mean the Act which closed public-houses till one o'clock on Sunday. I felt, myself, personally the difference. When I used to come to church there were two gin palaces close by the church gates, and people in a drunken state were turned out just at 11 o'clock, when Divine Service commenced, who were a great nuisance to people coming to church, and the whole of the street was in a condition quite sufficient to deter decent people who lived in the neighbourhood from coming to church. When the public-houses were closed until one, the streets were so far improved that there was not that amount of drunkenness going on at that early hour in the morning which there had been before, and so far that was a gain.

SIR JAMES FERGUSSON, BART., IN THE CHAIR.

DUNCAN M'LAREN, Esq., a Member of the House, Examined.

2664. Mr. John Abel Smith.] I BELIEVE that you have taken a very strong and lively interest in the laws regulating the consumption of intoxicating drink on Sunday?—Yes, I have taken a great deal of interest in that question.

2665. You sometime since were Lord Provost of Edinburgh, were you not?—Yes, three years, from 1851 to 1854.

2666. Would you have any objection to state the circumstances which, while you were in that position, drew your attention particularly to the subject of Sunday drinking?—At that period it was a matter of public notoriety that drunkenness prevailed to an enormous extent in Edinburgh, as it did in all the large towns of Scotland, and it was particularly marked and offensive on Sundays, because, in going to church, we often saw people drunk in the streets, rolling about, and sometimes fights and everything that was unpleasant. And there was a very general desire on the part of men of all sects and classes to try if they could do something to stop this enormous evil. With the view of initiating something that might be useful, I called a meeting of the acting magistrates of the city and the justices of the peace for the county of the city, for Edinburgh is a county in itself, and proposed certain resolutions to them. It was a meeting at a special licensing session; a large number of publicans were present and various memorials were read. I wrote down the other day to the clerk of the justices to let me know, in case of any mistake, what was done at the meeting, and he has sent me up a copy of the Minute of that meeting, and if the Committee will allow me to read it I will put them, in three or four minutes, in possession of the exact facts of the case; and perhaps they may think it of some importance, when I say that our experience, arising out of that meeting, was the origin of the Forbes Mackenzie Act which has been so much talked of. "At a meeting of the special sessions of the justices of the peace for the city of Edinburgh, and the liberties thereof, held within the City Chambers of Edinburgh, the 28th of April 1852; present, the Lord Provost Preses and other 36 justices. The Lord Provost having stated the object of the meeting as set forth in the circular letter convening it, namely, for the purpose of considering whether, in granting certificates to publicans for the ensuing year, any measures should be taken for preventing spirit shops from being kept open on Sundays, 0.69.

submitted and read to the meeting the following documents, viz.: 1st. Return by the superintendent of police, respecting licensed spirit dealers within the Edinburgh police bounds, giving for each street the total number, and the number open on Sunday the 25th instant (that was the Sunday before the meeting), from which it appeared that the total is 974, and the number open on Sunday was 490. 2nd. Memorial from licensed wine and spirit merchants in the city, signed by 141 of their number, addressed to the Lord Provost and magistrates, with reference to the great amount of traffic in spirituous liquors on the Sabbath-day existing in the city, respectfully and earnestly requesting the attention of the licensing court to the subject, and urging the necessity of such measures being adopted as may tend to check the practice in future. 3rd. Memorial of the missionaries of the city of Edinburgh, on the same subject, and to the same effect. 4th. Memorial of 1,200 Sabbath-school teachers of Edinburgh, on the same subject, and to the same effect. 5th. Memorial adopted at a public meeting held in Richmond-place Chapel on 20th April 1852, on the same subject, and to the same effect. 6th. Copy, resolutions adopted by the magistrates of Glasgow, relative to the licensing of public-houses there, and putting a stop to the sale of spirits on Sundays. 7th. Letter thereanent, with result of said resolutions, from the superintendent of the city of Glasgow police. 8th. The 7th clause in the Act for granting certificates, as to the power of the magistrates in granting them. 9th. Opinion of the Dean of Faculty in 1848 (now Lord Colonsay), anent the powers of magistrates in granting certificates; his Lordship (i.e., the Lord Provost) having at great length commented upon the said documents, and stated his views, approving of the object sought to be attained, read the following resolutions, prepared by the Lord Provost and magistrates, for preventing spirit shops from being kept open on Sundays; viz., 1st. That it is desirable that all licensed spirit dealers should be of that respectable class who disapprove of keeping open their shops for the sale of spirits on Sundays; 2nd. That when any violation of the provisions of the Act for granting certificates, or any offence under the Police Act, shall be proved to have taken place in any licensed spirit shop, and when any such shop shall be farther proved to have been usually kept open during some portion of the Sabbath, this meeting is of opinion that the license to such premises should not thereafter be renewed; 3rd. That to enable the magistrates the more readily to enforce the above resolutions, the superintendent of police should be requested to furnish them with a monthly list of those shops which have been kept open on Sundays for the sale of spirits; and moved their adoption by the justices. Bailies Morrison and Fyfe concurred with the statements of the Lord Provost. The Provost of Leith cordially approved of the resolutions, and seconded the motion by the Lord Provost for their adoption. The following justices severally expressed their sentiments of the proposed resolutions; viz., George Combe, Esq.; Archibald Thomson, Esq.; James Hill, Esq.; Baillie Brodie, Leith; Baillie Brown Douglas; Joseph H. Stott, Esq.; John Richardson, Esq.; and Sir William Johnston. The Lord Provost replied, and, having put the question, on the motion before the meeting, it was unanimously agreed to. The resolutions were ordered to be published in the 'North British Advertiser,' and hand-bills to be printed, containing said resolutions, and circulated throughout the city, and a copy to be delivered to each party receiving certificate."

2667. The result of that, in its working on the society in Edinburgh, was such as to excite a strong feeling in other parts of Scotland, was it not?—Yes, it was. The change that took place was almost instantaneous. Within a few weeks you saw its operation quite visibly. A large proportion of those who used to keep open their houses on Sunday shut them, and the drunkenness was visibly diminished in all quarters of the town. It was very remarkable indeed on the Sundays. I frequently made it my business to walk through the low neighbourhoods on Sunday evening. I went through every part of the town alone to see what was going on. I had done so before the regulations were made, and I did so afterwards. I continued it for more than a year, and I can speak from personal knowledge that the effect was startling, and even those in the city who were opposed to what they called that kind of Sabbatarian legislation, were just as ready to admit the great change that had taken place, as those who approved of what was done.

2668. What took place with reference to legislation?—The change led to discussions all over Scotland. There was one defect in the Edinburgh regulations which could not be remedied without an Act of Parliament, and that suggested the getting of an Act which should be of universal application. The difficulty was this. Many of the publicans who most heartily approved of the closing came to me and said, that if they were to continue the system of closing in particular neighbourhoods, their business would be ruined, because their neighbours who kept open in defiance of the regulation, but still hoping to escape the forfeiture of their licenses, not only got their customers on Sunday, but those customers went to them on the other days of the week also; and they said they would do anything they could to get a universal law enacted, and would be delighted with it; but that they would be made martyrs of without such a law. It was talked of and written about in the newspapers all over Scotland, and the result was that a committee in Edinburgh framed a draft Bill, which they gave in charge to Lord Kinnaird, and to Mr. Forbes Mackenzie then in the House of Commons, and those gentlemen carried through an Act to make complete and compulsory throughout Scotland what had been begun in Edinburgh, and partially carried into effect.

2669. Who had the carrying of that Bill in Parliament?—I think Lord Kinnaird and Mr. Forbes Mackenzie; it was brought in as a public Bill.

2670. There has been since that time a commission, has there not, to examine into the working of the Act?—There has.

2671. Are you conversant with what occurred?—That commission recommended certain amendments to be made in the law with the view of remedying defects which the subtlety of lawyers had found out, and which enabled parties to run through the Act in many cases, and the Public-house Amendment Act was brought in by Mr. Muir; he had been Lord Advocate before, but he was not Lord Advocate at the time, and he acted as a private Member. He asked me to come to London for a few days to assist in it, and go over all the clauses with him, which I did. That Act was passed at his instance, and it nearly remedied all the loopholes by which the original Act was sought to be evaded.

2672. But the commission reported very favourably as to the working of the Sunday closing, did they not?—Yes; the commission was a perambulatory one; it did not merely stay in Edinburgh, but went to different towns and important districts in Scotland, and took evidence upon the spot, and the evidence was overwhelming in favour of the Act, and they reported accordingly.

2673. Had there been much resistance to the working of that Act in the first instance?—There was always an influential section who opposed on principle that kind of legislation, and then there was a considerable section of the licensed dealers of all kinds, both the public-house and the spirit shopkeepers, who objected to it, and did all they could to write it down and speak it down; but still this opposition never produced any effect on the mass of the people of Scotland, so far as I know; it was regarded as a mere trade movement.

2674. And do you believe that now in Scotland they would willingly consent to any change in the law, and return to their former habits?—No; I think the longer the experience has been, these Acts are more and more valued, and I should think that Members from all parts of Scotland, including both boroughs and counties, would strenuously resist the repeal of those Acts.

2675. Chairman.] What were the alterations in the law by Mr. Muir's Act of 1861?—I have not looked at the Act for several years, and I should not like to say; but there was no change in the principle; it was more to clear up ambiguities, and to make the powers of the magistrates more stringent.

2676. But there were considerable relaxations, were there not; such as this, that the hour of closing at night was made later on the magistrate's license?—The magistrates might give a special license in the case of a dinner or a public party of any kind.

2677. Colonel Fane.] What are the hours which are at present in force in Scotland?—By the Forbes Mackenzie's Act they are to shut at 11 on every night, and shut the whole of Sunday; they cannot open at all on Sunday, except hotels; but if parties are residing in a hotel, otel, they can get spirits or wine at any hour of the day. There are no canonical hours in Scotland in hotels.

2678. Mr. John Abel Smith.] Was not the extension directed to meet the convenience and the necessities of those hotels at which public dinners were given?—Yes, that special license was; but I should doubt whether 50 such licenses in Edinburgh have been issued; it is a very rare thing.

2679. As Provost of Edinburgh, did you not frame certain tables to show the working of the Act?—I did.

2680. Will you explain them to the Committee?—At that time I thought that different tests, comparing the old system with the new, could be brought out from statistical inquiries, and I framed a set of tables for the superintendent of police to be continued from year to year, as I hoped they would be, showing the facts on all the different questions that were likely to arise; and those tables, as framed by myself, have been continued by succeeding magistrates without any alteration. They now form a continuous series of observations for 16 years; and as no change has ever taken place in the structure of the tables, the information they contain will perhaps afford a more valuable test from these circumstances, than any mere matter of opinion from myself or anyone else; and, if the Committee desire it, I will state the results shown by those tables.

2681. Will you have the kindness to state it to the Committee?—The first is a table showing the number of persons found drunk and incapable on the streets; I wish the Committee to understand that those here enumerated were not charged with any offence, but were the helpless drunkards taken by the police, for their own security, to the office, and kept there till they got sober and were let out the next morning. In the year 1852, when the minute to which I have referred was passed, the number of drunkards of that kind was 6,367 during the whole year; the Forbes Mackenzie Act I should state came into operation two years after the date of the minute. In 1853, the number was 5,727; in 1854, 5,183; in 1855, 5,014, and so on; I need not read all the figures, but will give, in each case, the first and last four years; in 1864, the number was 2,195; in 1865, 2,274; in 1866, 2,330, and in 1867, 1,915.

2682. The extreme points being 6,367 and 1,915?—Yes, it was 6,367 when the experiment commenced, and by the tables as just completed, which I got in manuscript from the superintendent of police for the last year, the number had been reduced to 1,915.

2683. Colonel Fane.] Has the population remained about the same?—No; the population during those 16 years has increased, I think, about one-eighth part; so that, if all circumstances had been equal, the number of drunkards should have been one-eighth greater now than they were then.

2684. Mr. John Abel Smith.] What is the next table?—Another table is to show the number of persons found drunk on Sundays, in the same way, without being charged with any offence. In 1852 there were 729; in 1853, 641; in 1854, 455; in 1855, 389. For the last four years, they came down in the year 1864 to 199; in 1865 to 230, in 1866 to 223, and in 1867 to 164. So that the number of persons taken up for being drunk on Sunday has diminished from 729 to 164, and the diminution, although not literally continuous, is very nearly so. It occurred to me, in framing the tables, that an objection might afterwards be stated by parties who sought to impugn what I thought the logical deductions to be drawn from them if nothing but Sunday cases had been dealt with in the tables; they might have said, "You have diminished drunkenness on Sundays, but no doubt it has increased on Monday and on Saturday." And another fallacy required to be corrected, because all those apprehended on Monday, and after 12 o'clock on Sunday night, were catalogued in the police books as persons taken upon Monday; and Monday got the credit, in that statistical form, of being the cause of the drunkenness, although the drink was swallowed on the Sunday, and during night. Therefore, I got a table framed to show the numbers found drunk between eight o'clock on Sunday morning and eight o'clock on Monday morning; and these cases must, of course, have been from the effects of drink taken chiefly on Sunday. The number in 1852 was 401; in 1853, 333; in 1854, 176; in 1855, 82; and for the last four years, in 1864 it was 49; in 1865, 47; in 1866, 42; and in 1867, 33.

2685. Mr. Yorke.] When did the Act come into operation?—It was passed in 1853, and it came into operation on the 15th of May 1854; but the resolution of the magistrates was two years before the Act came into operation. We have also a table of the number of persons found drunk on Saturday; of course all those figures are included in the larger number of 6,367, which I gave; they are not additional figures; these are merely the classifications of the larger numbers. The number of persons found drunk on Saturdays was in 1852, 1,296; in 1853, 1,317; in 1854, 1,177; in 1855, 1,186; and for the last four years, in 1864, it was 574; in 1865, 588; in 1866, 631, and in 1867, 495. In Scotland we found that when men began to drink, on Saturday evenings, after they got their wages, they very often continued to drink all Sunday and all Monday; at least, as long as their money lasted. By interrupting the progress of drinking, as was done on the Sunday, it was expected that the Monday cases of drunkenness would be very much fewer, because the parties being sober on Sunday would probably go to their work sober on Monday; and it has turned out to be so; there has been a great change on the Mondays in that respect. In 1852 the number of persons found drunk was 776; in 1853, 728; in 1854, 665; in 1855, 654; then for the last four years, in 1864, it was 208; in 1865, 244; in 1866, 258, and in 1867, 200; those are the chief statistical facts respecting the working of that Act. They are taken down by the superintendent of police, and they are printed annually at the expense of the magistrates and town council in a book along with other classes of offences which have no reference to these matters. For the last year the book has not been printed; but I wrote to the superintendent of police to send me up the figures in manuscript, which he did, and I have given them to the Committee.

2686. Mr. John Abel Smith.] Have you any other tables to put before the Committee?—There is one table which is rather remarkable, and which seems at first sight to militate against the others which I have given; but my wish is to state matters fairly to the Committee, and not to keep anything back that might oppose my own theory; there is this curious fact, that the number of criminal offenders who were drunk when the offences were committed has not at all diminished; it has been almost a steady regular quantity. The numbers of persons apprehended for crimes or police offences, and who were drunk when they committed them, were, for the same years, in 1852, 3,400; in 1853, 4,003; in 1854, 3,566; in 1855, 3,081: then, for the last four years, in 1864 there were 4,146; in 1865, 3,880; in 1866, 4,123; and in 1867, 3,773. I should like to explain to the Committee that none of those persons were accused of drunkenness; that is to say, drunkenness was no part of the police charge against them; but the superintendent of police keeps a note in his books of the condition in which every person who is brought to that office is found. The drunkenness, therefore, was not of the essence of the charge against them; but still it is a fact, and as some of the Members of Committee may think it a material fact, I consider it my duty to bring it before you. The result of the great diminution of drinking, which was proved also by the diminution of the quantity of spirits consumed all over Scotland, seems, as far as I can judge, to have prevented crimes of an outrageous character from being committed, which often occurs when people are under the influence of drink, although not literally drunk. The offences seem to have become smaller, and shorter terms of punishment were awarded. I am not speaking of those that were drunk in the table referred to; but we all know how apt young men and all sorts of people, when they are under the influence of liquor, although not drunk, are to get into difficulties and to commit police offences of all kinds; and that diminution of drinking which took place seemed to lead to this, that although the number of offences were not diminished materially, yet they seem to have been of so much slighter a nature, and the duration of the punishment awarded was so much less, that the prison became too large for the number of people who were daily in it. The very opposite was the case before the resolutions of the magistrates in 1852; because the General Prison Board for Scotland had complained twice to the Home Office of the inadequacy of the prison accommodation in Edinburgh. The Committee are probably aware that the Edinburgh prison is a large prison for the whole county of Midlothian and city of Edinburgh, including the burgh of Leith, Musselburgh, and Portobello, in short, for the whole county; and the Government inspector complained that it was so inadequate for the number of the prisoners, that they must enlarge it. By the Prison Act, all the local authorities named must consent before any new expenditure can be incurred for building prisons. The county of Midlothian consented, and Leith and Musselburgh, and Portobello also; but as this experiment was going on, and I urged the town council of Edinburgh not to consent till the very last day that the Act allowed, in order to see whether the change that was visible for a time should be continued. They took my advice, and suspended giving their assent to the very last day. What seemed for some years before a steady increase of crime had then been converted into a decrease, which went on to such a degree, that every one was convinced that the money would be thrown away to build a new prison. The 12,000*l.* which had been voted by the county, and all the other burghs, was refused to be voted by the city of Edinburgh on the last day that the Act allowed for consideration, and from that time to this the prison has always been found too large for the number of prisoners in it, and the 12,000*l.* has been saved. I will just state to the Committee a rather important matter about the daily average of prisoners, apart from those Public-house Acts. The daily average number of prisoners I will give the Committee for a few years before the magistrates' resolution took effect, in order that they may clearly see what the general state of things was, and that no exceptional year has been taken for comparison. I am referring to the great prison for the whole city and county of Edinburgh, and all the burghs within the county. In the year 1848, the daily average number of prisoners was 585; in 1849, it was 639; in 1850, 582; in 1851, 625; in 1852, which was the year that magistrates passed the resolutions at my instance, it was 619; in the following year it fell to 531; and in 1854, to 438; in 1855, to 371; in 1856, to 349; in 1857, to 329; in 1858, to 345; in 1859, 378; in 1860, 319; in 1861, 340; in 1862, 356; in 1863, 381; in 1864, 395; in 1865, 389; in 1866, 335; and in last year it was 337. So that the Committee will see that in the year before the magistrates' resolution was passed, the daily average number of prisoners was 625, and after 16 years experience the number is 337, very little more than one-half. There were also a few prisoners in the police cells averaging from two to 10 in addition to those stated, and the numbers were larger for the latter than the earlier years. Those are the chief matters which I wish to state to the Committee, but any other information that it is in my power to give them, or to procure for them, by digging into Blue Books, or writing to Edinburgh, I shall be delighted to furnish whether in favour of my own views or not.

2687. You stated that there was a considerable diminution in the consumption of spirits in Scotland after the passing of the Forbes Mackenzie Act; do the returns of the consumption of spirits, as usually seen, give a true and fair picture of that consumption?—They do, in so far as British spirits are concerned, but they are defective in not showing the increase or diminution as regards foreign spirits. The Reports of the Inland Revenue Commissioners show the consumption of British spirits for each year, but the Board of Customs do not issue any similar report to show the quantity of foreign and colonial spirits that is consumed each year; and unless the Committee were to ask for such a Return from the Board of Customs they could not get a literally correct statement; at least I am not aware of any paper in which the information is to be found.

2688. Chairman.] The home consumption of spirits in Scotland other than whiskey would really be insignificant, would it not?—A curious trade, I understand, has sprung up of late years; a very cheap kind of spirit is made in Prussia, and it is sold at about 1*s.* 3*d.* per gallon; and I am told that it is brought in considerable quantities to this country to adulterate other spirits and mix with home made wine; therefore it may be quite true that there is an apparent diminution in British spirits, whilst, if you took in that foreign element there might be a much smaller diminution, or there might be no diminution at all.

2689. Is that kind of spirit mixed with the whiskey?—Yes, so I am told, and sold as whiskey.

2690. Mr.

2690. Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen.] You stated that there was a diminution in the consumption of spirits in Scotland; is that founded upon any return?—Yes, I will state it to the Committee; I have taken it out of the Reports of the Inland Revenue Commissioners, and out of the Report of the Royal Commission of Inquiry in Scotland. They got the returns for earlier years than are to be found in the Reports of the Inland Revenue Commissioners, but I can give you them up to the return of British spirits that was issued yesterday, for the year ending 31st of December last. The average of the four years, from 1851 to 1854 inclusive was, for Scotland alone, 6,915,050 gallons; the average for the four succeeding years, from 1855 to 1858, was 6,668,696 gallons; for the two years, from 1858 to 1860, the quantity was 4,893,227 gallons; for the four years from 1861 to 1866, it was 4,878,166 gallons; and, for the two years, 1867 and up to the 1st of January 1868, it was 5,217,630 gallons; so that there is an increase during the last two years to a considerable amount.

2691. Chairman.] Does that give the consumption throughout Scotland?—Yes; those returns are all made upon this careful principle: it is not the spirits made in Scotland, or the spirits that pay duty in Scotland; it is, after deducting from the excise books all the spirits manufactured in Scotland and sent to England, whether they pay duty in Scotland or in England; and, in like manner, all from Ireland. That is given by the Commissioners as the real consumption of Scotland, without any question or doubt upon the matter.

2692. Mr. Roebuck.] Will you state the difference between the first period and the last two years, in which there appears to have been an increase?—The average of the first four years, from 1851 to 1854 (that was before the Forbes Mackenzie Act came into operation), was 6,900,000 gallons, leaving out the odd figures; and for the year ending 31st March 1867 it was 5,452,261 gallons. The year for which the Return was published yesterday was for the year ending on the 31st of December last, but still it included 12 months; and the quantity was 4,983,000 gallons. If the Committee will permit me to explain, all these returns are usually made up for the financial year ending the 31st of March. The year ending the 31st of March 1867 is, in the ordinary course of matters, to be found in the 11th Report of the Inland Revenue Commissioners, from which I take it; and that year was 5,452,261 gallons. Then an Honourable Member of the House moved for a Return about England, Scotland, and Ireland, for the year ending the 31st of December last; but still it is for 12 months; it is an exceptional return, as not ending at the same time, but it is for the same duration; and that return shows 4,983,000 gallons. In giving my figures to the Committee, I took the mean of those two, and called the average of the last two years 5,217,630 gallons. Then, if you compare that with the average of the first four years, it will show a diminution of 1,700,000 gallons. It would not be candid if I were not to inform the Committee that during that time there has been a large increase in the duty charged upon spirits, and that will have a certain influence, but how much it is difficult for me to say.

2693. Mr. Locke.] It was raised from 3s. 8d. up to 10s., was it not?—The 3s. 8d. duty did not 0.69.

commence quite as late as that; I could give the Committee a statement of the duty for each year, if they desire to have it.

2694. Chairman.] Generally speaking, the price of whisky is about double what it was 14 years ago, is it not?—No, I think not so much. The duty just now is 10s. a gallon; it was 8s. for a considerable time, and 6s. 8d. for a considerable time, and therefore the price of the article cannot possibly have increased to so much as double.

2695. Mr. Locke.] What was it in 1853?—In 1851, 1852, and 1853, it was 3s. 8d.; in the middle of 1853 it was increased to 4s. 8d.; and in 1854 it was 4s. 8d. Therefore, when the Forbes Mackenzie Act came into operation, the duty was 4s. 8d. In 1855, the very next year, it was increased to 6s.; and then in the next year again it was increased to 8s.; so that it was only before 1855 that it was under 8s. Then, in making a comparison between 1856 and the present time, you must only take the increase at 2s. a gallon, which is a very small thing; because it is well known, and it is acknowledged by everybody connected with the trade, that into three gallons of proof spirits they will put one gallon of water. I do not mention that as if it were a fraud; but it is a matter of notoriety, it is one of the profits of trade. It diminishes the increase of 2s. by one-third, if you add one-third of water, which costs nothing; and of course you cannot say that there is an increase of 2s. a gallon on the water.

2696. I suppose they always put water to it, did they not?—Yes, always before the duty was raised; only you must not count the duty of 2s. as all paid for whisky, because in four gallons as it is sold, you pay 6s. of increased duty on three gallons of whisky, but you pay no increase of duty upon the fourth gallon which is sold as whisky, so that you must divide in fairness the four gallons as it is sold by 6s. of duty upon the four gallons, which is really only 1s. 6d. a gallon of increase.

2697. The same would occur with regard to the 3s. 8d., would it not?—It did; I merely give the Committee the facts, it is not for me to argue upon them.

2698. Mr. Yorke.] If I understand these figures rightly, in the year 1856 the duty was 8s. a gallon, and the consumption was 4,893,000 gallons?—That was the average.

2699. And in 1867, with a duty of 10s. a gallon, the consumption had increased to 5,452,000 gallons?—Yes; but from 1856 to 1860 the duty was 8s., and since 1860 it has always been 10s.

2700. Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen.] The result is, that with an increase of duty there has been an increase of consumption?—No, a diminution of consumption.

2701. Mr. Yorke.] In the year 1860, I understand you, when the duty stood at 8s. a gallon, the average consumption was 4,893,000 gallons?—Yes.

2702. In 1867, with the duty at 10s. a gallon, the consumption had increased to 5,452,000 gallons, making an increase of nearly 700,000 gallons?—Yes. Then in the following year ending the 31st of December last, it had fallen to 4,983,000 gallons. I have the figures from the return issued yesterday, for the year ending the 31st of December 1867, which is nine months later than the return for the year ending the 31st of March 1867.

2703. What are the figures for those 12 months?

months?—Four million nine hundred and eighty three thousand gallons.

2704. That would show a slight increase still upon the year 1856, would it not?—I have not given you the year 1856 by itself, but the average of four years, of which 1856 is one, but I can give you 1856, if you wish it separately.

2705. Mr. John Abel Smith.] Would not the increase of population be more than a set off against the increase of duty?—The population in Scotland increased less than in England; less than one per cent. per annum, and of course that does not make much difference in a few years, but if you take it for some 16 years, it makes a considerable difference.

2706. Since 1852 up to 1868, I think I understood you to say that you estimated the increase of population in Scotland at something like one-eighth?—Yes.

2707. And that must be borne in mind, must it not, in estimating the consumption?—Yes; but I was asked respecting the last few years, and it was to that question that my answer applied. During 16 years, of course, there has been a considerable increase of population.

2708. Mr. Yorke.] There was considerable distress in Glasgow and that district, I think, at one period, some few years ago; at what time would you say that that distress was greatest?—I could not undertake to say from memory. There is a disturbing element in all these matters, which the Committee, if they think it worth inquiring into, would do well to keep in view, and that is the speculations based upon the probable advance of duty. In some of those years large quantities of spirits were bought previous to the budget, and duty paid upon them, which was not all consumed during that time. At one time it got abroad that there was to be an advance in the duty; some curious stories were circulated about it at the time, I remember, and very large quantities of spirits were paid duty upon, just as happened the other day in the case of tea, 200,000*l.* or 300,000*l.* duty was paid upon tea before the Chancellor of the Exchequer made his speech. I forgot to mention that this is the reason why I have taken the average of four years, because that allows the disturbing influence to right itself, and while I have given you each year for everything else, I have given you the average of four years regarding spirits.

2709. Mr. Horsfall.] Can you give the Committee any information as to the extent of foreign spirits which are consumed, as compared with home spirits?—No, I do not know, except for the years in which it was given in the Report of the Royal Commission, and a few of the earlier years; but this new cheap foreign spirit which I have been speaking of, has only been introduced within the last few years.

2710. Mr. Roebuck.] Do you know what that foreign spirit is made from?—I believe it is made from potatoes and turnips, and all sorts of rubbish; they can distil whiskey of a certain kind out of almost anything.

2711. Mr. Baines.] What year was it that the duty was raised to 10*s.*?—In 1860 it was raised to 10*s.*

2712. What year was it raised to 8*s.*?—In 1856. If the Committee take the average of the first four years, it is nearly 7,000,000 gallons; and even taking the highest of the late years at nearly five millions and a-half, there is still a diminution of one million and a-half gallons, with an increase of the population.

2713. You stated that there was an increase of one-eighth in the population; was that for Edinburgh or for Scotland?—I stated it for Edinburgh; but anyone can see from the census returns what the increase has been in Scotland. I should think, speaking roughly, that you might say one-eighth; but it can easily be ascertained by reference to the Reports of the Registrar General of the census.

2714. Chairman.] With reference to a question which was asked you by a Member of the Committee just now, I observe that in the Report of the Royal Commission upon the Forbes Mackenzie Act, they give the comparative consumption of British, foreign, and colonial spirits for all the years between 1850 and 1858, so that it might be supposed, therefore, that the operation of the new spirits which you mentioned began to give something like a fair comparison?—Yes, and there was no increase in the consumption of foreign or colonial spirits during those years. The quantity of foreign spirits consumed at that time was very small, and had not increased.

2715. These were the figures, I believe, in one period of five years ending January 1854: 34,500,000 gallons of British spirits, 462,000 gallons of foreign spirits, and 981,000 of colonial spirits; and in the period of five years ending on the 31st of December 1858, the consumption was nearly 28,000,000 gallons of British spirits, 411,000 of foreign, and 691,000 of colonial?—Yes; I have no doubt that those figures are correct.

2716. Mr. John Abel Smith.] Have you no other table to bring before the Committee?—Yes; I have a list here of the number of commitments for offences of all kinds in Edinburgh in each year, but I think I have given the Committee all the facts which I thought important.

2717. Is the result of your experience strongly in favour of restrictive laws upon the consumption of spirits?—Very strongly.

2718. Do you believe that drunkenness is diminished in the same degree that restriction exists?—I think it is.

2719. At the same time, as you are aware, restriction is stated in Scotland to have created a very large amount of illicit drinking?—Yes; that statement has been very strenuously made.

2720. Do you believe it to be true?—I am not aware that any very great increase has taken place, comparing one period with another, but I believe there always has been, and always will be, illicit drinking in small disreputable houses in low neighbourhoods.

2721. Are those the places what you call by the name of shebeens?—Yes.

2722. Do you believe that the amount of illicit drinking bears any comparison to the amount of drinking that is checked by restriction?—No; I do not think it can possibly bear any comparison to it, because if the drinking was the same, of course the quantity of spirits consumed would be the same; and then the manifestation in the public streets would be the same, because a man would not be the less drunk because he swallowed half-a-pint of spirits at home than by swallowing it in a public-house.

2723. Do you believe that the habit of drinking amongst women has increased?—I have no means of knowing that.

2724. Do

2724. Do you believe that the general opinion of the more respectable of the working classes has undergone any change of late years with reference to restrictions on drinking?—In so far as I know anything of the opinions of the working classes in Edinburgh, they are very much in favour of the present state of the law; and I think that they cordially work with the magistrates; they are above the influence of the public-house circle; they have no theory to support, and, as far as I know, they do not trouble themselves much about theoretical principles, but just look at the facts; and I think if you were to poll the working-classes of Edinburgh, an enormous majority of them would be in favour of the present state of the law.

2725. Do not you think that such a feeling is based upon very respectable motives?—I have no doubt that it must be.

2726. And, therefore, is deserving attention by a legislator?—Certainly.

2728. Have you ever turned your attention to the amount of drinking on Saturday night, as bearing upon Sunday drinking, and should you consider it very desirable to limit on Saturday night the hours during which the public-houses are open?—Yes, I think the hours of opening should be limited all the week through; I do not mean to speak of what the public feeling is in London or in England, with which I am not acquainted; but I should state, for the information of the Committee, that the authorities in Edinburgh procured a clause in the Police Act of 1848, restricting the hours of keeping public-houses and spirit shops open after 11 at night, and there was then no question of the Forbes Mackenzie Act, or anything about it; that was adopted as a proper police regulation, and that Act has been in force all along since 1848, and is in force still; and if the Forbes Mackenzie Act were repealed to-morrow, under the Edinburgh Police Act, so far as regards the six days in the week, there would be no change in the law.

2729. Do I understand you, that public-houses in Edinburgh are open until 11 o'clock on Saturday evening?—Yes, every evening except Sunday.

2730. Do you consider that it would be a very wise and salutary regulation if on Saturday evening there was an earlier closing?—It is a question which I have not turned my attention to; I should think that uniformity is perhaps the best way; where you have very exceptional rules, I think they are not so apt to be generally observed, and that in all that kind of legislation we should endeavour to find out what the spirit of the people and of the time is, and legislate according to what the public would really help the local authorities to carry into effect.

2731. You do not hesitate to give the conclusion of your judgment, having paid a long attention to the subject, that the restrictions on drinking now existing in Scotland have produced great improvement amongst the population, and that the general feeling in the country would resist any return to the former system?—Yes, that is very decidedly my opinion.

2732. Mr. Baines.] I wish to test what you think is the general opinion of the people of Scotland with regard to the working of the Forbes Mackenzie Act, by asking especially what you believe to be, from what you have seen of the evidence before the Royal Commission, and what you know as a magistrate and a Member of Parliament, the opinion with reference to the working of the Forbes Mackenzie Act, of those five classes; first of all with regard to the magistrates, what do you conceive to be the opinion of the magistrates?—I think they generally strongly approve of it; there is a minority among those gentlemen in the Commission of the Peace, who often come and vote against the opinions of the general body, but whenever a division takes place it is unmistakable that the general opinion of those in the Commission of the Peace is for upholding restrictions.

2733. What do you believe to be the opinion of the ministers of religion of all denominations?—I believe that there is not a minister of any denomination in Edinburgh who does not cordially approve of it; I know, on very good authority, that Roman Catholic priests are very deeply impressed with the value of it, and I know that the Protestant ministers are the same; I never heard of any minister that had any doubts upon the subject.

2734. Do you think that that applies to Scotland generally as well as to Edinburgh?—Yes, to Scotland generally.

2735. What do you believe to be the opinion of the Sunday school teachers throughout Scotland on the subject?—I read from that minute to which I have referred, that 1,200 of them signed a memorial to myself, when I was chief magistrate of Edinburgh, praying that I would exercise my authority to bring about this change, and I know a good deal about their feelings; one of my own sons is a Sunday school teacher, and has been so for many years, and is now superintendent of a large school; and I know as much as most people about them; and believe that, to a man, the Sunday school teachers would support this kind of legislation.

2736. Do you speak now of Edinburgh alone, or of Scotland generally?—My knowledge of this class of men is not such as would entitle me to speak of Scotland generally, but I speak inferentially from knowing about Edinburgh, and I think that it would be the same throughout Scotland.

2737. You have spoken of the enormous majority of the people in Edinburgh who are in favour of this Act; have you any means of judging by what took place before the Commission on the Forbes Mackenzie Act or otherwise, of the general opinion of the working classes throughout Scotland?—I believe that the general opinion of the working classes throughout Scotland is entirely favourable to this kind of legislation; I believe that a very large majority of them are of that opinion. I have read through the Report of the Royal Commission and most of the evidence; I was a witness examined before it in Edinburgh, and I know pretty well the reception the Commission met with in different places, and the efforts that were made to get up a sort of spurious public opinion against the system of legislation which I have described, but it always failed; the public voice came out unmistakably in favour of restrictive legislation.

2738. What do you think is the opinion of the women upon this subject?—I should think that if there be any difference, the women would be more in favour of it than the men, because women who have the misfortune to have drunken husbands suffer a great deal more than any man can suffer.

2739. You have stated that there was an increase of population in Scotland, but I wish to know from you, who has paid very great attention to such subjects, whether that was not merely an increase in population, but whether there was not merely an increase in the population, but an increase in the private incomes and in the general prosperity and rate of wages of the working classes?—Yes, there has been a most extraordinary increase in the wealth and prosperity of Scotland during the period of 16 years to which my table refers; it is proved by the Income-tax returns, by the number of 10 l. electors for example, by the number of persons who pay house duty, and the increase of wages is quite notorious, unless in a particular year of depression. For instance, with regard to all the men employed in connection with building houses, masons, plasterers, joiners, gasfitters, glaziers, and all that class of people, their wages have largely increased.

2740. Would the natural tendency of a large increase in the wages of the working classes be to increase the consumption of spirits or otherwise?—All my information and observation leads me to believe that when wages are good and men have plenty of money to spend, they do spend considerably more in the public-houses than when trade is dull and their income small.

2741. Are you aware that the consumption of spirits is very frequently referred to in Parliament by distinguished Members of Parliament as evidence either of prosperity or of distress, if it is large of prosperity and if it is small of distress?—Yes; I am aware of that.

2742. So that we might have expected from this increase of population, and with this increase of the means of the population, a two-fold increase in the consumption of spirits if it had not been met by some counteracting cause?—Yes; had there been no change in any other respect, I should have expected to have seen a large increase over the 6,900,000 gallons that were consumed on the average of four years before the Act came into operation; I should have expected to have seen that figure very largely increased from the increase of population and the increase of prosperity.

2743. Mr. Malcolm.] Do those figures which you have been giving refer entirely to the consumption of spirits?—Entirely.

2744. Do you consider that the consumption of beer has increased largely within the last few years in Scotland?—I have no doubt that it has.

2745. In fact, that in a great measure beer amongst the working population is putting out the use of spirits, comparing, we will say, the present time with what it was six or seven years ago?—I should not think that it was amongst the working classes; they are not in the habit of drinking much beer, but I should think it was more especially amongst the middle classes of people; I think the working classes generally like the stimulant of spirits; but there is no possibility of getting accurate information about the quantity of beer consumed; I have tried it in different ways, and the difficulty is this: you get the quantity of malt converted into beer, which is very easily got, but there are large houses in Edinburgh whose principal trade is in making beer in Edinburgh and sending it to the London market, and others who send it abroad; and then there is no excise return, showing the result; the excise do not follow the beer, and they do not know what is sent to London; you can learn how much of it goes abroad, because you get the drawback, and that is easily arrived at. Then there is the countervailing difficulty that there are two large houses, Bass and Allsopp, who make beer in England and send considerable quantities of it to Scotland; you would require to get at that also, but from anything that I know, the quantity sent out of Scotland is enormously greater than the quantity that comes into Scotland.

2746. Without going into statistics at all, I merely wish to ask whether it is your opinion that the consumption of beer is increasing amongst the lower and middle classes in Scotland?—Yes, I think it is; beer was the ancient drink in Scotland; it is not much more than a century and a-half since whisky began to be used to any considerable extent; beer and wine were the beverages of Scotland.

2747. You speak of the working classes of Edinburgh, and generally of the working classes in Scotland being in favour of this strict legislation on Sunday; do not you consider that there is a considerable difference in the general character of our Scotch people, compared to the English people, with regard to the observance of the Sabbath day altogether; do not you think that from other reasons unconnected with drinking altogether, they are predisposed in favour of a stricter observance of the Sabbath than what you might meet with generally throughout England?—Yes, I think it is so; there are stricter views in Scotland than there are in England.

2748. And that would naturally predispose them to observe any of those laws more readily than would be the case in England?—I, perhaps, should not carry it so far as the question implies, because I have observed that when towns have been tested there has been a similar result; for example, I lived at Clifton one winter, and there was a sort of census taken there which I heard about, and it turned out from inquiries that were made, that there was as large a proportion of working men who were against public-houses, and who would suppress them to a large extent, and some of them altogether, as I could have believed was the case in any part of Scotland; and I have seen similar returns got up from other English towns, so that I would wish to distinguish in my answer between the feeling about the observance of Sunday and any feeling in favour of closing public-houses; I think that the feeling in favour of the observance of Sunday would be much stronger in Scotland than in England, but I do not think that the feeling about public-houses is in the same ratio of difference, so far as I have had an opportunity of judging.

2749. I mean that that would rather predispose Scotland, as a rule, to fall in with any strict legislation upon the subject?—Yes, I think so.

2750. Mr. Locke.] I understand that the alteration made by the Forbes Mackenzie Act, in point of fact, only applied to Sunday?—So far as the City of Edinburgh is concerned.

2751. The magistrates having before the passing of that Act made a regulation, which was the same as the Act was made to enforce with regard to week days?—Yes, but it was not so in other parts of Scotland, only in Edinburgh; it was not so as to closing closing at 11 o'clock on week days; at least, as far as I know, there was nothing in the general law of Scotland about it, and if any other town had that power, it must have been under a special Act.

2752. Is this a correct summary of the increase of duty, that the effect of the increase of duty as between 1853 and the present time has been almost exactly to double the price of whisky to the consumer?—That is rather an inference than a fact; I have stated what the duty was and what it is; in 1853 it was 3*s.* 8*d.* and 4*s.* 8*d.*, and it is now 10*s.* I suppose that that could not double the price of a gallon of whisky.

2753. Are you aware what the price of a gallon of whisky was before 1853, and what it is now?—There are two kinds of whisky; there is malt whisky, and there is what is called grain whisky; and I believe that they can make whisky from grain as low as 1*s.* 6*d.* per gallon; but I suppose good malt whisky is four, or five, or six shillings, but I am not conversant with it; I have not had whisky in my house for consumption, as a beverage, for many years, so that I am the worst person to apply to for information upon that point. I have bought it, but not lately.

2754. Is not this quite clear, that with regard to spirits the duty regulates the price, as it used to be with respect to foreign brandy, although it does not regulate it as much as it ought?—Yes; it is a most important element in the price, but still the question occurs whether a person having a taste for spirits, would be deterred by a small advance in price.

2755. Supposing he had the very worst whisky that ever was manufactured, the duty upon that whisky would be precisely the same, would it not?—Yes; but supposing a man drinks two or three glasses of whisky, you would be surprised how little the advance of duty amounts to on those two or three glasses. You see, there are 14 glasses in a bottle, and there are six bottles in a gallon; that is 84 glasses, supposing there was no adulteration at all; but you may say that, by adding one-third of water, there are 112 glasses of whisky in a gallon, with the water that is put in. If you increase the duty from 8*s.* to 10*s.* a gallon, it is only 2*s.* divided into 112 parts, being the increased cost of each glass; and that it is a very infinitesimal thing in deterring a man who is really desirous to get drink.

2756. It is merely the same sort of rule-of-three sum, is it not, as if you talked about a gallon, except that you put in water, but do not consume so much?—Hardly so; in other things we buy quantities of articles and consume quantities, but in a stimulant like this, I think it is always a question how much additional does the debauch cost. If it only cost a 1*d.*, or 1½*d.*, or 2*d.* a head, which it could not do more with any ordinary degree of drinking, it would be very difficult to say that the increase had any great deterring influence upon the class of drinkers.

2757. You are not, I presume, aware of how much the publicans in Edinburgh have raised it per glass, that is to say, what it was per glass before 1853, and what it is now?—No.

2758. I think I understood you to say that they always put water in it?—Yes.

2759. Therefore, the comparison would be perfect between now and then?—Yes.

2760. You have been asked whether the consumption of beer in Scotland has not increased to a very great extent. I would ask you whether the consumption of wine in Scotland has not doubled?—I do not remember the figures, but you can easily get them from the Report of the Customs, where I read them lately. I think it has not doubled; most certainly it has not doubled in the United Kingdom, and I should doubt if it had in Scotland. D. M'Laren, Esq., M.P.

6 May 1868.

2761. But you are aware that it has increased very much from the casual way in which you have looked at those returns?—Yes.

2762. Are you aware what the amount now paid annually in Scotland for whisky is?—If the consumption is 5,000,000 gallons, the excise duty will be 2,500,000*l.*, because it is exactly 10*s.* a gallon; then you have to add to that, the price of the whisky itself; and supposing that the whisky were worth 5*s.* a gallon, on the average, then it would be 2,500,000*l.* plus 1,250,000*l.*, or 3,750,000*l.* would be the wholesale price of the whisky; then you must add the enormous profit which the retailers are understood to charge upon it; I cannot speak as to that, but the Committee may form an opinion for themselves.

2763. But you would be able to say whether this is a correct calculation, that the amount now paid annually in Scotland for whisky, is about 1,300,000*l.* more than was paid before the passing of the Forbes Mackenzie Act, in the year 1853?—I could not give an opinion about that.

2764. If that were correct, that increase would be equal, would it not, to the whole produce of a 1*s.* 4*d.* in the pound Income tax, over all kinds of incomes in Scotland?—That cannot possibly be true; every penny in the United Kingdom adds about 1,250,000*l.* to the revenue, and supposing the cost of whisky had increased by 1,250,000*l.* in Scotland, I cannot see how it could possibly require 1*s.* 4*d.* in the pound to be added to the Income tax in Scotland, to make that up.

2765. Have you compared the consumption in Scotland with the consumption in Ireland, in relation to the population?—No, I have not; I have looked at the Irish returns, and they are considerably smaller than in Scotland; but last year there was a considerable increase, if I recollect rightly, and there is an enormous number of excise prosecutions in Ireland, showing that smuggling is very extensively practised there, whereas there are very few such prosecutions in Scotland, showing that the people who drink whisky honestly pay the duty upon it.

2766. But you have such places, have you not, as illicit stills in Scotland?—There are scarcely any now, there are shebeens, where spirits are sold, without paying the license for selling; but then I apprehend they all buy it from the shops in which the duty has been paid.

2767. Can you say whether by the last returns there are 3,000,000 of Scotchmen, who altogether consumed 5,000,000 gallons, whereas the 6,000,000 of Irish people only consume 4,000,000 gallons?—Some years ago they did consume in Ireland only 4,000,000, but I believe they consume considerably more now. Of course I understand these figures just to be rough and round sums, because neither of them are quite correct. The population of Scotland just now is about 3,200,000, and the population of Ireland is only 5,500,000, by the latest returns of the Registrar General.

2768. Is there such a Committee as the Sabbath Observance Committee of the Free Church Presbytery of Edinburgh?—I have no doubt there is; there is a general Sabbath Observance Committee; I am aware of that general Committee, and there may be a special one of the Free Church, but I am not aware of that.

2769. Do you think that this statement is correct, which I am informed was made by them; that
R 2

Esq., M.P.

6 May 1868.

that they knew of 188 houses in Edinburgh, regularly selling drink on Sundays; and that on one Sunday no fewer than 272 persons had been seen to obtain drink in one only of those houses out of the 188, and yet the police detections for Sunday sales, during the whole year, was only 110; are you aware that that was a report from this Sabbath Observance Committee?—I should not be at all surprised if that were quite correct; I do not know that it is; but it does not stagger me as being an untruthful looking thing; and I may state, as the Members of the Committee will probably have no idea of the number of people who go to those places, that during my period of office as chief magistrate of Edinburgh, before the passing of the Forbes Mackenzie Act, a census was taken, under my advice, of the number of people on Sunday that entered every public-house in Edinburgh, and there were 41,000 persons who entered public-houses on one Sunday; that census was taken in the most careful possible way. Probably some of them might have entered twice, or oftener, and therefore I should have rather said that there were 41,000 visits paid to public-houses.

2770. That was to regular houses?—Yes.

2771. But those houses are illicit houses, that are spoken of here?—Yes.

2772. Then the public-houses being shut, would not it be natural to assume that the people went somewhere else to get their drink; and this statement of this Sabbath Observance Committee of the Free Church Presbytery at Edinburgh rather confirms that view?—Yes; but supposing those houses to exist to the number stated, which I assume to be correct, and I do not in the least disbelieve it, every one of them is more or less watched by the police; and they know that the police could pounce upon them, because they have the power to go in if they like, and if they could prove anything like the sale of spirits, they would be hauled up and fined in very large penalties, not a 40 s. fine, but a very large sum which they are entitled to be fined under the Act; and the probability is that, even in the 181 houses which may each do a little in that way, there would not be a very large aggregate consumption of spirits.

2773. But those houses are ordinary houses, are they not; they have no license of course?—No; and many of them are brothels, and the most disreputable places imaginable, and no stranger could ever find them out.

2774. There is no Act of Parliament, is there, which enables the police to enter those houses in the same way that they are enabled to enter public-houses?—Yes, there is; under the Public-houses Amendment Act, which was carried through by the present Lord Muir, such special power was given to the police.

2775. To enter what description of houses?—Yes; the shebeens.

2776. Do they call them shebeens in the Act of Parliament?—They do.

2777. When you call a place a shebeen, would everybody know what that means; has it a definite meaning like a licensed public-house?—The Committee will not understand that shebeen is the only word in the clause, but I mean that that class of houses is described as shebeens, and the words of the clause are quite sufficient to identify that kind of house; and that power is given. There was a special Act for Edinburgh, passed last year, in which some of these things were made still more stringent, and that Act, I think, was called the Police Improvement Act.

2778. How long has that power been given, because it appears, according to this report which I have referred to, that the police had to enter those houses at their own risk?—After the Report of the Royal Commission, which the Honourable Baronet in the Chair read an extract from, there was an Act passed to amend the Forbes Mackenzie Act, and to give them powers; and I think it was about 1861, but the Act will speak for itself.

2779. Chairman.] I believe this is the exact state of things, that previous to the Act of 1861, Mr. Muir's Act, the police could only enter the reputed shebeens at their own risk, just the same as they would enter any private house on suspicion of the law being evaded, but they were liable to severe penalties if they made a mistake; but by the Act of 1861, they were permitted to enter houses where there was good reason to suspect drinking?—Yes, that is so.

2780. It was stated before the Royal Commission, that they had no difficulty in knowing where the shebeens were, by the stream of people who came from them?—That is so.

2781. You admit, do you not, that there has been a great deal of private drinking since the passing of the Forbes Mackenzie Act?—Yes.

2782. And that was stated by a number of witnesses before the Royal Commission?—Yes.

2783. I presume that you do not undervalue the evils which may accrue to families, by the practice of taking home ardent spirits and consuming them in the family?—Of course not, but I am not a believer in that, as being carried on to a very great extent; I do not think that the taking home of spirits to drink in private houses is done to any very great extent.

2784. There was a good deal of evidence given to that effect, was there not, before the Royal Commission?—Yes.

2785. Such evidence as this, which was given by Mr. George List, the head of the police in the country of East Lothian: "When there was a party of colliers or such men" (at the public-house), "we found that, on breaking up, one-third of them would take from the public-house or inn a bottle of whisky. They go to a private house, where the wives, and in a great many instances the younger portion of the family, and young boys who are drawers for them, participate. You see less apparent drunkenness, because the people are not going about, but there are more participating, and the young people are far more complained of now than ever I knew them." There was plenty of evidence of that sort was there not?—Yes; all that I doubt is the degree; the fact is notorious to all the world, that there is private drinking, but I do not believe that it is so very general.

2786. You also would admit that there is a good deal of travelling, sufficient to qualify for the purchase of liquor on Sundays in Scotland; I mean that men go a few miles, and then are able to procure drink, which they could not do if they remained at home?—Yes, they do get it; I doubt whether they go for the purpose of getting it, but they make Sunday excursions, and get drink freely in the small inns that they go to.

2787. I suppose you would even go the length of admitting that women may have taken to drink, who would not have drunk before, from liquor being consumed at home instead of at the public-houses?—I never knew a case of the kind, but it may be so for anything I know.

2788. And yet, after making these admissions,
you

you quote facts, and state without hesitation that in Scotland there is a vast diminution of drunkenness on Sunday?—Yes.

2789. And that there is a general acquiescence, without saying a universal acquiescence, in the operation of the Act?—Yes, that is my belief.

2790. Perhaps you will allow me just to bring out my meaning clearly; I do not doubt any of the facts that you have stated, it is only as to the degree or the universality of the things about which I have doubts; my reason for thinking that it cannot be at all universal is this, that the people would not go home to drink without afterwards coming out into the open air; when a man or woman is under the influence of drink they want to get out and go about; and if they drank an equal quantity they would be just as much intoxicated whether the drink was taken in their own houses or in the public-house, and they would be found drunk in the street, and they would be taken to the police office, and would be recorded in these tables which I have referred to. If they are not drunk in the streets, they do not find their way to the police office, and I have therefore no materials to lead me to believe that the drinking can be extensive in private houses.

2791. Even making an allowance for the amount of private drinking, and the evasion of the law which is alleged, have the facts led you to the absolute conclusion that the Act has been successful in a very great degree?—Yes, in a very great degree.

2792. Are you prepared to advise the Committee that the facts which you have so stated and proved would warrant the Committee in expecting similar benefits from its application to London or England generally, or an application to the extent proposed by this Bill?—To England generally, I should say yes; but if the question were as first put, with regard to London alone, I should have some doubt about giving an opinion. I think that London is almost a kingdom of itself; it has the enormous population of 3,000,000, and if every public-house were literally shut up on Sunday in London, as they are in Edinburgh and in Glasgow I am not sure that it would commend itself to the general opinion of the public, and I think that it might possibly lead to disturbances; but I should rather that a man who knew a great deal more about London than I do should answer questions of that kind. Still I would not shrink from giving my opinion when the question has been asked.

2793. Is it not the case that a vast number of persons who do resort to the public-houses in Scotland during the week, and who used to resort to them on Sundays, did so for the purpose of buying spirits?—Yes, and meeting agreeable company. Perhaps living in a small wretched bedroom, they go to the public-house in the winter time, and see a nice blazing fire and gaslights, and a number of people there that they know, and they sit down and enjoy themselves; it is to them just what a club is to gentlemen. It is getting into an atmosphere of a more pleasurable kind, as it were, according to their notions; and I think that that kind of desire for the comforts of a public room and meeting their companions, has far more to do with drunkenness than the mere abstract love of drink; it proceeds mainly from the love of company, I think.

2794. The beverage which they want to drink is generally spirits, is it not?—Yes.

2795. You are no doubt aware, although of course your acquaintance with London life is much less than with that of Edinburgh, that the chief object of the resort to public-houses in England is by no means generally spirits?—I am aware that it is chiefly beer.

2796. In fact, the habit of beer drinking is almost universal among the working classes, at least in England?—Yes, I have been told by parties who profess to know more about London than I do, that as a general rule the working men who drink, drink beer, and as a rule the women who drink, drink gin.

2797. Is it not the case that the men who resort to public-houses in Scotland are generally looked upon as not a very respectable class?—If they are known to get drunk, of course they are looked upon as not a very respectable class; but I have no doubt that many who are considered very respectable men go occasionally to public-houses.

2798. But if an employer saw a man in his service beginning to go regularly to a public-house and take a glass of whisky, would not he think that he was going to the bad?—I should not say that it would alarm him so much, because it is so common; but if he saw him come to his work with the influence of drink upon him, not absolutely intoxicated, but still evidently under the influence of drink, I think he would form a bad opinion of him, and get rid of him as soon as he could.

2799. Is it not quite common in Scotland, if a man smells of whisky, to think that he is getting into not a very good way?—Yes.

2800. Is it not the case that most respectable workmen in England are in the constant habit of taking beer at certain hours in the day, and that it is a condition of their life?—Yes, so I have been told; that the beer is to them what the soup, or broth, as we call it in Scotland, is, it forms a part of the dinner of the working men.

2801. You stated that in Scotland beer was formerly the beverage of the country; was not that before tea became a general article of consumption?—Yes; there was no tea at all drunk at that time among the general run of people; it was an expensive luxury.

2802. And tea now, being cheap, has taken the place of the Twopenny that used to be drunk in those days?—Yes, to a very large extent; but the Twopenny and the French wine, such as claret, in Scotch history, were the drinks of all classes in Scotland before tea became common.

2803. Would you not make a much greater invasion upon the settled habits of the people of England by shutting-up to them the use of the public-houses where they go to buy their beer, than in Scotland where the public-houses are used for buying spirits; a practice which is looked upon more in the light of a vice?—Yes, I think you would; and, if I remember rightly, there is a clause in the Bill to allow beer to be sold on certain hours on Sunday, to be carried away for consumption at home. In going about London you see now that the people do not all go to the public-houses to drink, because you see servants and children carrying jugs across the streets in all directions, showing that now they take it home; and they could take it home under this Bill, as well as under the other Act, at certain hours.

2804. But you could fancy it being a great change from the usual habits of the people who go to a public-house and have a draw of beer, and drink it fresh, if you positively debarred them on the day in the week, on which they are most at leisure from following their usual practice?—Yes, no doubt the change would be great.

D. M'Laren,
Esq., M.P.

6 May 1868.

2805. And you cause see that there is no analogy between the case of such prohibitions in London and in Edinburgh?—I should not say that there was no analogy, but I admit that it would grate more upon the existing habits of the people in the large towns of England, than it did grate upon the habits of the people in Scotland: that is all the length I should carry it.

2806. Mr. Roebuck.] Have you had large experience of the working classes in Scotland, during your life?—Yes.

2807. What should you say as to their improvement as a moral and intelligent people during the last 10 years; do you think that their intelligence has improved, and that their morality has improved during that time?—I should not say, perhaps, that 10 years afforded a full comparison; but still I think that the educational element is being developed, and that the men are becoming more sober and more thoughtful and with more reading, gradually rising; but not to any very great extent, I think, in 10 years.

2809. You have pointed out certain improvements within the last few years, as regards their habits with respect to drink; do not you think that much of that improvement may be attributed, not merely to the Forbes Mackenzie Act, but to their improved habits, generally?—Yes; I think everything of that kind helps: I have no doubt that the circumstances to which you refer have had considerable influence.

2810. There are these observations in the 12th page of the Report of Royal Commissioners for inquiring into the Licensing System, and Sale and Consumption of Exciseable Liquors in Scotland: "We are, however, led by the evidence given before us to attribute to other causes, besides the increase in the price of spirits, the decided change for the better which has taken place among the working classes in all parts of the country. The zealous labours of the churches of all denominations in supporting Home Missions, and other similar agencies have been attended with most beneficial results; the spread of education, and the extension of a cheap literature adapted to the wants and requirements of the people, aided by the establishment of lectures, reading-rooms, and schemes of rational recreation have done much to withdraw the operatives from the public-house. Benefit has also resulted from the practice (which it is to be wished were more general) of paying the wages of workmen at other times than on Saturday afternoons, and from the keepers of provisions stores in connection with the public works having, in many instances, ceased to sell spirits; nor do we undervalue the effects which have been produced by the exertions of temperance and total abstinence societies in reclaiming many persons from confirmed habits of drinking, and in preventing a still larger number from acquiring them." What I want to ask you is this, whether there has not been a great improvement in the habits of the people, totally apart from any influence of legislation?—I have no doubt whatever that that statement is correct, but how far the causes referred to operate, I cannot tell.

2811. So that, so far as that goes, it goes to diminish the effect of the conclusion which you drew from the statistics which you mentioned at the commencement of your evidence?—Yes; but if the Committee understood me to mean that everything in the way of improvement flowed from the Forbes Mackenzie Act, that certainly was not my meaning; and I warned them that there had been an increase of the duty, which was one countervailing influence. I did not at all mean to convey the impression that the whole of it arose from the Forbes Mackenzie Act.

2812. I was merely bringing to your mind that there are other influences besides legislative influences which have been very seriously at work during the years of which you speak?—Yes, no doubt.

2813. So that we may say that the general habits of the whole Scottish people have very much improved, that their intelligence has been increased, and that the better morality of the people is attributable in a certain degree to other influences than legislative influences?—Yes, I quite agree in all that; but the only qualification that I made was about its being during the last 10 years. And your quotation departed from that period, because the Commissioners are speaking of a period anterior to 1860. All that class of improvement has been going on during my own recollection, which is now pretty considerable, and yet the consumption of spirits was rapidly being increased during the earlier portion of that time, while all this education process was going on; and therefore when that change in the legislation took place, and one saw a rapid diminution, I think that one is logically entitled to infer that that legislation had a very considerable influence in contributing to the change; but I do not say all the influence. For example, I think that 25 years ago, the improvements were going on pretty much the same as they are now going on in Scotland in all those educational matters. I believe that the temperance societies are now much more powerful than they were then; but all those mission agencies and schools, and lectures, and mechanics' institutes, and all that class of moral machinery, if I may so call it, was in full operation, and yet the quantity of spirits consumed was being increased during the earlier portion of that time.

2814. Do not you suppose that those moral influences have rather increased in power within the last few years?—I should think that must have been the case, as there is gradually more and more benevolence; a great many men of wealth contribute out of their means for these purposes every year, and there is more done this year than was done last year.

2815. But this beneficial influence being followed by those beneficial consequences, with the exception of a diminution of drinking, would not that lead you to think that this which you would call the evil influences of drink have been rather exaggerated in your mind?—I do not think so.

2816. Because you see the people have been improved, and you say that the drinking has been increasing, but in spite of that increased drinking, their moral habits have very much improved, and therefore do not you think that you rather exaggerate the mischievous influence of that over-drinking that you talk of?—I think that many of our best educated men do not think it is wrong to take a moderate quantity of drink; it does not injure their reputation among their neighbours; they may be good moral characters, and drink a good deal of spirits, or wine, or anything else; and I think that the one set of facts is not inconsistent with the other set. I have known a great deal about the working classes for the last 50 years, and have lived in the midst of them, men, and have been connected with all sorts of committees, and societies and associations and meetings, and I believe that during all that time there has been great educational progress going on gradually; but I should say that, during the last 25 years, very much more has been done than during the first 25 years.

2817. In your own rank of life you must have seen a very great change in habits of drinking?—Yes.

2818. We drink very much do we not, less than our fathers and grandfathers drank?—Yes.

2819. And that beneficial effect has all been produced without the aid of legislation?—It has.

2820. Do not you think that something of the same sort of influence is going on in other ranks of life?—I have no doubt that it is; even the very force of imitation from masters and employers on working men must have a quiet operative influence to a certain extent; but then it is always a question of degree, how much, and how far?

2821. You made the observation, that the public-house was the club-house of the working-man, that he went there for a better sort of atmosphere, for the pleasure of society, and that he met pleasant friends there; all that pleasure I presume you conceive to be very harmless pleasure?—If they do not carry it to excess, which we know they often do; but if a man goes and gets a glass from a neighbour, he gives him one in return, and then they get a third and a fourth, and a fifth, and it ends by some of the company, or perhaps all of them, getting drunk; I look upon it as a place of danger and temptation, and so far as any influence of mine could extend, I should advise every working man not to go there at all.

2822. Would you apply that to your own class; would you say that a club-house was a place of danger for what is called a gentleman?—I believe that it would not be amiss if there were fewer club-houses, and if fewer people attended them.

2823. That is your own particular opinion, and it is mine, because I do not very often attend club-house; I do not think I have been in a club-house for the last three or four years, but it would be a diminution of the pleasure, and the harmless pleasure of a large number, if you were to say to the gentlemen: "Shut up your club-house on the Sunday"?—Yes.

2824. Do you not think it is a diminution of the harmless pleasure of a much larger class to shut up the public-house on Sunday?—You see we diverge at the point of the meaning of the word "harmless." I do not think that the public-house is a harmless pleasure; I think it is a very dangerous pleasure.

2825. But there may be a harmless pleasure in public-house, may there not?—There may be.

2826. And it is only when men carry drinking to excess that that which is otherwise a place of harmless pleasure becomes a dangerous place?—We must judge, I apprehend, by the general result. As a general rule you never are afraid of seeing crowds of people going to or coming from churches; you do not find any of them drunk; but if you look at the public-houses when they are shut at 11 at night, and see the stream of people that come out of them, you will always find a considerable number of them that you know quite well from their looks, are very much the worse for what they have been doing there.

2827. That is merely saying that a man misuses a thing which otherwise used is a happiness to him, but that pleasure which you talk of from a man meeting an amusing friend and enjoying his conversation is surely a thing which, if it could be enjoyed without the mischief of drunkenness, you would not deprive a working man if you could help it, would you?—No; I would just look at the general result, and if I saw that legislation for closing the public-houses in England on Sunday was likely to promote the social and moral benefits of the working classes, and if I was satisfied that that was the opinion of the working classes themselves I would, with all my heart, vote for an Act to effect that object.

2828. We must be very careful that we do not excite feelings of anger while doing this, must we not?—I quite admit that.

2829. You may look at it in that light, but the working man, looking at it in another light, would say to you: "Why do not you apply the same rule to yourselves that you apply to us;" and you recollect that you are running this danger by indulging in this species of legislation?—But my impression is, that if you had a working man's parliament, from which all other than the working men were excluded, they would be in favour of some such legislation as this; I do not speak of London, but taking all England, I believe that a great majority of the working classes would approve of some legislation of this kind.

2830. And yet we hear of a very large class of them petitioning Parliament not to pass such a Bill as this?—Yes; but we know what influences are at work in getting up such petitions; the publicans and those connected with them have very great influence in getting up petitions.

2831. There are other classes, are there not, who have a great interest in getting up opposite petitions?—I quite admit that.

2832. Therefore, those are quantities that obliterate one another?—No, not quite, I think; petitions are not to be considered as impartial witnesses on either side; but still they are entitled to great weight.

2833. There are very large numbers who are opposed to this class legislation, and a wise legislator would be very careful, would he not, of the influence of his law upon the minds of these people?—No doubt; but I think that the two classes of petitions are not exactly in the same position; the publicans imagine that they have an interest in repressing this kind of legislation, and in getting up petitions they suppose they are promoting their personal interests; whereas those on the other side who get up petitions have no personal interest to promote; they are spending their time and their money in what they believe to be a labour of love for the good of their fellow-creatures.

2834. Do not suppose that I am impugning the motives of the large class who are doing this; I believe that a very large class of them are acting from purely philanthropic motives; but, at the same time, I cannot quite hide from my view the fact that there is great personal pleasure and self dignity created within a man by supposing that he leads a large number of people; and we know that that class of motives may induce a great number of people to get up such petitions as those that we have been talking of?—No doubt.

2835. Mr. Horsfall.] I think, in reply to a question put by the Honourable Chairman, you gave it as your opinion that the principle of the law now in force in Scotland might be applied to this this country, excepting in London, and you afterwards qualified that by adding other large towns?—I did not mean to qualify it by adding other large towns; my belief is that it might safely and advantageously be applied in every town in the United Kingdom, with, perhaps, the exception of London; and I said that I would not like to give an opinion about London for want of sufficient local knowledge.

2836. But why do you think there might be any exception so far as regards London?—From what I have been told and what I have seen about the enormous number of people in London, who have, properly speaking, no houses of their own, but who live in a single apartment, and who take their meals, as it were, in or about the public-houses or other public places established for that purpose, and that it is just a part of their being in London to get their meals in those houses: and then if you were to shut all those houses up suddenly on the Sunday, it might disturb half-a-million of people in all their family arrangements very seriously, and that might excite such a feeling of irritation as would be exceedingly inconvenient for those who have the charge of local matters. I am fairly answering your question, and telling you what the reasons were in my mind for not wishing to give an opinion about London; but I would have no hesitation at all about Liverpool or Manchester, any more than I would have about Glasgow or about Edinburgh.

2837. But irrespective of the public-houses of which you speak in London, are you not aware that there are refreshment-houses which are open for parties going to dine without the necessity of going to a public-house?—Yes, I included all those in my observation; I said public-houses and places of that kind, where they practically take their meals in place of doing it in their own houses.

2838. Will you be so good as to state to the Committee, if you can, what is the difference in the number of cases of drunkenness arising out of public-houses and out of beer-houses in Edinburgh?—There is hardly such a thing as a beer-house in Edinburgh; I should doubt whether there are 20 persons in Edinburgh with a license to sell beer alone; they do not think it worth while; the public-house sells beer and spirits also.

2839. Mr. Knatchbull Hugesson.] In answer to a question put to you by the Honourable Member for Sheffield, you stated, that although you attributed the decrease of drunkenness in Scotland mainly to the restriction, yet you at the same time thought there was something to be attributed to the social and moral progress for which Scotchmen are so distinguished?—I did state that.

2840. Do you think, as a general rule, that restriction is or is not likely to be followed by evasion?—It is certain to be followed by evasion in every case, to some extent.

2841. Then you would admit that there has been an evasion, as shown by the drinking in private houses, but you would differ from what has been stated to this Committee as to the extent of this evasion?—Yes.

2842. Do you think that Sunday in Edinburgh is considered as a holiday by the working classes?—No, not as a holiday in the way of enjoyment; the general public opinion does not sanction that view of Sunday at all.

2843. There would be a radical difference, would there not, between the way in which

Sunday is considered by the working classes in Edinburgh, and by the working classes in the large towns in England?—I gave no opinion about the view which the working classes in the large towns of England take of it. I am not aware that the working classes in the large towns of England view Sunday merely as a holiday for recreation or amusement; for the way in which chapels and churches are crowded shows that a very large number do not take that view.

2844. Is it the practice of the working classes in Edinburgh to indulge in the same kind of excursions as are indulged in by the working classes in London and other large towns in England?—There is a marked difference between the habits of the people; there is not the excursion traffic in Scotland in anything like the degree that there is in England.

2845. When the Forbes Mackenzie Act was adopted in Scotland, were there any public meetings, or any manifestations against it at all?—I do not remember any. I am pretty sure that there were not in Edinburgh. I think it passed with general acquiescence.

2846. You are aware, are you not, that in England when certain restrictions have been attempted, they have been followed with considerable manifestations of public opinion against them?—Yes, I have understood so.

2847. Therefore it does not follow that that which has been in consonance with the public opinion of the operative class in Scotland would be in consonance with the public opinion of the same class in England?—No; and hence any remark in the course of my examination that in any legislation of this kind I thought care should be taken to ascertain what was the opinion of those people who would be affected, and to try to legislate in a spirit which they would tacitly or actively support.

2848. Having passed an opinion upon the petitions which would show that you are not very favourable to ascertaining the opinion of people by that means, have you in your own mind any plan by which the feeling of those classes could be accurately ascertained?—I have observed by the public prints, and I have been told by parties, that a house to house visitation has taken place in many towns; that respectable men go round with a schedule for shutting up, or for not shutting up, who take down the name of every person, and they sum up the columns; in a minute or two minutes, which their call occupies in each case, there is no time for argument or persuasion; it is not a thing of any importance to any one individually, and I should therefore think that the result of that kind of analysis of the public opinion might be depended upon as very accurate upon the whole.

2849. You have stated that that upon some particular Sunday, before the introduction of the Forbes Mackenzie Act, 41,000 persons entered the public-houses in Edinburgh; was that followed by any statistics as to the number of complaints made in the police court on the next day?—No, it was not a Sunday out of the ordinary rule; it was not selected as a Sunday when such cases were specially expected to occur, but as the ordinary state of things on every Sunday.

2850. Having ascertained that an average of 41,000 persons entered the public-houses of Edinburgh on a Sunday, can you give us the average number of cases of drunkenness brought before the police court on Monday?—It must have been in 1852 when the census was taken, and there were re then 776 found drunk on the Mondays of that year, and on the Mondays of 1867 there were 200 found drunk.

2851. That would be something less than 10 per cent. of the people who were in the public-houses?—Yes, if you supposed that they were all different persons, but many of those people would probably pay two or three visits; there would be nearly as many persons as there were visits.

2853. But would not the 97 per cent. themselves call it a disadvantage?—I am not sure of that; I have heard many of them say the opposite, that they have been tempted to go into the public-houses when they saw them open, which they would not have thought of doing if they had been shut, because the feeling would not have come across their minds.

2854. I think you have shown us figures by which you wish to prove that the consumption of Scotch spirits has somewhat decreased in Scotland during a given period of years; is not that quite incompatible with the fact that the consumption of beer, foreign spirits, and wine, has so increased, that, in truth, the people of Scotland at the present moment drink as much, and perhaps a great deal more than they drank before the restrictive system came into operation?—If your statement were proved in the same way that my statement about the consumption of spirits has been proved, then I should admit it; but I have not only not proved it, but I have never seen it attempted to be proved, with anything like success, that such was the state of things.

2855. But still you admit that that is a very plausible explanation, because you have admitted that there is an increase in the sale of foreign spirits?—I have no doubt of it.

2856. You would not have us jump too hastily to the conclusion that there really has been such a decrease in Scotland as at first sight the figures would show?—That is exactly the impression which I should like my evidence to produce upon the minds of the Committee; that this legislation has been a very great cause, but by no means the sole cause of the change.

2857. Have you at all compared the consumption of spirits in Ireland during the same period?—No, I have not.

2858. Should you be very much surprised if you were told that the decrease in Ireland has been comparatively greater than the decrease in Scotland, whilst at the same time there has been no increase of restriction?—I have seen the figures about Ireland, although I have never analysed them, and I believe that the decrease in Ireland has been caused mainly by the effect of enhancing the duty from a low figure to 10s.; besides that, the facilities for smuggling there are greater, and disobedience to the law is a thing that does not so generally excite disapprobation. There is a sort of general feeling of chuckling over cheating the Excise, or cheating the Queen, as it is called; and I believe that the temptation to smuggling becomes irresistible when the duty is high; I have derived that impression from the number of Excise prosecutions which have been instituted; and, although the quantity of spirits which paid duty has been so much diminished, I do not believe the quantity drunk has been much diminished.

2859. Would not an Irish witness very possibly say that he did not believe that in Scotland there had been a decrease?—I think that he could not say so, because there is no country in the world, perhaps, where the law is better enforced than it is in Scotland; and there is a sort of stamp of moral reprobation against smuggling; a man loses caste by being supposed to set the law at defiance, and I think that feeling does not so generally exist in Ireland.

2860. But, as I understand you, with respect to restriction, you are not sufficiently acquainted with England to be aware that there may be a great difference as to the popularity of such a measure as is now before us?—No, I would rather not give an opinion upon that. I speak only of Scotland.

2861. Mr. Yorke.] You have expressed yourself in favour of restriction generally; will you say how far you would carry it?—I approve of that Bill which was laid before Parliament, and if it had come to a division, I think that I should have voted for it.

2862. We have had a great deal of evidence to show that the drinking on Saturday night is greater even than that which takes place on Sunday; would you prefer, if you had the choice, to legislate for Saturday instead of Sunday?—No; I am very doubtful about closing on Saturday night at an earlier hour than other nights.

2863. Supposing you were satisfied that the drinking was greater on Saturday night than on Sunday, would that in your judgment be a sufficient reason for choosing that day for restriction in preference to Sunday?—No, it would not. I think that Sunday has many advantages apart from the religious question, upon which of course the Committee would not desire to enter; but I think there are also very many other advantages in favour of having Sunday as a day of rest.

2864. Your choice of Sunday would be based upon other considerations besides those of the comparative amount of drinking which takes place?—Yes, it would.

2866. Mr. Horsfall.] Have you been long a resident in Liverpool?—About 24 years.

2867. Have you had any special means of information as to the extent of drunkenness in Liverpool as compared with other towns?—Yes; I have had the means of information arising from the a numerous congregation in the centre of the town, and having been very much mixed up with several movements largely in connection with the working classes and others.

2868. Will you state what your experience is of the drunkenness of Liverpool now as compared with former years?—I have had an opportunity of entering very fully into that subject, and I am afraid that my testimony will not be in favour of our present position in Liverpool.

2869. Have you any statistical returns upon the subject?—Yes.

2870. Do you think that drunkenness in Liverpool on the Sunday has increased as compared with former years?—I think that drunkenness has undoubtedly increased; and, so far as I am able to measure the drunkenness on Sundays, in connection with other days, I would conclude that it had increased as well.

2871. But has it increased to a greater extent than on other days?—My information refers to the state of drunkenness generally in the town of Liverpool.

2872. But are you not prepared to give the Committee any definite information as to whether it has or has not increased on Sunday in proportion to the other days of the week?—I speak from the police returns, and the police returns do not give Sundays as distinct from week days.

2873. Have you noticed any increase or decrease in drunkenness when the two systems of licensing were in force, what is called the free-trade licensing and the restrictive licensing?—Yes; I have observed, from the most careful examination of the subject, that under the restrictive system the drunkenness was not so great as under the so-called free licensing system.

2874. Are you aware whether the drunkenness of the town of Liverpool has had a very great effect upon the pauperism of the town?—Yes, I believe so. I have made an examination into that subject, and I find that we are the most drunken town in England according to the returns, and the town in which, in proportion to the population, the greatest number of paupers had been relieved upon the 1st of January 1867.

2875. But does not that increase in the number of paupers arise from the very large Irish population who are constantly flowing into the town?—It may, to some extent.

2876. And of course the drunkenness has materially increased the extent of crime, has it not?—Yes; I think so.

2877. Have you any means of knowing the views of the licensed victuallers in Liverpool as to the closing of the public-houses on the Sunday?—Yes; we made a canvass of the licensed victuallers in 1860, by 70 gentlemen, partly ministers of religion and partly laymen: every public-house in the town of Liverpool which we could reach was canvassed, those gentlemen going two and two, and they had two papers, one in favour of an Act of Parliament compelling the licensed victuallers to close their places on Sundays, and the other against; and if the Committee will allow me, I will state the result; the following is the principal paper: "We, the undersigned licensed victuallers of Liverpool, are in favour of the passing of an Act of Parliament compelling all persons keeping licensed houses for the sale of malt or spirituous liquors or wine, to close their places of business on Sundays." About 1,400 are accounted for in the returns; of these the following are the principal figures: "Signed the above document, 757; glad of the Act, but would not sign it, 113"; many of those persons already closing on the Lord's-day, making a total in favour of an Act for closing on the Lord's-day, 870; "refused, and understood to be opposed, 252; houses kept by servants and parties neutral, or not in a position to sign it, 97; not seen, though repeatedly called on, 90; for keeping open an hour or two in the day, 6." Showing a total of rather better than 1,300 out of the 1,400 public-houses then in Liverpool.

2878. Then, according to that return, the majority of the publicans were in favour of entertaining closing?—A large majority; and I believe there are so in Liverpool.

2879. A number of those, I think you say, have voluntarily closed their public-houses?—Yes, they have.

2880. Are you in a position to tell the Committee, from any information that you have obtained, as to the views of the public generally and especially of the working classes?—Yes; I was one of the honorary secretaries to the canvass of the householders of Liverpool, made in the year 1863; that was the first movement of the kind, I believe, that has been made in the country. We went about it as fully and carefully as we could, conducting the canvass by paid, and not by voluntary agents, and I hold in my hand a paper containing a statement as to the result. "There were 16 districts with one man to each, each man being furnished with a section of the map of Liverpool, with stringent and repeated instructions; first, to omit no house, whether rich or poor; second, to make no attempt at coercing any to sign any of the papers in particular, or, if unwilling, to sign at all."

2881. Mr. Roebuck.] How could you coerce any one?—I think there might be influence brought to bear.

2882. Will you explain how a man going round to a house can coerce a man to sign the paper?—I think the person might go to the employer of a man, and use such influence with the employer, that this man might be induced to sign the paper which he was not willing to sign; least that was the object we had in view.

2883. Mr. Horsfall.] Will you proceed with the instructions which you were reading?—"Third, to misrepresent none, but honestly to report the returns made, whatever they were; and, lastly, to receive no signature, unless made by the principal, or by one acting by his or her authority." I received those papers. I met the men twice each week; I heard their statements as to the reception which they met with in the houses of the rich, and in the courts, and lanes, and cottages of the poor. I not only had the opportunity of examining the papers, all of which to the amount of 53,000, and upwards (this does not include the neutrals, amounting to 6,335) are still in my custody; and I can state most confidently to this Committee, that we were careful in the selection of the men; I believe that, to the best of their ability, those men honestly discharged their duties, and I honestly state to this Committee the results which they put into our hands.

2884. Chairman.] I think you stated that between 800 and 900 publicans expressed a desire for the passing of an Act to restrict the sale of liquors on Sunday?—757 signed the paper, and 113 declared that they would be glad of an Act but would not sign any paper.

2885. If I correctly understood the Honourable Member for Liverpool, he asked you whether there was not a majority of the publicans of Liverpool as you said, Yes?—Yes, a large majority.

2886. We have it in evidence from Major Greig, that there are 1,945 public-houses in Liverpool, besides 819 beer-houses; so that it would not appear to be a majority?—That is in 1860, our canvass was in 1860.

2887. Mr. Yorke.] Have the public-houses doubled since 1860?—I think that the public houses have increased about 340; the actual number number in 1860 was 1498. The beer-sellers were not canvassed.

2888. Mr. Horsfall.] I think you took the whole of the householders under their different signations, publicans, labourers, and artisans, and so forth; did you not?—Yes.

2889. Will you state to the Committee what the summary was?—There were 72,350 houses in the borough, and of those, 5,350 were uninhabited, leaving 67,000 inhabited houses to be accounted for. We had the forms actually returned in favour of total closing, from 44,149; against Sunday closing 3,330; for closing except for two hours, during which no drink was to be consumed at the premises, 6,417. Neutral persons who could not sign any paper, but declared to the canvassers that they were neutral, and did not care how the thing was, 6,339; making a total of returns, 60,235; and by double occupations, houses shut up, and no return; hostile cases, where they refused to receive forms, amounting to 10, and lost by negligence of masters, or servants, masters absent, and no instructions given, the difference is made up, amounting to 67,000.

2890. You dissected the householders, and put them under their different classes, did you not?—Yes.

2891. Will you be so good as to state the summary of that to the Committee?—We classified the returns into the following: artisans, labourers, shopkeepers, clerks, mariners, persons out of business, merchants, professionals, publicans, beer-sellers, and Scripture readers. The total number of artisans was 18,555, of which there were signed for No. 1, that is for total closing, 14,828, for closing except for two hours, 2,370, and against any change in the law, 1,357; of labourers there were a total of 17,428, of which 15,092 were in favour of total closing, 1,602 for closing except for two hours, and 734 against any change in the law; of shopkeepers there were a total of 6,181, of which 5,145 were in favour of total closing, 738 of closing except for two hours, and 298 against any change in the law; of clerks, agents, &c., there were 4,268, there were for total closing, 3,479, for closing except for two hours, 543, and against any change in the law, 246; of mariners there were 2,504, of which there were for total closing, 2,093, for closing except for two hours, 307, and against any change in the law, 104; of gentlemen out of business or of no business, the total number was, 9,953, there were in favour of total closing, 4,481, for closing except for two hours, 353, and against any change in the law, 119; the total number of merchants was 924, for entire closing there were, 705, for closing except for two hours, 70, and against any change in the law, 49; of professionals the total was 922, of whom there were for total closing, 683, for closing except for two hours, 177, and against any change in the law, 62; of publicans, who signed this paper, there was a total of 724, of whom there were for entire closing on the Lord's Day, 432, for closing except for two hours, 93, and against any change in the law, 199; of beer-sellers the total was, 15, there were for entire closing, 119, for closing except for two hours, 64, and against any change in the law, 132; the total number of Scripture readers was 92, of whom all were for entire closing; showing according to the percentage, of artisans 80 per cent. who signed for entire closing, 13 per cent. for closing except for two hours, and 7 per cent. for continuing the law as it is; of the labourers there were 87 per cent. for entire closing, 9 per cent. for closing except for two hours, and 4 per cent. for continuing the law as it is; of shopkeepers there were 83 per cent. for entire closing, 12 per cent. for closing except for two hours, and five per cent. for continuing the law as it is; of clerks there were 81 per cent. for entire closing, 13 per cent. for closing except for two hours, and 6 per cent. for continuing the law as it is; of mariners there were 84 per cent. for entire closing, 12 per cent. for closing except for two hours, and 4 per cent. for continuing the law as it is. Of the persons belonging to the higher classes, gentlemen out of business, merchants, and professionals, I find that the percentage for the total closing is very much lower than that of the working class; it is 76 per cent. of gentlemen out of business, for total closing, opposite 80 per cent. of artisans and 87 per cent. of labourers, 18 per cent. were for closing except for two hours, and 6 per cent. for continuing the law as it is; of merchants there were 76 per cent. for total closing, 19 per cent. for closing except for two hours, and 5 per cent. for continuing the law as it is; of professionals 74 per cent. were for total closing, 19 per cent. for closing except for two hours, and 7 per cent. for continuing the law as it is; of the publicans there were 60 per cent. for total closing, 13 per cent. for closing except for two hours, and 27 per cent. for continuing the law as it is; of beer-sellers there were 38 per cent. for total closing, 20 per cent. for closing except for two hours, and 42 per cent. for continuing the law as it is. I find that the highest percentages in favour of total closing are amongst labourers, mariners, and shopkeepers; and those that stand the lowest, next to the publicans and beer-sellers, are professionals, gentlemen, persons of no business, and merchants. I find that the lowest percentage in favour of opening for two hours is amongst the class of labourers; the shopkeepers come next, the mariners, artisans, and clerks being about the same percentage; whilst the percentages of publicans and beer-sellers, merchants, gentlemen out of business, and professional men stand the highest.

2892. You can assure the Committee, can you not, that the return was honestly and faithfully made?—I can.

2893. Have you any other means of knowing the views of the publicans, with regard to the closing of public-houses on the Sunday?—Yes, in connection with a recent large petition sent from Liverpool, signed by 82,000 persons, in favour of the Licensing Bill.

2894. Did that express any opinion about the Sunday?—Yes.

2895. I think you said that it was in favour of the Licensing Bill of last year, did you not?—Yes, but our petition made special reference to the Sunday question.

2896. Then your petition went beyond the proposed Licensing Bill?—The prayer of the petition was, "Your petitioners therefore pray your Honourable House that the said Bill may forthwith be passed into law, and especially that no change be made, so as to abridge the power of veto to be conferred on the inhabitants with respect to the granting of new licenses, or to extend the hours of sale on Sundays or week days, or to curtail the powers proposed to be given to corporations or local boards, with reference to the hours of sale on Sundays." The Bill gave power to corporations or local boards still farther to reduce the hours of sale on Sundays, or, if they saw fit, to close altogether on Sunday.

2897. Petitions have been very much discredited lately; have you any reason to believe that that petition was honestly signed?—I think it was. We took the utmost pains that it should be so. We gave printed instructions to our canvassers, who went about in connection with the getting up of this petition, that all persons should be requested to sign their own names; that no improper influence should be used to obtain signatures; that the signatures should be taken only from adults, or such as were competent to form a judgment; that the same persons should not sign twice, and that all adults, male and female, were at liberty to sign; and those instructions we endeavoured to carry out to the utmost of our power.

2898. Was there not a memorial to the town council or the magistrates?—Yes; on the subject of licensing public-houses.

2899. Had that reference to Sunday?—No; it had reference to the free licensing question.

2900. Have you been connected with any social efforts in Liverpool, which enable you to see the evil effects of drunkenness, especially connected with the Sunday?—Yes; I have been connected with the midnight movement, a movement for reclaiming unfortunate females; for six years I have been honorary secretary of an institution of that kind in the town.

2901. And that has given you an insight into the evil consequences of drunkenness, particularly with reference to the Sunday?—From personal conversation with those unfortunate females, I felt that in almost every instance drink was connected with their fall. I asked the matron of an institution for fallen women if she would kindly obtain from themselves how far their fall was connected with drink, and I hold in my hand her return referring to 27 cases taken, as she said, promiscuously, out of an institution which I have to do with, where there are 76 or 77 of those women. I think I am correct in saying that in almost every instance their fall is attributable to drink, or is connected with drink.

2902. Have you the means of ascertaining whether that drunkenness which gave rise to the fall of those women had any special reference to the Sunday?—No, I have not.

2903. Have you endeavoured to ascertain, by personally visiting scenes of drunkenness and vice, to confirm the views which you have just stated?—I have tried to do so. I have visited pretty nearly every department of the field of vice and crime in the town; not only prisons, but brothels, public-houses, theatres, dancing saloons, and such places, at midnight, and particularly on Saturday nights; and I am sorry to say that what I have learned otherwise appears to me to have been very strongly confirmed by what I have seen as to the terrible effects of drunkenness.

2904. You do not think that any drunkenness, especially with reference to Sunday, arises from any remissness on the part of the police, do you?—No; I have a high opinion of our police.

2905. Do you know what instructions they have with reference to the Sunday?—With reference to arresting drunkards, I know their instructions are these: "Although a constable is always to act with firmness, he is never to interfere needlessly. If a drunken person is disorderly, he is to persuade him to go home; if, however, he is riotous, and will not go, he is to call for sufficient assistance, and convey him as quietly as possible to a station."

2906. Do you know whether those instructions are more stringent in Liverpool than in other towns?—As far as I am able to learn, through communication with some one or two gentlemen, police officers of other towns, I have reason to believe that they are not more stringent.

2907. Have you paid any attention to the coroner's report as to the effects of drunkenness on Sunday?—Yes. I have a report which I received from the coroner's clerk, for three years, namely, for 1864, 1865, and 1866; and I find that of the cases in the returns of "accidental deaths," there are 143 cases of children having been suffocated, as the coroner's clerk tells us in the report of 1864, "chiefly between the Saturdays and Mondays of each week." In the report of 1865, he introduces the same class; there are 145 cases of children having been suffocated, and that "principally between the Saturday and Monday of each week." In 1866 the number is 135 cases of children suffocated, and that "principally between Saturday and Monday of each week."

2908. Are you prepared to state to the Committee any remarks which have been made by the judges of assize at Liverpool, with reference to Sunday drinking?—They have made very strong remarks with reference to drinking, ascribing the crime with which they have to deal, especially in Liverpool, to drunkenness; but with no special reference to the Sunday.

2909. Is it your opinion that the publicans as a body, in Liverpool, conduct their business respectably?—Yes, I think they do; as respectably as a business of that kind can be conducted.

2910. Have you read the Bill which is now before the Committee?—Yes.

2911. Do you approve of the principle of the Bill, as far as regards entirely closing on Sunday for consumption on the premises?—I approve of the Bill as an instalment, but I should certainly prefer entire closing.

2912. Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen.] Then your canvass was with a view to total closing, was it not?—The canvass was instituted for the purpose of ascertaining simply the opinion of the householders upon the subject.

2913. But the object of those who instituted the canvass was to obtain total closing, was it not?—The object is stated in this clause of the forms, if you will allow me to read it: "That as this is not a movement in favour of any sect or party, whether political or religious, but for the comfort and happiness of all classes of society, it is particularly and respectfully desired that all persons will try to make the result as complete as possible, in order to have a full and fair expression of public opinion on the subject of Sunday closing." To show the strict impartiality with which the canvass was conducted I respectfully beg that the Committee will allow me to hand in the following paper. It is a complete copy of the canvass form used. A form was left at each house and called for by the canvasser two or three days afterwards:

Every Householder, Male or Female, is respectfully requested to sign.
Form No. 1.

To be signed by those in favour of Sunday Closing.

I am in favour of an Act of Parliament requiring all persons engaged in the Sale of Intoxicating Drinks, to Close their places of business on the whole of Sunday.

I further express my desire that in any law to be passed for Liverpool to regulate the Licensing of Public Houses and and Beer Shops, a clause for Closing all such Shops on Sundays be inserted.

In order to have a full and fair expression of public opinion on the subject of Sunday Closing, it is earnestly requested—

First—That each person receiving a paper will Sign it, and have it ready when called for.

Second—That as this is not a movement in favour of any sect or party, whether political or religious, but for the comfort and happiness of all classes of Society, it is particularly and respectfully desired that all persons will try to make the result as complete as possible.

2914. I gather from your figures, that whereas a very large per-centage of the Liverpool people are in favour of total closing, and some considerable per-centage are in favour of keeping the law as it is, the proportion is very small who wish to have the public-houses open for a few hours only on the Sunday, and to have the law relaxed only in the direction of this Bill?—I do not think it is large; I think that the proportion in favour of total closing is enormously in excess.

2915. Therefore the public opinion of Liverpool would in no degree be satisfied with this Bill?—They would be very much pleased with it, I think.

2916. Still they would prefer total closing?—Yes.

2917. They would only take this as an instalment?—I cannot say what further steps they might be prepared to take, but they certainly desire total closing.

2918. You have said, have you not, that you would accept this Bill as an instalment, but as by no means a settlement of the question?—I cannot say how far it might effect a settlement of the question.

2919. With regard to the suffocation of children between Saturday and Monday, that would include all the children who are suffocated on Saturday night, would it not?—I believe it would.

2920. Would it not probably be the case that a very large per-centage of those children would be suffocated, as the result of that drinking on Saturday night, which we know to be very considerable?—No doubt some would.

2921. In point of fact do you differ from the general opinion, that it is on the night on which the wages are paid that the drinking takes place?—The drinking, in my mind, takes place upon the Sunday in connection with two matters; first, that they have the money; and secondly, that they have time and the day at their disposal. If the places were closed upon the day which they have at their disposal, then it would not be possible for them to abuse the money; and I think by the Monday they would be at their work, probably, for the next week.

2922. If the wages were paid upon some other night of the week, say, on Wednesday night, do you not think that the temptation would be less to spend their money in drinking on the Lord's-day?—I think that would be an improvement, and I have advocated it.

2923. With respect to this Bill; looking at the particular hours during which public-houses are proposed to be kept open (that is to say, from one till half-past two, and from eight till 10) is it your opinion that those are the hours most convenient to the Liverpool public that they should be kept open?—If they are to be left open during any hours I suppose they are the most convenient.

2924. Do you think that altering the time of closing to 10 instead of 11 would be a very great improvement?—Yes; I think it is desirable.

2925. Mr. John Abel Smith.] Do you know anything of the wishes and feelings of the working men at Liverpool upon the subject of restriction?—I should not, like to speak to the wishes and feelings of the working men at other places than Liverpool; I have not had the same opportunity of testing their opinions.

2926. I need hardly ask you, if the wishes of the working men in Liverpool are such as you state, whether you would apprehend any disorder, or confusion, or difficulty, in carrying out a change in the law?—I should apprehend no difficulty whatever beyond the inconvenience which, to a certain extent, will arise from any change of habit or custom, but nothing that would be serious.

2927. I meant anything in the nature of public disturbance?—No, certainly not.

2928. You have a very large number of Irish at Liverpool, have you not?—Yes.

2929. Are any of those included in that canvass?—There are not, in proportion, many of them, probably, who are householders: but one section of the canvass was directed to a district of the town, occupied almost entirely by Irish, and those Irish of the very humblest class. This I did not read, but if you wish I can give you the results of that table. We call it the Marybone district. There is a total of returns amounting to 2,801; of those the number of labourers is 1,977, and of those 1,687 were in favour of total closing; in favour of closing, except for two hours, 131; and against any change in the law 159. There is a total of artisans of 463, as against 1,977 labourers, which will show you the character of the district; it is one in which the police go in pairs; and of those artisans 352 were in favour of total closing, 56 of closing, except for two hours, and 55 against any change in the law; the total number of shopkeepers was 235, of which 182 were for total closing, 33 for closing, except for two hours, and 20 against any change in the law; these three classes account for 2,675 out of the 2,801 in the district, the shopkeepers being generally persons of a very humble class indeed, and they might almost all be reckoned amongst the labouring population.

2930. And even amongst this Irish population a very large proportion were in favour of further restriction?—Yes; not only a very large proportion, but the canvasser of that district made returns as to the willingness of the people to receive him, the readiness with which they signed the papers, and the extent to which those papers were signed, more favourable than in almost any other district of the town.

2931. Did the Roman Catholic priests take any part in helping in that canvass?—They were favourable, I believe, but they took no active part in helping it.

2932. As I understand your opinion, they are strictly in favour of the total closing of public-houses on Sunday?—Yes.

2933. Should you suggest such a law for London?—I am not sufficiently acquainted with the circumstances of London to answer such a question.

2934. You do not know whether it would be possible or not to do so?—No.

2935. But with regard to the large towns in Lancashire, do you think it would be acceptable to them?—I think with regard to the large towns in Lancashire and throughout England, so far as I have had an opportunity of knowing, it would be very acceptable.

2936. Do you think that there is as strong a feeling in favour of closing in Liverpool as elsewhere?—Yes. I was not aware that there was that feeling before our canvass. The impression was that the public were strongly against it until we made the canvass, which showed that the opposite was the result.

2937. You do not think that the provisions of the Bill which is referred to this Committee are so restrictive as to excite opposition or resistance?—I think not; not out of London, I think; as to London I cannot speak.

2938. But you wish to see it successful?—I should like to see the Bill successful so far.

2939. As an instalment?—As a step in the right direction.

2940. Have you had any public meetings at Liverpool in favour of closing?—Yes, in favour of entire closing.

2941. What sort of meetings were they?—Enormous meetings, crowding our largest buildings; crowding St. George's Hall, and attended perhaps by 5,000 persons.

2942. Who was in the chair?—Mr. Horsfall.

2943. Was there a general expression of opinion in favour of total closing?—Yes. In fact, on the day on which we held our first meeting in St. George's Hall, our largest building in Liverpool, we were obliged to take a neighbouring hall in order to accommodate the people who could not be crammed into St. George's Hall.

2944. How long ago was this?—This was in 1863.

2945. And you have no reason to believe that there has been any change of opinion since?—No, I do not think there has.

2946. Does your knowledge extend to Birkenhead?—Not very much personally.

2947. Do you believe that the same feeling exists in Birkenhead as in Liverpool?—Yes.

2948. Mr. Horsfall.] Was there not a canvass, upon the same principle, in Birkenhead?—Yes; and the opinion was quite as strong in Birkenhead as in Liverpool.

2949. Mr. Baines.] You have spoken of cases of prostitution being traceable to drinking. I would ask you whether the cases of fallen women exist chiefly amongst those classes who have the leisure and the opportunity of going out on the Sunday chiefly; that is to say, among female servants and others whose chief day of leisure is Sunday?—That I cannot undertake to answer I should be inclined to think that it is so, but I cannot answer it positively.

2950. As you suppose that that is the day on which those young women who have fallen have chiefly an opportunity of being out and drinking, do you suppose that we must therefore ascribe, as a necessary consequence, a considerable number of the cases such as you speak of to the habit of drinking on Sunday?—I believe that the connection of those parties and their fall with drink arises from the circumstance of their being led to take drink in order to stupefy them, and that they are thereby induced to do that which otherwise they would not do. How far it is connected with Sunday I am not prepared to say.

2951. Chairman.] You have told the Committee that you are sorry to say that you believe Liverpool to be one of the most drunken towns in the kingdom?—I believe Liverpool to be the most drunken town in England, but not in Scotland. I believe Glasgow is worse.

2952. Glasgow and Liverpool have a great many features in common, have they not; for instance, in the nature of the population, the proportion of Irish, the number of dock labourers, and many features of that sort?—Yes; they have some features in common in the population, but with regard to the facilities for drinking, I should think they have not so many features in common; for example, they have no beer-houses in Glasgow.

2953. But I said with regard to the character of the population, they have much in common?—Yes, to some extent; we have a large Irish population, and so have they.

2954. But although it is your opinion that it is the most drunken town in England, still you have found a vast majority of the inhabitants, so far as the canvass has gone, in favour of having the sale of liquor much restricted, or altogether stopped on Sunday?—I have had large opportunities of meeting with working men, and I have invariably, as far as I could, brought up this matter, and I have found not only the sober and temperate, and religious portion of the population, but as far as I am able honestly to form an opinion, I believe that the section of the population addicted to drunkenness, would be the section that probably would be most grateful for the temptation being taken out of their way.

2955. As a great many of those who profess themselves to be in favour of restrictions might be those who are themselves the offenders, do you think that it is in the hope that they will be saved from themselves that they are asking for further restrictions?—Yes; I think that they would be glad to have temptation put out of their way, and be saved from themselves.

2956. Is it the case, as I think the Committee have been told by other witnesses, that there are very few excursions made from Liverpool to the country on the scale upon which they are made from London?—I rather think not. I think that excursions are made rather to Liverpool than from it.

2957. The practice is not extensive of persons leaving Liverpool for the day, during Sunday, in large numbers?—I am not aware that it is, except going across the river.

2958. Do a great number of persons go across the river?—A very large number.

2959. Do they get into the country by that means, or do they merely go to Birkenhead?—Birkenhead is the country; they go to the other side of the river, to Birkenhead and Rock Ferry, and New Brighton, and such places.

2960. It is for the sake of getting into the country then, is it not?—Probably it is.

2961. But do you think that that is a practice resorted to to any large extent?—I do not know that it is a common practice; I should think that it is less a practice with us possibly than it is in some other districts.

2962. Do you think that it would be fair to connect the two things which have been so spoken to, namely, that the people do not get away into the country on Sunday, but that they do resort to drinking to a very great extent?—I do not know that.

2963. We have had the two opposite acts directly connected by witnesses speaking of London, that in proportion as excursions have increased, the amount of drunkenness coming under the cognizance of the police has diminished. I think that was the evidence of the Commissioner of Police in London, and others; do you think that it would be fair to connect the two opposite facts in Liverpool?—I cannot say; I have associated in my own mind the drunkenness of the town on Sundays, with the fact that we have such an enormous number of temptations to people there to get drunk.

2964. But there are very few means of persons amusing themselves, as so very many will do on Sunday, except by resorting to those injurious means of amusement?—We have very large opportunities of amusement about Liverpool, if it be a fit thing for Sunday; we have the river, and we have the new parks that are being made on a very extensive scale; I think we have opportunities of amusing the people without excursions around Liverpool, perhaps as great as in many other places.

2965. Have you parks readily accessible in various part of the town?—Some of those parks are not yet opened, but we have three very large parks which are in the course of preparation for the people.

2966. But hitherto the people have not yet had ready access to the parks in Liverpool?—No, not so far as the parks are concerned; there is the Prince's Park, but the river is our great attraction; everyone goes down to the landing stage and crosses the river; if I had known that you intended to ask me such questions I could have procured the actual number who crossed the river on Good Friday last, because it was brought before me recently, and it was a very large number indeed.

2967. Can you say that drinking prevails greatly amongst excursionists, and those who cross the river, for example?—In visiting the public-houses on Saturday nights, I was very much struck with the circumstance that I saw an immense number of young married women with marriage rings on their fingers, and their husbands and their children there, which led me to believe that excursions and such like things were not matters that were mainly connected with our drunkenness.

2968. But would you say, in fact, rather the reverse?—I cannot say that.

2969. Should you say, as you have paid so much attention to the subject, that the drunkenness which prevails to so great an extent in Liverpool, arises from the drinking of spirits?—The men drink ale, I think, largely, and the women drink gin or spirits.

2970. But you think that there is a great deal of spirit drinking?—Yes, a good deal with women, and drunkenness is on the increase with them, I fear very much.

2971. Mr. Horsfall.] Do you not consider that drunkenness is in some degree caused by our having a large what we call a floating population in Liverpool; a number of seamen and men of that character who will take a little more than they ought?—I have heard that remark, and thought it over, but I could never see its force for this reason, that I think the persons brought up for drunkenness do not justify the statement that they are of that class; it is to some extent, no doubt, connected with our seafaring population, who come in having a good deal of money, but I think scarcely to the extent that has been supposed.

2972. Mr. Frederick Stanley.] With reference to one answer which you gave just now, you stated that you considered the great cause of drinking on Sunday and also on Saturday night was from the combination of leisure and the money which was then in the hands of the working classes. Liverpool containing a large floating population of seamen, do you not consider that that cause of drunkenness, if it be one, exists in a greater proportion amongst the class of seamen than amongst any other class of the community, that is to say, that they have more money and more leisure at that one time than any other class in the community?—Yes, so far that may be so, but our seafaring population in the town of Liverpool alone, after all, I think, will not account for our enormous drunkenness.

ROBERTSON GLADSTONE, Esq., called in; and Examined.

2973. Chairman.] You have kindly offered, I believe, to give some evidence before this Committee?—I have.

2974. You are aware of the provisions of the Bill which has been referred to the Committee, are you not?—Yes, I understand that it is proposed to curtail the hours on Sunday to four during the day for public-houses being open, from half-past 12 till half-past two and from eight to 10.

2975. And that during those hours they shall not be open, except for the sale of liquor to be consumed off the premises?—Yes, that is what I understand.

2976. As a magistrate of Liverpool the operation of the present liquor law has come very much under your notice, I presume?—A great deal.
0.69.

R. Gladstone,
Esq.

2977. Have you heard the evidence of the last witness?—I have heard a portion of it only.

2978. Would you state whether in your opinion there is a great amount of drunkenness in Liverpool on Sunday?—There is no doubt a great amount of drunkenness in Liverpool on Sunday, during the evening. I am not aware how it would compare with other places. The drinking is not so much during the day. You may walk through Liverpool, as I have done frequently, through all the leading streets, and you will not see a drunken person; but, in the evening, I believe, it is very different; indeed I know it to be so.

2979. Is it your opinion that if the hours of opening public-houses were considerably shortened, especially in the evening, it would reduce the amount of drunkenness?—I think it would, to a certain extent; I have always held the opinion, as far as I have had the means of forming one, that you cannot reduce drunkenness by legislation, to any amount; but as regards the Sabbath-day it is entirely different; I think that if it can be protected it should be so from any abuse; and there would be this advantage, that the families of about 1,500 publicans would feel themselves more at liberty on Sunday, and possibly some relief might be given to our police force, who are more or less directly or indirectly occupied with matters arising from squabbles and fighting, and so forth, connected with public-houses.

2980. It would, therefore, be more particularly because you think that the law at present does not protect the publican, that you would like to see the public-houses closed on Sunday?—I am not aware of any complaint that the publican has of the law not protecting him, but I think that drunkenness goes on on Sunday evening, which ought not to be tolerated.

2981. But do you think that drunkenness would be much reduced if the public-houses were closed, as proposed by this Bill?—To some extent; but I do not attach, as many do, very great importance to that principle, because I have always held the opinion, derived from practical experience, that it is not from the number of public-houses that drunkenness ensues; if every public-house, a mile of space intervening between it and any other public-house, there would be just the same amount of drinking; wherever the love of drink exists, distance becomes a minor object altogether; the appetite craves for it, and people will have it.

2982. If the houses were closed, except to travellers, or except to persons purchasing and taking away drink, are you of opinion that people who are craving for drink would avail themselves of the loophole?—A change of this description would, no doubt, throw difficulties in the way of their obtaining drink, and to that extent I think it might produce good; but when you consider that amongst the poorer of the working classes their wages are paid to them on Friday and Saturday, if they are determined to have drink they would purchase it on those days, and lay in liquor to last during the entirety of Sunday; therefore, in that point of view, although I am not prepared to believe that the community of Liverpool would accept a measure, so far as they are concerned, which would at once close the public-houses entirely, I do think that if they were closed ultimately entirely it would be a great advantage.

2983. In the meantime, do you think that the provisions of this Bill would be likely to do good, and would be accepted willingly by the population of Liverpool?—I do not think that the community of Liverpool would oppose this measure certainly as a body; there are exceptions; there are those who think that there ought to be no change, and some who I daresay would be of opinion that drink should flow down the streets, but they are a minority.

2984. On the whole you think it would be accepted?—I believe it would.

2985. Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen.] With regard to giving relief to the police, would it not be the fact that if all the public-houses were closed in Liverpool, the duty of the police to watch and prevent illicit drinking in improper houses and private houses would be very much increased?—That is on a very small scale; I have seen a great deal of that sort of business when brought before the Bench, and I have observed that those who are occupied in that particular duty are few in number.

2986. But supposing that this restriction were carried into effect, would not the drinking in private houses be likely to be so much increased as very much to increase the duties of the police in its prevention?—Not to any serious extent; the number of officers who bring those cases before us is very small indeed. I suppose our police are now about 1,200. I think that on Wednesday, the court-day, once a week, when those cases are heard, there may be from 10 to 20 officers engaged in making those complaints.

2987. Were you in Liverpool at the time that this active canvass took place to ascertain the opinion of the community, which has been alluded to by the previous witness?—Yes, I was.

2988. May I ask whether you registered your opinion in favour of total closing?—No, I did not; I do not reside in the borough; I am four or five miles from it.

2989. Do you think that the Liverpool public would be satisfied with the restrictions proposed in this Bill?—I do; I believe that the bench of magistrates would be very nearly unanimous upon the point.

2990. But would the public?—I think the public would make no complaint, because on the Sunday the bulk of the working-classes and mechanics find their way out of town; many of them make excursions, the larger proportion of them on the river, going to various places on the Cheshire coast, Eastham and so on.

2991. Do you agree with the last witness that this measure would be accepted as an instalment, or do you think the public would be satisfied with it?—I think it would be accepted as an instalment, very probably with the ulterior view of seeing the public-houses closed altogether on Sunday.

2992. Then to a large number of persons who have got their capital invested in public-houses, it would be no use to accept this as a settlement of the question; they would still be exposed to ulterior agitation?—I believe that the proportion of business done in the bulk of the public-houses in Liverpool on Sunday as compared with week days is infinitesimal; it is very small indeed; I know that many publicans, if the false impression on their mind did not exist that their weekly business would be injured, would be delighted to close altogether on Sunday.

2993. May we not carry it further and say that the drunkenness which occurs on Sunday in Liverpool is infinitesimal as compared with the rest of the week?—Saturday night is the great night for drunkenness, not Sunday morning.

2994. Does not that result from the fact that wages are paid on Saturday night?—The practice of paying wages on Friday is very general now; the corporation and the docks, the two largest employers of labour almost in Liverpool, do so; the corporation, I know, pay on Friday.

2995. Do you think that if the wages of labourers were paid on Wednesday instead of Saturday,

Saturday, the drunkenness on Sunday would be as much prevented as by the restriction of this Bill?—No, I do not think that that would make any difference; the causes of drunkenness, as far as my experience has led me to know, are very numerous; drunkenness is not alone inherent, or born in the constitution of a person; an uncomfortable house, a bad husband or mother, foul air and gases in the immediate locality, a too densely located population in one particular quarter, badly drained houses, a pestilential atmosphere, sorrow in the family, death, and all those causes, more or less, though unjustifiable, no doubt produce drunkenness, and in time of course that which begins as a matter of very small moment, becomes as bad as possible.

2996. I think I may take it as your opinion that if a person has really contracted drinking habits, whether this Bill passed or whether it did not pass he would have his drink on Sunday somehow or other?—He would have it in some way or other; I have no doubt about that.

2997. If that is true, are there not a very large class of persons who might be materially inconvenienced by such a restriction, who have the strength of mind to resist temptation?—I think not; I think that four hours would be ample for every purpose.

2998. You would advocate a restriction of the hours and not the total closing?—For the present, certainly.

2999. Mr. Yorke.] In your opinion, is there anything exceptional in the state of Liverpool as regards the causes which produce drunkenness compared with any other large town?—No; Liverpool, as a large sea-port, having daily arrivals of seamen and others coming from abroad, must, and always will have, I believe, an unfortunate pre-eminence in that way; because, until the sailors and those connected with shipping are better educated, the practice will be general, and the first thing a man who has been absent on a long voyage does on arriving at Liverpool is to get tipsy; he exchanges a glass of something with a friend, then one glass leads to another, and then trouble ensues.

3000. If excursion trains or things of that kind, enabling people to get amusement away from the public-houses were encouraged on the Sunday, do you believe that that would lead to a decrease in the amount of drunkenness?—I think that the Sunday is better kept than it was; the corporation are very largely engaged in the formation of parks; something like 1,000 acres of ground are now being converted into parks in different parts of the town; one park, a small one of about 20 acres is completed and thrown open to the public, and the number who crowd that park on a Sunday and who formerly never got out of their little back streets or their own houses, is astounding.

3001. Mr. John Abel Smith.] I understand you to express yourself generally in favour of the provisions of the Bill that is referred to the Committee?—Yes.

3002. And you do that, although your general opinions have been understood to be very much in favour of the absence of restriction?—I have been in favour always of free trade, and I have found that the free-trade principle, as far as I can form a judgment, has answered admirably.

3003. Do you know anything of the state of feeling of the working classes in reference to restrictions in other parts of Lancashire?—No, I do not; but I know Liverpool perhaps as well as any one can know it.

3004. Without going into detailed figures, generally speaking you believe that such a law as this would be quietly received in Liverpool?—I do.

3005. As a magistrate, you would have no fear of public disturbance resulting from it?—Not in the least degree.

3006. And you will probably endorse the opinion which has been expressed by so many, that drunkenness and crime have the closest possible connection?—Very close indeed, unfortunately.

3007. Mr. Baines.] Are you personally acquainted with Dr. White, and with any of the gentlemen who took part with him in the canvass?—I know Dr. White perfectly well as a gentleman who has held a high position in the community at Liverpool, and has taken a very warm interest in this matter. He differs very much from me in some points, but he has written with great warmth and force in the public journals, with the best intention.

3008. From your knowledge of his character, and of the characters of those who are associated with him, should you attach confidence to the returns which he has presented?—Yes, I think so; I think that neither Dr. White nor any gentleman connected with him would be any party to anything like misrepresentation.

3009. Mr. Locke.] You stated, did you not, that most of the working classes made their way out of town on Sunday?—A great many do now.

3010. And that drinking on the Sunday is infinitesimal in comparison with any other day?—Yes; that is, taking Sunday as a whole.

3011. Such being the case, that very few persons at the present time are anxious to avail themselves of the use of public-houses on the Sunday in Liverpool, of course it would not much affect them?—No.

3012. And therefore Liverpool being in that condition, that drinking on Sundays is infinitesimal, and that persons get their drink somewhere else out of town, it is perfectly immaterial whether this Bill in any sense is carried or not so far as Liverpool is concerned?—No; I would support this Bill if it was only to give, what it would do I think, namely, some relief to the families of the publicans who have always made it a matter of complaint. They are a very respectable body of men, the great bulk of them. They may form wrong ideas like other people, and I may be wrong, but I think it would give great relief to their establishments.

3013. Then you would pass this Bill for the sake of the publicans, and not for the sake of the public at large?—Yes, I think they are more interested in it themselves than even the public at large.

SIR JAMES FERGUSSON, BART., IN THE CHAIR.

DARNTON LUPTON, Esq., called in; and Examined.

D. Lupton,
Esq.

1868.

3014. Mr. Baines.] I BELIEVE you carry on business as a Cloth Merchant in Leeds, and have resided there all your life?—That is so.

3015. You have also been for many years President of the Leeds Chamber of Commerce, and that has made you acquainted, has it not, with the various branches of industry in Leeds and its neighbourhood?—Yes.

3016. I believe I am correct in saying that you have been 30 years a borough magistrate, and several years a magistrate of the West Riding of Yorkshire, and have taken a very active part in both those capacities?—Yes, I have.

3017. You have also filled the office of mayor, have you not?—Yes.

3018. Have you taken an active part in the general administration of the law in petty sessions, and have you had your attention for some years past especially directed to the question of Sunday drinking in public-houses and beer-houses?—Yes; in Leeds it is the practice for the magistrates to visit the houses of all persons who are applying for spirit licenses. The large mass of the applicants are beer-house keepers, and having year by year, for 30 years, visited these houses, I have become acquainted with a large number of that class of the community.

3019. I am not wrong, I believe, in saying that when you were mayor of Leeds you also went somewhat out of the common way in order to visit the public-houses, especially at night?—That was before the passing of the Act which closed the public-houses until half-past 12 on the Sunday. On several occasions I went during the night at two and three o'clock in the morning before the passing of that Act, in order to see the condition of the licensed victualling houses, and I found, as we may naturally suppose, that many of them were in a very sad state; there were large numbers of people at that untimely hour drinking in licensed victualling houses.

3020. Mr. John Abel Smith.] That was not against the law, was it?—There was nothing in the law then against it, but since then the law closing public-houses up to half-past 12 on Sunday has been passed.

3021. Mr. Baines.] Do you think that the passing of that law and of that restriction was a benefit to society?—It was most beneficent; and not only to the public generally, but also to the people who frequent those houses, but more especially to the licensed victuallers and beer-house keepers themselves; in fact, they all admit, and I have never heard a difference of opinion, that that Act has been a great boon to all persons of that class.

3022. Can you tell us how many drinking-houses there are in the borough of Leeds?—We have in the borough of Leeds 377 licensed victualling houses where spirits are sold; we have 750 beer-houses licensed by the Excise, and, in addition to that, we have 160 refreshment houses; but they, perhaps, scarcely come within the sphere of the inquiry of the Committee.

3023. Can you describe what a refreshment house is?—A coffee-house.

3024. What is the population of the borough of Leeds, for which you now speak?—It was in the last census about 200,000 to 210,000, and it is at the present time probably from 220,000 to 230,000.

3025. I believe you take a lively interest in the welfare of the working classes generally, and that you were one of the founders, and have been many years the president and sole manager, of the Leeds Working Men's Institute?—That is so.

3026. Is that a large and important institution?—Very. It contains many hundred members. Of course the number depends upon the attractiveness of the week's entertainment; but we have always had from 500 to 600 members, and very frequently it runs up to 1,500, when it has been a very attractive week. The members pay a penny admission for the week, which entitles them to all the privileges of the institution.

3027. At present it is composed, is it not, entirely of working men?—Purely so.

3028. Have you also, as a supplement to that, an institution for boys?—Yes, we had some time ago.

3029. What are the arrangements which you provide for Sunday in this Working Men's Institute?—The rooms are open from two o'clock on Sunday afternoon till nine o'clock at night, but they are open to anyone, free of charge; the Sunday papers and the better class of books are on the tables; novels and the lighter class of literature are put aside, so that, as far as we can, the Sunday afternoon books and papers are suitable to the day.

3030. I think I am not wrong in saying that the persons connected with that institute have recognised your services publicly, and presented a public testimonial to you, at which I had the pleasure of being present?—It was so. They presented presented me with a beautifully illuminated address, signed by 1,716 members of the Institute.

3031. You are acquainted, are you not, with the Bill concerning which this Committee is now sitting, the Sunday Liquor Bill?—Yes, I am.

3032. Do you know what opinion the working men, so many of whom have come under your observation, have formed of this Bill?—Since the Bill was introduced into the House I placarded the town of Leeds with a notice of a meeting at the Working Men's Institute, calling their attention to the Bill that was introduced into the House by Mr. Abel Smith and Mr. Baines, and a meeting of 400 to 500 working men took place; they were all working men, and I explained the provisions of the Bill and asked for a discussion, and questions to be asked, and there was a discussion and questions were asked, and then a resolution was proposed, that, in the opinion of this meeting this Bill was calculated to be of great value to the working men of Leeds; I put that motion to the vote and every hand in the room seemed to be held up for it, and when I put the contrary one single hand was held up.

3033. And that was the result of a meeting at which there had been considerable discussion?—Yes, at least there was some discussion; we could not get anybody to oppose it; the difficulty was in finding any opponent to this measure.

3034. Mr. Roebuck.] There really was no opponent in the room, was there?—There were one or two; for instance, I was asked this question: Mr. Chairman, is it a fair thing that you should deprive us working men of the privileges which you have yourself? and I said that this Bill would affect me as it would affect them, that I could no more go into the Queen's Hotel and get a glass of wine on Sunday if this Bill were passed, than any one of them could go into a beer-house; they then referred to my club, and on that I said there is not the slightest difficulty in the world in a hundred men like yourselves forming yourselves into a club; I am sure you would conduct it properly if you did, and you would do what we do in our clubs; but I went on to say that my experience of my club, composed of above 300 members, was, that I never once saw, when troops were not quartered in our town, four gentlemen in the club at one time on Sunday, and that is my experience for many years.

3035. Mr. Baines.] I think I may say that, from your residence and from your duties as magistrate, and from the locality of your club, you have not very unfrequently been led to call there yourself on Sunday, so that your opinion is of some value upon that subject?—It is so; I have some duties to discharge, and have frequently gone and got a cup of coffee there on my way to my place of worship, that is why I go there more frequently than some other people do.

3036. May I ask, with regard to this meeting, which you say was held, and at which it has struck the Honourable Member for Sheffield that only one single person was present who was opposed to the bill, was it called generally, or was it called of those alone who favoured the bill?—It was addressed "Working Men's Institute.—A meeting will be held to discuss the provisions of a Bill for the partial closing of beer houses, and public-houses, and to pass such resolutions as the meeting may determine upon."

3037. Mr. Yorke.] The meeting consisted of members of the Working Men's Institute only?—Yes, but every one can become a member by 0.69.

payment of 1*d.* No one could come into the room unless they were members, but on all important questions I may say, in answer to the Honourable Member, persons pay 1*d.* to come in and discuss any social question that we have before us, for instance, on the subject of strikes, persons will come and pay 1*d.*, simply to come and discuss the question on any particular night.

3038. Mr. Knatchbull Hugessen.] How many members are there altogether of the Working Men's Institute?—There were between 400 and 500 in the room that night; probably there would be 700 altogether.

3039. Mr. Baines.) Do you mean on the occasion of lectures and peculiar attractions?—Concerts and musical entertainments possess peculiar attractions to working men, and they would be there in large numbers.

3040. Of course you mean on week days?—Yes, entirely.

3041. Will you state whether you have reason to know what the opinion of the magistrates of Leeds generally is concerning this Bill?—A meeting of the magistrates was held, and I was authorised by them to express their opinion that this Bill would be of great value to the town of Leeds.

3042. Was that an unanimous opinion?—There was one dissentient.

3043. Was the subject discussed?—It was at some length, and was thoroughly well understood.

3044. Did those magistrates include the persons who give licenses at the Brewster sessions and those who attend to the administration of the law with regard to them?—Yes.

3045. Do you consider that the Act which closed all drinking-houses from twelve on Saturday night to half-past twelve on Sunday has been of great advantage?—It was a most admirable measure, and it has operated most beneficially; I know of no general Act upon the subject of drinking which has operated so beneficially upon all classes as that Act has done.

3046. If you were to select any class of society and to say that it had done them more good than any other, what class would you select?—I should say the publicans and beer-house keepers themselves, because it has operated in every way beneficially to them. It gives them an opportunity of having half the day on Sunday to themselves, and it gives them the opportunity, which many of them embrace, of attending places of worship, and it has acted in every way advantageously to them.

3047. Do any of the drinking establishments in Leeds close altogether on Sundays?—Several of the largest establishments; and they have been most prosperous. I state, from my own knowledge, derived from the people themselves, that they do close entirely on Sunday, and that they have been very prosperous; eight or 10 of the largest that we have in the town are never opened on Sunday.

3048. Is this the experience of some years?—This has been for many years in the case of some of them.

3049. Have you heard any publicans or beer-sellers express an opinion upon the desirableness of closing their establishments on Sunday?—I have heard scores of them say that if it was only the law they should be delighted to have a total closing on the Sunday; and when I have naturally enough said, "But why not close yourself?" They have said, "We should lose our weekday customers customers altogether if we would not give them, or could not give them, on Sunday, the refreshment which they could get elsewhere; but if it was the law for all to be closed we should be delighted." I have heard that from many scores of them.

3050. With regard to those who are in the habit of attending public-houses, what particular class should you think are most injured by Sunday drinking?—Of all the classes of the community, young women are most damaged by it, and for this simple reason, that in a town like Leeds, where all the men and women, and almost the children, are at work in the factories, or in some industrial occupation, the young women work till the evening, and then on weekdays they go home, and have household duties to attend to, mending their clothes and washing; and as a rule, they do not go into drinking-houses on weekdays, and do not put on their Sunday garments, but on Sunday, naturally enough, the women like to put on their best things, and then it is that they can meet their sweethearts, and too many of them were in the habit of frequenting the public-houses and beer-houses; but 15 or 16 months ago the town council of the borough of Leeds got introduced into the local Act a clause giving the power to the magistrates, if they saw fit, to prevent any music on the Sunday, and the result was that the magistrates very soon put that law into operation, and the number of young women in public-houses and beer houses has wonderfully decreased. In fact, it was not the attraction of the drink, but it was the company, the attraction of the music and meeting their sweethearts that induced them to go there. That Act, I believe, has been one of the restrictive measures which has worked admirably in the town of Leeds.

3051. Then that provision enabling the magistrates to put down Sunday music is in a local Act, and is not the general law of the land?—That is so.

3052. The general law of the land allows, does it not, the performance of music as an attraction in public-houses on Sunday evening?—That is so.

3053. And you believe that its general operation is exceedingly injurious, and especially upon the characters of young women?—I have not the slightest doubt about it.

3054. What in your opinion is the effect of Sunday drinking upon working men?—The thing is patent in a town like Leeds; the large mass of men who are not of the first class of working men go to the public-house, on the Saturday. Many drink on the Saturday night, and then as soon as the hour of half-past 12 on Sunday comes, unfortunately many of them go into the public-houses, and they will be there on and off during the whole of the Sunday afternoon till 11 at night, when they are turned out; and then if not positively drunk, they are in such a state of muzziness, that they are unfitted for work the next day. I have ascertained by personal inquiries from the large employers of labour in Leeds, that their own works suffer materially, because of the drinking on the Sunday. Men do not get to their work on Monday morning at 6 o'clock as they ought to do, and this, naturally enough, particularly applies to those trades or occupations in which they are not dependent upon the movement of machinery. In our large mills, where they are obliged to be there, or are turned off, there is a good deal of regularity established amongst them; but in such trades as joiners, blacksmiths, whitesmiths, and bricklayers, and all that class of occupation wherever men work piecework, and where they are not dependent upon machinery, you will find that the broken time is on the Monday morning, and unfortunately that extends sometimes over the whole of Monday and to other days. I had a practical illustration of it this day fortnight. We have a small committee of magistrates, whose duty it is, whenever any structural alterations are required in the licensed victuallers' houses in the town of Leeds, to go and see what those proposed changes are. This day fortnight, with two other members of the committee, I went into a licensed victualler's house, and after doing what we had to do, I entered into a room where there were half-a-dozen men drinking, and I said, "What are you about my lads, are you out of work?" One man said, "Nay, sir." I said "What is it then?" Then, hesitating a moment, he said, "To speak the truth, we were drinking yesterday." I said, "That is very stupid work." "It is, sir," he said. One young man, who was a very respectable looking man, said, "Yes, I have taken the pledge several times, and I am sorry to say I have not had strength of mind to keep it; if I could have kept it, I should have been worth many hundreds of pounds, sir; but I am not as bad at this drinking as the man that you first spoke to." I said, "How is that?" He said, "He was brought up for a minister, and he passed five examinations at the Council of Education, and he got many certificates; but he is now a bricklayer's labourer." That conversation occurred this day fortnight.

3055. Those were men who had been drinking on the Sunday, and whom you found there on the Monday?—Yes; a fortnight ago this morning.

3056. This you give as an illustration of what you believe frequently takes place?—Certainly I do; it is no exceptional case; it is a case which does occur, unfortunately, too often.

3057. Do you believe that if there were a complete break on Sunday, and the attraction of the temptation was taken away on Sunday, it would operate generally in favour of temperance?—I am perfectly sure about it; if there was a break on Sunday the men would come to themselves, and they would not be so utterly benighted as to go and sacrifice a part of their time on the week day?—It would be beneficent in its operation, I am sure.

3058. Your business as merchant makes you well acquainted, does it not, with the populous clothing villages round about your borough?—Yes.

3059. Do you know what the effect of Sunday drinking upon the working classes is in those clothing villages?—I do not know it to the same extent as in Leeds; but I know perfectly well that they are very much addicted to drinking, and it unfortunately operates very prejudicially in this way: they are hand-loom weavers, and, consequently, having their work at their own homes, they are not dependent upon machinery, and I find the drinking prevails to a greater extent than in many trades in Leeds.

3060. Do you know that the habit of Sunday drinking prevails much there, and that it interferes with their industry on the Monday and the rest of the week?—Yes, it does so.

3061. Have

3061. Have you had occasion to know whether the employers of labour generally wish to see the restrictions proposed by the present Bill with regard to facilities for drinking on Sunday become law?—I have spoken to a great many, and some of them representative men in almost every class, and there is a complete concurrence of opinion that it would be a most desirable measure. Many of them deplore that good minds do often give way to drinking on the Sunday, and are unable to come to their work on the Monday morning, and that they have to turn them off occasionally as an example to the other men.

3062. Do you think, viewing the thing coolly, that there are advantages arising from Sunday drinking which might overbalance the disadvantages of which you speak?—No, I cannot conceive of any; I know of none.

3063. You believe that the men and their families would be better and happier if Sunday drinking were entirely suppressed?—It is a proposition about which any man acquainted with the working classes could not have the slightest doubt.

3064. I believe you have statistics with regard to the number of cases of persons brought up for being drunk and disorderly on the various days of the week, but I wish previously to ask you whether you give any instructions to the police with regard to persons found in the streets drunk, which tends to diminish the number of those who are brought before you as a magistrate?—The instructions are these; that any man who can make his way home, and is not really riotous in the street, or disturbing the neighbourhood, if he will go home, is let to go home; and there is no doubt that the large mass of cases of drunkenness are of this description. And therefore the police statistics really do not furnish any adequate account of the number of drunkards on the Sunday, or in fact on any other day of the week.

3065. Will you tell us if you have any recent statement of the number of cases of persons brought up on Sunday, or other days of the week, for being drunk and disorderly?—I have a return, which I desired the chief constable of Leeds to make for me, and it is made up for six weeks, ending the 31st of March this year; and the number of cases that have been brought before the magistrates for drunkenness, or drunkenness and assaults arising out of drunkenness, which very often occur, is 158 on Sunday.

3066. Do those cases occur on the Sunday, and are then brought up before you on the Monday?—Yes.

3067. Those are cases of drunkenness committed on the Sunday?—Cases that are brought on the Sunday, that would be from 12 o'clock on Saturday night till 12 o'clock on Sunday night.

3068. Mr. John Abel Smith.] Does that include both drunkenness and drunkenness with violence?—Yes, when the assaults are combined with drunkenness.

3069. And drunkenness pure and simple?—Yes, drunkenness pure and simple, where they have been riotous.

3070. Mr. Yorke.] When are the Saturday cases taken if the Sunday cases only are taken on Monday?—The numbers on Saturday are taken up to 12 o'clock on Saturday, and therefore I put them altogether. Those cases are 0.69.

heard on Monday, but they are distinguished. The number of cases on Sunday was 158; on Monday 83; on Tuesday 131.

3071. Mr. Roebuck.] What number of hours does that represent?—It takes the 24 hours, from midnight to midnight. Those are the number of cases that have come before the justices on that day; but I have got a return from the chief constable of the cases that are brought in by his men from 12 at night till 12 the next night.

3072. My difficulty is this, to know whether you do not adjudicate upon a larger number of hours on the Monday morning, than you do on the Tuesday morning?—We do; but that is not the question which I was asked by the Honourable Member for Leeds; because you will find that while there were 158 cases on Sunday, there were 172 on Saturday, all of which will come before the magistrates on Monday; and they are distinguished from the Sunday cases; Tuesday is 131, and the excess over Monday, and over the following day, is to be accounted for somewhat in this way. There are many cases in which drunkenness arises, and assaults are committed, where the police only can get the names of the parties on the Monday, and therefore in those cases, they apply on the Monday for a warrant, and the cases are brought up on the Tuesday. They generally go to the houses after the people are gone to bed at night, so as to find them at home; they are brought up on the Tuesday, and that will account in some measure for the larger number of cases on the Tuesday, than we find either on the Monday or on the Wednesday. The number of cases on Wednesday is 93; on Thursday 66; on Friday 61; and on Saturday 172, which is the largest number of all.

3073. Mr. Hibbert.] Is it not the case that some of those 158 cases which are put down for Sunday, would arise from drunkenness which occurs on the Saturday before 12 o'clock?—That is possible.

3074. Have you no return which would illuminate those?—No, I have not; what I asked for was exactly as I tell you, the number from 12 o'clock at midnight to 12 o'clock at midnight of the next day.

3075. Mr. Baines.] All that were brought in up to 12 o'clock on Saturday are included in the Saturday cases?—Yes.

3076. But all those after that are included amongst the Sunday cases?—Yes.

3077. After the testimony which you have given, I scarcely need ask you whether you approve of the Bill which is now before the consideration of Parliament and this Committee?—I have not the slightest doubt about it; I may state that I desired our chief constable to take for me in three wards of the town the number of people that were drinking in public-houses and beer-houses, from the time the police went on duty, until 11 o'clock, the closing hour; and he gave me a return of those numbers; I desired him to take three wards distinct in their character, and if the Committee will permit me, I will give you the results. The north-east ward is the worst ward in the town, with the exception of the one in which the Rev. Edward Jackson is the minister, which is the worst ward in the town; and the north-east ward is the second worst ward in the town for the low character of the inhabitants; we have in that ward 25 licensed victuallers' houses, and 65 beer-houses; and between the hours of 9 and 11 on Sunday week last, there were in the public-houses of this north-east ward, 408 men and 98 women; and in the beer-houses, 776 men and 113 women.

3078. Mr. Roebuck.] Can you state the population of that ward?—The population of the north-east ward is 26,582, and there are in that ward 3,928 burgesses, or about that number, who will be the future electors under the new law; in this ward that I now speak of there were 1,394 persons drinking in the beer-houses and licensed victuallers' houses between the hours of 9 and 11 yesterday week; you will observe that in this particular ward which I tell you is the worst ward, there were 98 women in the public-houses and 112 women in the beer-houses; but in the next ward that we come to, which is one of the crack wards of the borough, the north-west ward, we have a population of 16,561, with 2,726 burgesses, and there the drinkers were 816, but in this ward, instead of there being above 200 women in the drinking-houses there were only six women.

3079. That is a well-to-do ward, is it not?—That is one of the best wards, because it is a respectable part of the town; they are a lower class of people who live in the first ward; then the third ward that we have taken is peculiarly a working men's ward, but it is the highest class of workmen, men who are employed in locomotive engine building, working men who get large wages, and who are, confessedly, in our town, the most thoughtful and the best class of working men, men who care more for their wives and families than the majority of the people living probably in the north-east ward; in this ward, the Hunslet Ward, there is a population of 25,700 inhabitants, and there are 5,500 burgesses in it who will be, as I say, the future electors in all probability, and in this ward there were 1,193 persons drinking on that evening, but out of the 1,193 drinkers there were only 73 women against above 200 in the north east-ward.

3080. Mr. Baines.] Have you received any special and even very strong testimony on the subject of the approbation of this Bill from a very large employer of labour whom you consider as representing the body of employers generally, and whose testimony you would consider to be of special importance?—Yes, one of the largest companies in our town, the Kirkstall Forge Company, the acting partner in which said that it would be a beneficent measure for them and a most popular one; and one of the largest curriers and shoemakers in the place, employing in their own establishment 1,500 hands, said it would be a most beneficent measure, and would act most beneficially upon the working men.

3081. Does the Kirkstall Forge belong to Messrs. Butler?—Yes, the firm is called Beecroft, Butler and Company. Mr. Beecroft the Member, was a partner in this large concern, which employ many hundred hands; it is a vast concern, like a small town.

3082. Those gentlemen expressed very unhesitatingly their opinion that the passing of this Bill would be a most beneficent measure?—Yes.

3083. Mr. Roebuck.] I want to know how far we agree, and when divergence comes between our opinions; we both agree that drunkenness is a great evil and that drunkenness amongst women is about the greater evil of the two, and that if we could prevent the working men from getting drunk on Sunday, it would be a great advantage. Let me ask you, do you think that it would be a great advantage if we could prevent working men drinking at all without getting drunk?—I am not at all prepared to say that, because many men think that a certain amount of beer is good for their health. I think a certain amount of wine is good for my health, and I should be very sorry to debar them of privileges that I enjoy myself.

3084. I may gather at once that you do not think that it would be of itself a benefit to society to prevent men drinking, and drinking moderately, on Sunday?—I am not at all prepared to say that it would be a disadvantage to allow them to drink a glass of beer on Sunday. I have no desire to do that; but, at the same time, I may say that I opened a public dining-room, and had it open for two years, and cooked dinners for a hundred men every day. I had nothing but working people, and my place was, for a length of time, full, and they evidently enjoyed their dinner, because I had dinners well cooked for them at the lowest price, and they had no beer there; but bad times came on, and I found that I was losing too much money, and was obliged to shut it up.

3085. You mean that the people did not come?—They could not afford to pay. We had very bad times, and, as you are probably aware, unfortunately a great many men were out of employ, and a large establishment must be kept up by a large number of persons, and, therefore, I was obliged to do what other people had to do: I gave it up.

3086. I am now supposing that you could exclude all the artisan population from any place of drinking on the Sunday; what do you suppose that they would do?—Some of them will have beer, and they would purchase it on Saturday night and take it to their own homes; but, very happily, they are a very small number compared with the large mass of our working population.

3087. Then, what would the other people do?—Many of them would buy their beer, as some of them do now, in quart bottles; and there are a more respectable class, who buy a barrel of beer and have it at home.

3088. But you do not quite see what I mean. I do not mean what they would do with regard to drink, but what they would do with themselves if they were entirely shut out from any place of this sort of recreation?—There is no mistake about it, that the large mass of our working people would go out for recreation, as many of them do now in fine weather, in the fields, and walk about. In our town we have a very large number of public footpaths leading out into the country, and I hope we shall have public recreation grounds established in all parts of the town.

3089. People who take that sort of recreation, I suppose are liable to get thirsty?—Yes, no doubt.

3090. Then would you condemn them to satisfy their thirst with water?—It is the best thing for them.

3091. That is, in your opinion?—It is the best thing for them if they are merely thirsty.

3092. But do you think it would do me any harm if, by and by when I am thirsty, I should get a bottle of soda water with a glass of wine in it?—Not the slightest.

3093. Do not you think that I should consider it a hardship if I might not have that glass of wine?—I dare say you would; and I do not wish to restrict the working man from having it. I tell him that it is better for him to have it at his own at home, rather than to be going to a public-house; but in all these matters individuals must give way to the general good; it is so minor an evil compared with the enormous evil of drunkenness.

3094. Have you not observed in your own class of life, and within your own knowledge, a great improvement in the habits of gentlemen in our position?—Yes.

3095. That has not been the result of any legislative interference?—No, it is the education and habit of the times.

3096. Have you paid attention, in the same way and for the same purpose, to the habits of the working classes?—Yes; a decided improvement has taken place.

3097. And that without more aid from the Legislature than as regards the partial shutting of public-houses?—The partial closing, by growing restrictions in the way, has assisted in the gradual change which has taken place. I could draw a very clear line of demarcation between the drinking class of men and the large mass of working men, who are very respectable men, and who do not frequent public houses; the large mass of our best men, if they get anything to drink at all, get it at home.

3098. Now let me put an argument into your mouth, which, if it be not correct, I beg you to state that I am in error. You suppose that, because good has arisen from partial closing, therefore entire closing would also produce good? I think it would produce good; but I should refer the measure proposed in the Bill to total closing.

3099. You prefer this measure because it allows people to drink between certain hours?—Because it gives them the facilities that we in our position in life have at home; it gives to the working man the same opportunities that you or any other gentleman possesses at home.

3100. Not quite, because he is not allowed to go in there to drink what he buys?—Nor am I.

3101. But then you have your club?—But nobody exercises that privilege, as you know.

3102. I do assure you that they do exercise it in this town?—But they do not in Leeds.

3103. Under this Bill, a working man would not be able to drink what he bought in a public-house, using that word generally for public-houses and beer-houses, what is the class of habitation of the great body of working men in Leeds?—The great mass of them live in better houses than such people generally do live in in London; decidedly better; and as a working woman said to me yesterday week, "I should be ashamed of myself, sir, if my house was not as comfortable as any beer-house or public-house in the borough of Leeds." I believe that it would lead to this, that working men's wives would study much more to have their homes clean and thoroughly comfortable than, perhaps, unfortunately, they do now. The working man goes away from his house to the drinking-house, and leaves his wife and children at home; they are neglected and uncared for, and the women becomes careless and indifferent, whereas, if he was led from any cause whatever to seek his home as the place that he would naturally go to, it is an incentive to the wife, and no doubt the best incentive in the world, for her to make her home all that a working man's home should be.

3104. But if the house be a small house, and the man has a large number of children, I take it that you would not condemn him to sit in that home all day, because men do not like the noise of children, and although they love their children, they do not want them all the time about them, but if a man is confined to one room, and he must drink, and have his meals in that one room, according to this Act of Parliament, do you think that that would be no sort of imposition or restraint upon him?—No, I really do not think it would; I believe that in a very short time he would tell you that he was a far happier man than he had ever been in his life before.

3105. Will you tell me, if you can, what is the precise number, or nearly the precise number of artisans, to use the words generally, in Leeds?—I cannot tell you.

3106. What is the population of Leeds?—We had 207,000 by the last census in 1861, and it would be 220,000 now, perhaps, it is rapidly increasing.

3107. Then those 220,000, upon the whole, are well behaved and estimable people?—The large mass of our people are.

3108. And those drunkards that you talk about are a very small exception?—They certainly are exceptions to the general well being, happily, of our town, but there are far too many of them.

3109. That is to say, we should be all delighted if there were no drunkards?—I should for one, and I am sure you would.

3110. Should you say, generally speaking, that it was a large per-centage of the population who get drunk?—In the wards that I have given you the drinkers were five per cent. upon the population.

3111. But upon the whole what do you suppose it is?—It would be about the same; I took three wards.

3112. You stated that the people were drinking that were found in the public-houses on that particular Sunday, but you did not say they were drunk?—No, I say that they were drinking.

3113. I draw a broad distinction between drinking and getting drunk; you have not told us how many of those people in the drinking-houses were drunk?—I could not tell you; we have the greatest possible difficulty in defining what drunkenness means.

3114. Do you believe that you would have the per centage of drunkards that you have spoken of as compared with the 220,000 persons?—I think it is a very large number of people out of a population of 220,000; if 5 per cent. of that population are away from their houses drinking on Sunday evening.

3115. Supposing a man having perfect command over himself, chooses to spend an hour on Saturday night at a public-house to see his friends and to talk over things that interest him, do you think that that would be a mischief?—I am not at all prepared to say that it would be a mischief on Saturday night.

3116. You are not prepared to say that it would not be a mischief?—I cannot say that it would not be a mischief; I would rather see that man in his own home with his family, because it is a selfish act on the part of every man going to a public-house.

3117. Even in the case of a man having been at work for six days having perfect command over himself if he thinks that he may have that enjoyment for one hour in a public-house on Saturday night, do you mean to tell me that you think that a selfish proceeding?—I certainly think

Esq.

D. Lupton,
Esq.

think it is selfish; his wife and his family are not with him enjoying his money along with himself.

3118. Do not suppose that I am asking an indiscreet and improper question, but do you never pass an hour in your club without your wife and children?—I do not for pleasure.

3119. Never?—Never.

3120. Not even when you go to take that cup of coffee which you spoke of?—I go and get my cup of coffee and my lunch there.

3121. But you do not think that selfish because your wife and family are not with you?—No, I do not; I am obliged to do so.

3122. You do not suppose, do you, that every enjoyment that a man takes he must allow his wife to have?—I cannot say that I do; but I think he is the wisest man who does share his enjoyments with her.

3123. To put this in a definite manner; after six days of hard labour, would you condemn a man, having perfect command over himself, who chooses to pass with his friends an hour in a public-house?—I am not prepared at all to condemn such a man doing that; but if that man asked me what was the best mode of going on, I would say, if I were in your case, I would take a bottle of beer home, and enjoy it with my wife and children at my supper, rather than I would go to a place which has a polluted atmosphere, and which reeks with smoke, and which is about as vicious a place as can be.

3124. You know that it is the habit of us Englishmen to sit at dinner, after what is called the women leaving the table; it is not a custom which I like, but still it is done, is it not?—Yes.

3125. Do not yourself practice it?—Very little.

3126. But you see it practised in daily society, I presume?—I hear that it is done.

3127. Do you think that there is any great mischief in that, and is not it similar to a man going to a public-house for one hour?—I think it would be a great deal better, if when the ladies left the table the men were to join them, as gentlemen sometimes drink more wine than is good for them.

3128. That is rather a bad symptom at Leeds, because I do not see it in London?—Unfortunately it is the case sometimes.

3129. I think I understand you, that you fancy that this complete restraint imposed by this Bill upon the the working man especially, because one need not hide the fact, would be a positive good?—It would be a good to a very great degree indeed.

3130. You do not think that the co-existent mischief, or evil, or imposition, whatever you choose to call it, of preventing a man having the means of satisfying his desire for drinking a glass of wine or a glass of beer, which is prevented by this Bill, is anything like the countervailing benefit on the other side of the question?—Certainly not.

3131. Therefore you are prepared to have your excursionists who go out in such immense numbers on Sunday, compelled to take their liquor with them?—I am not at all prepared to say that, but I understand that according to this Bill, persons who are travellers have the same privileges as they have now.

3132. But with regard to the very large class of persons who take a walk on an evening after service and go out into the fields, as I should do if I were an inhabitant of Leeds, and if I were able to do it, you are of opinion that they should have no means of satisfying thirst if it comes upon them, except by drinking cold water that runs in the brook?—I do not think that they stand in need of it. A man who has been working the whole week, as a rule, does not go out such a distance into the country as to require any refreshment; he goes out merely for recreation. I see those men strolling past my house $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles out of town, just walking as leisurely almost as their legs can carry them, evidently as we should express it in Yorkshire, dawdling along with pure enjoyment, and then when they have gone out their $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles they will walk back again. A man does not start off on a Sunday to walk 10 miles into the country; that is not the ordinary means of getting recreation amongst us.

3133. I come to this general conclusion, that you believe all the restrictions in this Bill are beneficial?—I do, most assuredly.

3134. And that the present law has not been carried far enough?—I think so.

3135. You say that, taking into consideration, and admitting that, up to the present time, the law has worked a great deal of good?—Yes; the present restrictions have worked very beneficially, and I believe that those further restrictions will act more beneficially still, and that the working classes, five years hence, if this Act comes into operation, will be the very people to say, "We are delighted that it is passed," and that we shall have the homes of our working classes essentially different from what, unfortunately, we too often find them.

3136. Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen. You told us, I think, that the licensed victuallers had received a good deal of benefit from the restrictions of the present law?—Yes, certainly.

3137. Have you had any communication with them as a body?—No.

3138. No memorial has come from Leeds, has there, in favour of this Bill, from the licensed victuallers?—No.

3139. But if they were very much in favour of further restrictions, do you think that such a body are so little awake to their own interest that they would not have memorialised Parliament?—You are no doubt aware that there is a most gigantic association existing amongst them called the Licensed Victuallers' Association; and when I have said to any of the publicans, "Why do you not assist in this movement?" they at once said that they would not go opposed to the association, because they are more or less dependent on it. It is a gigantic association, extending in its ramifications throughout the whole empire.

3140. That is to say, the majority of the licensed victuallers hold a contrary opinion to that which you have expressed, and that that great organisation is against your Bill instead of for it?—I believe that is so. I have not heard that they have discussed the matter, but I have no doubt that that is the case.

3141. You could not tell us the number of the working population of Leeds, but you told us the number of persons who belonged to your excellent institute, and you said that when subjects peculiarly attractive to the working classes were brought forward, the large number of 1,500 or 1,700 people attended, upon the average?—Not upon the average, but occasionally. I said that this large attendance was when there were concerts concerts or dramatic performances, which were put up by themselves.

3142. Had they to pay a penny for admission to the meeting which you held in favour of this Bill?—Yes.

3143. Then it comes to this: that this object, which you say is so much desired by the working men of Leeds, did not possess as much attraction as a concert or an ordinary meeting of the institute?—No.

3144. You had 400 or 500 persons present, and you had only one hand held up against the resolution?—Yes.

3145. Would you infer from that that the inhabitants generally agree with the objects of your meeting?—Certainly; some of these men expressed to me that opinion, speaking for themselves and their fellow workmen, that they knew that this measure would be a beneficial measure.

3146. When so very small a proportion of the working men out of so large a number attended, suppose it would be open to any one to say that it was possible that those who did not attend thought that the objects of the meeting so unlikely to be attained, looking at the present state of feeling upon the question, that they would not like the trouble to come to oppose?—It is a very difficult thing to say how it is.

3147. Therefore the unanimity of the meeting may be in your favour, but the paucity of the numbers would be rather in favour of your opponents?—It may be put in that way, but I do not at all ascribe it to that.

3148. What class should you say mostly frequent public-houses on Sunday?—The class of people below the respectable working men, and a great number of men do go in to get a single glass, and, unfortunately, going in with that intention, they are too often led on to drink more than mere good fellowship.

3149. You stated, did you not, that the largest houses in the town were now closed on Sunday?—Entirely closed.

3150. Do those of working classes who frequent public-houses on Sunday go to those largest houses generally?—They are dram shops and houses where drams are sold, and people do not sit there for the most part as long as they do at the other licensed victualling houses or in the beer-houses.

3151. Those houses that are closed, in fact, are the houses that the greater number of the working classes do not frequent?—Yes, they frequent them.

3152. You stated that the class which was most demoralised you thought by the opening of public-houses on Sunday were young women?—Yes, most assuredly.

3153. I gathered from your answer that young women used to go there to meet their sweethearts, where there was music, but now that you have put a stop to music they do not go?—They do not go to the same extent. Unfortunately, many cases come to my own personal observation at petty sessions in adjudicating in cases of bastardy, where the ruin of young women has been the result of going to those places, and has taken place after they have been drinking with their sweethearts in those houses; that has come out time after time in petty sessions.

3154. You gave us a very affecting instance of a man who was brought up as a minister, and who ended as a bricklayer's labourer through drink, but I presume you connect that with drinking irrespective of drinking on Sunday?—Yes, certainly.

3155. Do you think that a man educated in that position, and falling so low, could have been restrained by any possible restriction if this Bill had been in force?—I do believe that putting those restrictions in the way would have operated most beneficially upon him. There would have been the break of the Sunday upon the drinking, and many a man will go to a public-house and get drunk, who would hesitate a very long time before he would get drunk at his own house, before his wife and his children.

3156. With regard to there being no advantages in drinking on Sunday, are you a beer drinker yourself?—I drink wine.

3157. Then you do not know what it is to draw a glass of beer over night and drink it the next day?—I do not know that I ever did such a thing.

3158. Then you are not a competent witness as to the popularity of such a measure, compelling working men to drink on the Sunday what was drawn on Saturday?—I can tell you what is the practice in Leeds, and I dare say it is so in other towns. Under the Act of Parliament which was passed enabling persons who sell $4\frac{1}{2}$ gallons, to sell smaller quantities in bottle, upon which they pay an additional duty of a guinea a year, and 5 per cent. Those people bottle their beer and sell it. I believe it is about the same price as if it was drawn out of a barrel, and therefore there is every facility given to a working man if he is so disposed to buy his bottled beer, and take it home and drink it at his own house, at his dinner or supper, with his family. But it is not as you suggest to me; it is not drawing out of a tap on Saturday night, and keeping it in a pitcher until the Sunday dinner.

3159. You think it would be equally good drawn and put into a small bottle?—Yes, to some particular tastes it would.

3160. I understand that you take your statistics for 24 hours from 12 o'clock in the morning to 12 o'clock at night; supposing people were turned out of a public-house at 12 o'clock on Saturday night, and afterwards became disorderly, would they come into the Sunday return?—They would.

3161. I presume that the most disorderly part of the population would probably remain drinking till the very latest hour that they could?—Yes.

3162. Therefore the probability is, that the worst of those drunken cases on Saturday would be those who stayed latest, and who are turned out at 12?—There is this to be said, that as soon as ever a man is really drunk, especially if he has got rid of all his money, the landlord gets quit of him; and it is not always the case that the worst cases remain to the end. A landlord does not like what they call a fractious man in his house; and he turns him out as soon as he can get quit of him. No doubt it would happen many times that they would stay till 12 o'clock, and are taken into custody on Sunday morning; but it is equally clear that the large mass of people do get home without coming into the hands of the police.

3163. Drink, of course, has a different effect upon different persons; it may excite some to madness, and others it may stupify, and they would sit very quiet; but when they began to move about and leave the house, they might get into a scrape. Therefore I take it to be very certain, although it is not proved, that a considerable per-centage of your Sunday cases are of persons who get drunk on Saturday night?—It is possible, certainly.

3164. You gave us a list of persons in several wards who were drinking on Sunday between nine and 11; did you follow that up by a statement next of how many complaints there were the day?—No, I did not.

3165. I suppose that a very large per-centage of those persons had no complaint made against them?—No doubt.

3166. Still you think that for the sake of the few who might have had complaints made against them, you would prevent the whole community from having any drink?—I think that the public good should be paramount.

3167. With regard to excursionists, you say that the Leeds people, as a rule, who pass your house on Sunday you think do not require refreshments?—No, I think not.

3168. Do not you think that if that is the case we have now arrived at a time when this question may be left to be determined by the persons themselves, whether they want refreshment or not?—As I understand this Bill, if they return home in the evening between eight and 10, the wife can go home and get supper ready, and the husband can get his pitcher of beer from the beer-house, or the public-house, and take the pitcher of beer into his house and enjoy his supper with his wife and family; that is the provision of this Bill.

3169. But you would not let him have any opportunity of drinking in the public-house?—Certainly not; a decent fellow does not want it.

3170. Even if he took his wife and family with him, you would not approve of it?—I should be very sorry to hear of a working man's wife going with her husband to a public-house or beer-house. Indeed I think, as a rule, they do not take their wives there.

3171. Do you think it would be a bad thing for them to take their wives there?—Certainly.

3172. And equally bad for them to drink alone?—I do not say equally bad; I say that it would be very bad indeed; a man must be very degraded indeed to take his wife among his drunken companions.

3173. If, as you say, it is a selfish act on the part of the husband if he goes and drinks alone at a public-house, and it is a worse thing still if he takes his wife, you place him, do you not, in an awkward predicament?—Except he does not go there at all.

3174. You start with the assumption that the public-house is a bad place altogether, do you not?—I do not say that.

3175. Do not you come very nearly to that, at all events on Sunday?—It is a worse place on Sunday than on any other day in the week, but I am not at all prepared to deprive working men of any privileges which I have myself.

3176. Do you think it would be better that the Legislature should pass a restrictive Act like this, or that it should be left to the people of the towns, or the several localities, to pass an opinion upon it?—I do not think that it is of very much consequence as far as the large towns are concerned, because I believe that, if the principle of Sir George Grey's Night Closing Act was adopted with reference to this measure, all the large towns would, within two years, adopt it; but in districts lying outside large towns, it would not be brought into operation, and therefore I prefer the compulsory measure.

3177. Mr. Roebuck.] You stated that many of the houses that closed voluntarily on Sunday were the most prosperous concerns of that class in the town; and afterwards you said, that when you suggested to a man that he might voluntarily close his place on Sunday, he said, "I should lose my weekly customers," do you think that those two statements tally?—Perfectly; the one has a large establishment, is on vantage ground, can command a great sale, does his business uncommonly well, and has got an established position; but the other has a house which is limited in its capacity, and is struggling to get on, and does not like to lose a single customer; at the same time, I must say, if you ask me my opinion, that I believe they would all be more prosperous if they closed on the Sunday, putting aside entirely religious grounds, which I have nothing to do with here; I mean to say, that any man who will cease working for one day in seven, will manage his business much better with that one day's rest than if he went on all the week through.

3178. Nevertheless you think it a legitimate fear on the part of that man who suggests that there ought to be a law, because he would lose his trade if he closed voluntarily?—Yes, he wants protection. He said to me, "I only wish that you gentlemen could get it made law, and nobody would rejoice in it more than I should do."

3179. Have you ever thought of the mischief of the paying of wages on Saturday?—Yes, in the large mass of the establishments in our town the wage list is made up to Thursday night, and the wages are paid on Friday. I attribute to that, amongst other things, one of the amendments which we find amongst the working class. The women get the wages on the Friday and they spend it well upon the Saturday's market; and it is most beneficial. I should be exceedingly glad to see some Act passed (if it were possible to pass such an Act) that would render it compulsory.

3180. Then do I correctly understand you that in a great number of establishments at Leeds they pay the wages on Thursday?—No, they make up the time to Thursday night and then the wage-lists go into the counting-house on Friday, and the wages are paid on Friday.

3181. Did you ever find that because of that there has been an increase of drunkenness on Friday?—No.

3182. Mr. Yorke.] According to the results of the visits of the police, I think you found that there were about 5 per cent. of the population in those three wards drinking in the public-houses on that Sunday night; do you know at all the proportion of the unmarried men to the married men in Leeds?—No, I do not.

3183. But I presume it is more than 5 per cent. of the population?—I should think so.

3184. Is it not the case that a considerable number of unmarried men working in the town have nothing more than a bedroom or even a share of a bedroom?—Yes, that may be so in a great many cases.

3185. Would you not think it a great inconvenience to those men that they should be debarred from using the public-house for the purposes of society or whenever in bad weather they are unable to go out on those walks which you say they

they can take on Sunday evening; where would you propose that they should pass their time?—All those houses have what we term living rooms in addition to bedrooms. But the large mass of young men in our town are members of families, and it is one of the evils of this drinking system that if a young man gets paid more than he has to pay his parents he flings off from his parents and he will go off for himself rather than remain a member of the family. It is one of the evils which we continually see arising.

3186. Are there not a large number of young men in the town who have no relations in the town, but have come in from the neighbourhood because of the better wages that they get?—Yes, there are some young men who come from the neighbourhood, and they generally go home on the Saturday night and come in on Monday morning. There are a great many who do that in our town.

3187. Putting all those aside you think that there would be a comparatively small number affected by these restrictions?—So small a number that I am quite sure that the general good that would arise from it would far more than counterbalance any isolated cases of inconvenience.

3188. What is your opinion as to the amount of drinking in private houses amongst the working classes in Leeds?—I really do not know, it is the sots that drink in private houses, but they are very exceptional cases.

3189. You think that drinking in private houses is exceptional?—I think it is.

3191. But you agreed just now that everybody not married in Leeds?—No doubt, and those unmarried men would not be allowed to drink much at the houses in which they lodge.

3192. Is not drinking in a man's own lodging more unrestrained than it would be in a public house?—No doubt; but if he gets drunk in his own house he does not inconvenience anybody, because he stays at home and goes to bed.

3193. Is not it also the fact that the cases which come before the police are chiefly those which take place in the public-houses, and are more easily detected, from the fact that a man is turned out at a certain hour, and if he is not in a condition to go home he necessarily comes under the notice of the police, whereas if he drank at home he would not?—Yes, that is so; if they drink at home they would not come under the notice of the police unless some row ensued in consequence of it.

3194. With regard to these statistics, you say that on Sunday there were 158 persons drunk, on Monday 83, and on Tuesday 131; I did not quite understand what you said with regard to the 31 on Tuesday?—It was this: that supposing assaults take place during Sunday night and early on Monday morning, if the police cannot get the names, or if there are two or three parties implicated he will bring one in and he will apply to the magistrates on Monday for a warrant against the other parties, and they are brought in, generally speaking, at night; the policemen execute those warrants, as you are aware, at the dead of night, when they find the men at home, and then they are brought in and appear on the Tuesday's sheet.

3195. Then your inference is, that the apparent increase in the Tuesday cases is in reality owing to cases occurring on Sunday?—I believe it arises from that cause.

3196. It was stated by a witness two or three days ago before this Committee that he thought that the transition from the work day's labour of the working classes to the devotion on Sunday was somewhat too sharp, and that he wished that some kind of relaxation other than religious services could be afforded to the working classes on Sunday; what is your view by that question?—I have stated that I thought that the increasing of the number of means of innocent recreation is very desirable, and I have given a practical illustration of that by opening my own institution on Sunday afternoon without any change whatever; unfortunately but few persons go there; there are other attractions which are superior to anything that mere books present, and, therefore, it is very thinly attended. I have seen 40, 50, and 60 people there on a Sunday afternoon, and I should be very glad to see such means of innocent recreation opened in various parts of the town; and I believe that that would be one of the results of a beneficent measure like this; that it would lead men who are interested in the welfare of their fellow creatures, to consider the subject, and we should have institutions such as our own largely multiplied. I am speaking only of one, for mine is not the only one in Leeds; it is the largest, but there are two or three others in Leeds, and two or three in the outskirts of the town.

3197. How far would you extend your definition of innocent; how much ground would you make the word "innocent" cover in reference to recreation?—Everything is innocent to my mind that is not sinful.

3198. What I mean is, would you extend it, for instance, to the question of opening the museums and zoological gardens, and institutions of that kind?—That is travelling into a wide subject.

3199. The object of my question is this: Would you not think it preferable to adopt measures of the character which I have hinted at rather than by legislative enactments close the public-houses and force the people into the streets without any opportunity of amusing themselves in an innocent manner?—Certainly not; I think that this measure is so good in its character that other results will flow from it as a necessary consequence, and that such means of innocent recreations will arise out of it. But in all our large towns there is an enormous number of people that are amongst the well disposed, and yet occasionally go to such places. I have had a remarkable instance of that in our institution. I used to go on Sunday evening to read to those men, because a great many of them told me that they never went to a place of worship in their lives; I used, therefore, to go on Sunday evening and read to them; and then a lot of them came to me, and said one day, "If we had a religious service in our institution we would come to it." I applied to clergymen and dissenting ministers of all denominations to assist me, and up to the end of April we have had 700 or 800 working men attending that that religious service Sunday after Sunday, serving to show, to my mind, that those men, if they were drawn in any way within the scope of beneficent influences, are glad enough to avail themselves of it. Many of those men have said to me that their children reclothed, and their homes refurnished, have been the result of our Sunday afternoon services. As they said, they never went to a place of public worship for 20 years before, but they would come to the institute where members of the institute would keep them in countenance. So that I argue if you take away those gross temptations from the men and give them some innocent means of spending their afternoons, I believe that we should find most beneficent consequences resulting from it. I am perfectly certain, and I am speaking from what I know of Leeds, that the homes of the working classes would be essentially and entirely changed from what too many of them are; I have not the shadow of a doubt in my own mind as to what the result will be.

3200. Mr. John Abel Smith.] You stated that there were 377 licensed victuallers, 750 beer-houses, and 160 refreshment houses in Leeds, making a total of 1,287; have you ever turned your attention to the sum of money which is spent in each of those houses on Sunday?—No. We had a calculation made some years ago, and it was a very large sum.

3201. Any large proportion of that sum spent upon the homes and clothing and food of the family would make a very great difference?—Yes.

3202. Have you done me the honour to read the Bill which is before the Committee, and do you know the provisions of it?—Yes.

3203. And are you aware that one of the provisions is, that the public-house or beer-shop is to be open between 8 and 10 in the evening for the purpose of selling beer across the counter?—Yes.

3204. Would not that meet any reasonable want of the thirsty soul, that the Honourable Member for Sheffield has been alluding to?—Yes, certainly.

3205. Do you recollect Mr. Wilson Patten's Act in 1854?—Yes.

3206. That Act was in force for the period of a year, from August 1854 to August 1855; do you recollect the effect produced by it?—Yes, it was very beneficial as far as Leeds was concerned, and we were very sorry when it was repealed; it had a very important effect.

3207. Did it excite any disturbance or violence in Leeds?—Not the slightest.

3208. I think I understood you to say that the magistrates of that part of Yorkshire were in favour of restrictive measures of this kind?—The magistrates of the borough of Leeds were assembled, and we discussed that Bill; and after we had discussed it, we passed a resolution authorising me by a distinct resolution to come and represent their views to this Committee in favour of the Bill.

3209. Generally speaking, your views are favourable to restriction upon Sunday drinking?—Certainly.

3210. How far would you carry restriction; as far as the provisions were found tolerable and consistent with public acceptance?—I think that this Bill is fair and reasonable, and that it gives every facility, and that no one could fairly or reasonably complain; and I should be very glad to see it adopted, because I believe it would work quite well.

3211. Do you apprehend as the result of this Bill passing into law, that there would be any violent resistance to it?—Not the slightest.

3212. With regard to the habits of the working men of Leeds as to excursions, are there any means of going out any great distances, or is it merely walking out into the country?—There is no doubt that a large mass of excursionists go out by trains or omnibuses; as I understand all this class of persons come within the designation of travellers, and therefore they are outside the operation of this Bill; and the only persons who would be affected by it would be persons walking one or two miles out of the town finding a public-house or a beer-house in the outskirts, and finding it closed. I say in answer to a question put to me by one of the Honourable Members, that I do not think that a man walking out 2½ miles into the country needs refreshment. I do not myself, and I am not so strong as most men are.

3213. Then, practically speaking, there would be no reasonable amount of convenience of the people interfered with?—No, not at all.

3214. May I ask you if you have turned your attention to the effect of high wages or low wages upon public drinking?—I can scarcely say that I have. As a general principle I know that when men earn a great deal of money, they do very often spend it as lightly as it is earned.

3215. Is it not equally true that when people are suffering they are very much disposed to drinking?—That must depend upon the sort of people. If a man has a wife and family starving, he is a very bad man that will go and spend his money in drink.

3216. Do not you think that high wages may be taken as a test of continued drinking?—At Leeds, I know, within the sphere of my own observation, many men who now never go to a public-house because they are getting low wages.

3217. I gather from you, that although there has been no public meeting in Leeds about this Bill, you have a very strong impression that the general feeling of the town is in favour of it?—Certainly.

3218. Mr. Roebuck.] Are there any statistics which tell the number of Irish in Leeds?—We have about 20,000 to 25,000.

3219. What class of the population do they constitute?—They are the poorest of our people.

3220. Do they at all constitute any large fraction of the drunkard population?—They drink, but I should not have thought that they were amongst the mass of great drinkers. They get soon excited, as you know, under the influence of drink, and therefore it is more apparent than with some of our own native population.

3221. Mr. John Abel Smith.] The Roman Catholic priests take great pains with them, do they not?—Yes, they have taken great pains in trying to prevent drunkenness amongst them.

3222. Mr. Roebuck.] What class of amusements do you offer in your institution on Sunday?—Nothing but illustrated papers on Sundays, and good books, such as Smiles' books, entitled "Self Help," and books of that class, and all the Sunday papers, I take in, but it is altogether literature.

3223. You have no amusements?—No, not on Sunday, we could not have by our local law.

3224. Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen.] Do you remember a petition from Leeds against Colonel Wilson Patten's Bill?—No, I do not remember it at all.

The Rev. EDWARD JACKSON, called in ; and Examined.

3225. Mr. Baines.} You are Incumbent of St. James, Leeds, and have been so since the year 1845, have you not?—Yes, I have been.

3226. Were you for 11 years senior curate of the parish church, under Dr. Hook, now the Dean of Chichester?—I was.

3227. Were you for five years chaplain of the Leeds Workhouse?—I was.

3228. Are you a native of Leeds?—I am.

3229. Have you lived for many years in the very midst of the most populous and poorest part of the population?—I have lived amongst them and have laboured in my ministerial capacity amongst them for a very long period.

3230. Are you thoroughly acquainted with the borough and its various industrial occupations, its social state, and its interests?—I believe that I am allowed to be well acquainted with them.

3231. Have you been for 35 years engaged in gratuitous efforts for the religious and temporal well-being of the working people of Leeds?—I have since the year 1833.

3232. Are you connected with all the charitable institutions of the borough?—I believe I am with all of them.

3233. May I ask what is the character of the locality in which your own church is situated?—The very lowest in every respect morally and socially of any locality in the borough of Leeds.

3234. Have you had considerable opportunities of observing the effect of Sunday drinking in public-houses on the working classes?—I have to a very large extent for a very long period, and from very close intercourse with the working classes.

3235. What is your view of the results of Sunday drinking upon the working classes?—If I was to be asked to single out any one cause which is productive of hurtful results to the working man more than others, I should say the opening of public-houses and beer-houses on Sunday for drinking on the premises.

3236. In what respect do you consider that it operates so prejudicially?—I think that coming after Saturday, the day when the working man has had his wages to spend, it keeps up the drinking tendency over the Sunday, and renders him unfit for work, especially on Monday, and oftentimes on Tuesday and even on Wednesday; the drinking habit is thus set in, and Sunday being a day of leisure, becomes a day of temptation and a day of danger, and thus the working man in consequence of the Sunday leisure and temptation falls into drinking habits, and finds it difficult to throw off the influence of drink when Monday comes and work has to be attended to.

3237. Do you believe that generally men's health is interfered with, by their spending the day of rest in drinking?—I cannot doubt it in a very large number of instances.

3238. Does what you now state of the bad effects of drinking refer at all to the sober, as well as to the intemperate portion of those who visit public-houses on Sunday?—It applies to the sober in this respect, that many of them are thus led eventually to become drunkards, and it applies to the intemperate, inasmuch as it gives them no chance of escaping from their intemperate habits. The Sunday is especially a day of leisure and danger, and an intemperate man can scarcely be recovered from his intemperate habits.

ance, because of the peculiar facilities which he enjoys on that day for carrying out that which is a hurtful habit and the bane of his life.

3239. With regard to the break which the law has established in the hours of public-houses being open on Sunday morning, say, from 12 on Saturday night to half-past 12 on Sunday, as is now the case, do you believe that that has operated beneficially?—I cannot doubt it.

3240. Do you believe that the good effect would be much confirmed and extended if the public-houses were closed for consumption on the premises during the whole of Sunday?—Most certainly.

3241. Do you think that there is any danger that working men would drink at home, and indulge in what is called secret or private drinking, to anything approaching the same extent as is now done in public-houses on Sunday, supposing the public-houses were closed?—I do not; I think that the presence of his wife and children would be a great preventive to sitting in his home; and I know now that a number of men who drink in public-houses would never drink thus, if they had their children watching them.

3242. You know, I am sure, a great deal of the working men's dwellings in Leeds, and I wish to ask you whether you think that the working men's dwellings would be improved by the total closing of public-houses on the Sunday?—If I understand the question rightly, it means that if public-houses were closed on Sunday, would the working man's dwelling then be made a more comfortable home from what it now is; I should say that decidedly it would to a large extent.

3243. Have you thought it your duty to see the interiors of public-houses on Sunday?—My duty has called me thither, not because I wanted to see what was taking place there on Sunday, which would have been impertinence on my part, and an intrusion on the owner of the house, which I had no right to offer, but in my ministerial capacity to minister to the sick and dying I am very frequently called into public-houses on a Sunday. I may add that, within the last three months, I have had four fatal cases in public-houses to which I have been called in my ministerial capacity.

3244. Were they on Sunday?—I visited those houses, in the discharge of my duties, on the Sunday as well as on other days of the week. I do not say that those cases of sickness were the result of drunkenness in every one of them, but in some cases they were. If the question were asked me as to the effect of the Sunday opening of public-houses on the publicans themselves, that is a distinct question, and I am quite prepared to answer it.

3245. First of all, will you state your general impression from what you have witnessed in visiting public-houses on the Sunday?—The scenes which I have had before me there were such as to convince me entirely that it is the greatest evil possible to the working man to go there, and that there is more demoralisation carried on in a public-house on Sunday evening than, I should think, during all the rest of the week almost put together.

3246. Do you mean by the use of profane or obscene language?—I mean, as far as I have had an opportunity of observing, that there is more drunkenness,

Rev.
E. Jackson.

Rev.
E. Jackson.

drunkenness, and therefore there is more obscenity and more profanity, and that there is a mingling of the sexes on a Sunday evening which is not found on any other day of the week.

3247. Are young people in the habit of frequenting such places on the Sunday?—They are; but I may just corroborate the evidence of the previous witness, that since the passing of the local Act, by which music and attractions of that kind are prohibited in licensed houses on Sundays, the number of young people has very considerably diminished, and the evils which were suffered at the period previously to the passing of the Act are not now so great.

3248. Do you consider that the public-houses, being open on Sunday, is in the way of religious and benevolent agencies which are at work in the town for the benefit of the young?—That the opening of the public-houses and beer-houses on Sunday is in the way of religious effort there can be no question; but I would also say that the opening of those houses on Sunday is greatly in the way of all other benevolent and philanthropic efforts; for instance, Sunday schools. I believe that it would be the unanimous opinion of the immense body of Sunday school teachers of Leeds, who give their whole labour gratuitously, that if there is one cause more than another which interferes with and negatives the good influence of the Sunday school, it is the public-house and the beer-house being open on Sunday.

3249. Do you believe that many boys and girls of the age which may be considered the most dangerous age in life, are taken away from your Sunday schools by the early presentation to them of the temptations of the public-house?—I have been repeatedly told by the managers of our Sunday schools in Leeds that they consider that one-half of the scholars who are drawn away from their influence, about 14 or 15 years of age, are drawn away through the drinking influence in the public-houses on Sunday.

3250. Must not one-half really amount in the course of a year, or in two years, to hundreds and possibly even to thousands, considering the vast number of Sunday scholars that are in Leeds?—I have not made any calculation in that respect, but I should infer that the number would be very large indeed.

3251. Do you consider that females are especially liable to be affected by their attendance at public-houses on Sunday evening?—Of all classes of the community they are the class to whom the public-house influence on a Sunday is the most deadly. A girl from 14 to 18 once drawn to the public-house to drink on Sunday evening is almost certain to fall; and my experience in connection with the Penitentiary of Leeds, what we call our Guardian Asylum, of which I am frequently chairman, has ever been to that effect, that those who are brought there in a great measure have to trace their fall to their having been drawn to the public-house on Sunday.

3252. Have you several times engaged with other good people in the midnight meetings for gathering those unfortunate females and endeavouring to produce a good influence upon them?—I have.

3253. Has that enabled you also to speak with some confidence as to the injurious effects of the Sunday opening of public-houses upon females?—It has; and I may also add, that I am considered to be almost more than any other person in Leeds the one to whom those wretched girls would apply if they wanted to escape from the evils and horrors of their position; and the whole of my experience would fully confirm the opinion which I have expressed as to the injurious and deadly influence of Sunday drinking on that class of the community.

3254. Are they peculiarly liable to that temptation on Sunday evening, from the fact of their having leisure and their love of dress?—Very much so; a factory girl's dress is a great means of drawing her away from the right path if she comes under the influence of drink.

3255. On other evenings they are in their working dress, but on this evening their dress is very considerably superior; is it not so?—On this evening they are so dressed that they can walk with their young men, so far there is not anything wrong that I know of; but also they enter the public-houses in this dress, and being an afternoon of leisure, they have no household duties necessarily to keep them at home.

3256. And is the result, to your certain knowledge, from your experience which you have had connected with the Guardian Asylum, and the midnight meetings, and so forth, that Sunday drinking has been the means of the fall of a great number of young females?—I cannot doubt it.

3257. Do you think that the keeping open of public-houses on Sunday is good for the keepers of those houses themselves?—Most certainly not.

3258. In what way do you consider that that occupation on Sunday is hurtful to them?—The result of my very long experience, and mixing with that class of the community, visiting them, and having various connections upon matters of business to transact with them from time to time, has been that they are the most short-lived of the whole community. I do not believe that any class of our community have so short a lease of life as a publican has, and I account for that from three or four different causes: first of all, their houses are so arranged that they have actually worse domestic accommodation than many of the poorest working men enjoy; secondly, their houses are so full of people, and so badly ventilated, that the atmosphere is of the most pernicious character; and, thirdly, they keep very late hours, and having no Sundays' rest, the system wears out, and the man flies to drink as a sort of support, and under those various untoward influences by 40 years of age the life is over. Perhaps I may be permitted to give an instance which occurred within the last three months of a striking character, which, through rather travelling beyond the immediate question, yet bears upon it to some extent. Some three months ago I printed a small paper, which the working men themselves very largely circulated. There were about 17,000 or 18,000 copies, and a large number of them were distributed on the Saturday after the paper was printed. On the following day, Sunday, on leaving my church, a man followed me in the street, and said, "Mr. Jackson, I have seen the paper that you have put out against public-houses being open on Sunday, and I want to talk to you about it, for I am a publican myself." I expected, of course, that my friend was about to remonstrate with me upon an effort which he might consider to be injurious to his trade, and I said, "Well, what have you to say on the subject of that paper?" which was rather rather a strong one against the opening of public-houses on Sunday. He said, "Well, I wish to say to you that if ever you did a good thing in your life, if you get that measure passed to have the public-houses closed on Sunday, it would be a good measure; and we, of all people, should have the greatest benefit from it." He followed me for some considerable distance on my way to my house, and, with a very emphatic gesture, he laid his hand upon my shoulder, and he said: "I wish you would permit me to press you to do what you can in this matter." It will add some further force to the poor man's appeal, when I say that, within three months subsequently, I had seen him die, and received his dying endorsement to what he had said whilst living.

3259. Have you reason to believe that this is not a solitary instance?—I am sure it is not.

3260. Are there many publicans who would be glad to close on Sunday if they were required to do so, and if it were general?—I am quite sure that a very considerable number of those who keep open their houses now on the Sunday would hail with extreme satisfaction and thankfulness any legislative measure that would make it the law of the land.

3261. If such is their opinion, why do not they close their houses at present?—From that weakness to which the former witness alluded, of not liking to offend the customers of the week-day.

3262. You have sometimes, not merely in this case to which you have alluded, but in other instances, have you not been called to attend the sick and dying beds of publicans, or of persons in public-houses, and has that thrown any light upon this question of Sunday drinking?—Very much; but I have already stated, by anticipation, that I conceive that the system as now carried out, whilst hurtful to those who resort to the houses to buy beer, is most hurtful to those who carry them on.

four days, for closing entirely there were 802, against closing there were 204, and neutral, 123. And from my knowledge of working men, and my continual intercourse with them, I have not the slightest doubt that, if it depended upon a popular vote, we should carry it by five out of six, or six out of seven, throughout the whole borough of Leeds.

3264. Would the working men, in your opinion, be in favour of a partial closing or a total closing of the public houses on Sunday?—Those with whom I have been most in contact would be in favour of entire closing, and no sale whatever. Therefore I should think that the present proposed measure, which allows three and a-half hours in the day for the sale of liquors to be drunk off the premises, would be considered by working men a very liberal allowance indeed of what might be required in the way of a Sunday drinking provision.

3265. Have you any opinion to offer upon the subject of licensed gardens and concert rooms on Sunday?—I have partly already, in answer to a previous question, referred to that subject. I stated that the concerts and musical entertainments, which were largely carried on in Leeds until the last year or two, and were closed on the Sundays by one of the local Acts, were peculiarly prejudicial to the morals and welfare of the working classes, especially of the young. That now is stopped. We still, however, have gardens open on the Sunday, where drink is sold, and I do not know of any places which are so prolific of the worst of evil as those gardens are. It is notorious that young women are ruined Sunday after Sunday in those places, or on their way home from them.

3266. To what extent do you think that the Sunday excursionists require drinking accommodation?—Those who have to travel some distance would require refreshment, and, as I understand this measure, they will not be prevented from obtaining it; but a man merely strolling out of the town, and returning after his stroll, wants no such refreshment provided in any public-house. He has his home to go to, and his home is the very best place for him to go to. I know the wives of the working men of Leeds pretty well, few men know them better: for I am continually called upon to attend and address large mothers' meetings of 200 and 250 working men's wives, and I believe that they would say, "Send us our husbands home, if you please, on Sunday evening, and we will have a good supper for him, and if he wants his bottle of beer he shall have it, but keep him, if you can, sir, from the public-house."

3267. You believe, then, that the women would generally vote in favour of the entire closing of public houses on Sunday?—Yes; 99 out of 100 women would do so.

3268. And do you believe that with regard to a person who may have taken an excursion on the Sundays and returns home after 10 o'clock at night, it would be better for him to go for what he would call refreshment to a public-house, or would it be better for him to go to his own home?—To his own home, most certainly.

3269. In which way would he be most likely to be fitted for his work on Monday morning?—By going to his own home.

3270. Have you any means of knowing what is the opinion of the ministers of religion of all denominations—Catholics, Episcopalians, and Primitive Primitive Methodists, and those who mix most with working men, and those who mix most with the very poor, upon this subject?—I am as I have already stated, mixed up with clergymen and ministers and Roman Catholic clergymen in every benevolent institution which we have in the town, and I believe that there would be no dissentient voice on this question. They would all with one consent be in favour of the measure for closing public-houses on Sunday.

3271. You speak not only of Roman Catholics, but of all other ministers of religion in the town?—Of all ministers without any exception whatever.

3272. Do you think that there would be any exceptions amongst the Sunday-school teachers?—They would be unanimous in its favour.

3273. Do you think that there would be any exception amongst the town missionaries?—They would also be most unanimous in its favour.

3274. Do you think that that is the general opinion of the employers of labour?—Yes, certainly. I was speaking to a large employer of labour only two days ago, and he said, "You are going to London on this matter, I understand; for our sakes, as well as for the sake of the working men, do get the Sunday drinking stopped."

3275. Because it interferes so much with the regularity of industry?—Yes.

3276. Does not it set a bad example also to the young in the workshops?—Yes; it does, to a very large extent.

3277. You also can confirm, perhaps, what Mr. Lupton has told the Committee with reference to the opinion of the magistrates, many of whom you are in the constant habit of seeing?—Yes; I know personally nearly all who are magistrates for the borough of Leeds, and I should think, with a very small exception indeed, they will be most strongly in support of this measure.

3278. You have expressed your opinion as to what the women would do, if they had votes, upon this subject; with regard to the working classes generally, what do you say?—I would say that if I wanted any one question on which to raise a popular meeting in Leeds, and be sure to have the warm applaudits and approval of the working men, it would be this very question of Sunday closing. Perhaps the Committee will allow me to put it in this way: if I wanted to come forward as a candidate to represent the borough of Leeds in Parliament, I would take this question as one which would get me the popular vote.

3279. Supposing that you could call out the drunkards, may I ask what, in your opinion, would be their views upon this subject?—Some of them are so besotted with drink that they would not like to lose the opportunity of getting it any day; therefore they would not like to lose it on the Sunday; and yet a very considerable number of them would say, "Save us from ourselves, and shut them up."

3280. Having mentioned several of the very largest classes, is there any class of society in Leeds that you think are anxious for the keeping open of public-houses for consumption on Sunday?—Not any large class. There is a certain number of those who frequent them who would be opposed to the closing; but they are not to be compared, either for numbers or for importance, to those who would be found to be on the other side.

3281. Chairman.] While you say that the great majority of the working classes, in your opinion, are prepared and anxious for the change proposed in this Bill, it would introduce a compulsory change in the habits of very many; would it not?—It would certainly bring about a compulsory change in the habits of very many, the same as the restriction of the hours of drinking did when the law was brought to bear which closed them to half-past 12, as at present, on Sunday; but as that has been received not only without a murmur, but with entire approval, I take it for granted that they would also receive this measure without disapproval.

3282. There would be a great many people who, at present, choose to spend a part of Sunday in visiting the public-houses or public gardens where drink is sold, and who would be compelled to give up that practice?—There would; they would be obliged, if they wanted to drink, to drink at home.

3283. Probably no one will differ from you in the object to be attained, and the desirability of putting a check upon drunkenness, but I dare say you have considered sometimes how far it is possible for the law to act upon the free-will of individuals; and do you not think that there is a possibility of going too far?—I quite think that; but when I know from my own observation and continued intercourse with the working men of Leeds, that they themselves, of all classes of the community, are the most anxious for such a measure, I cannot call compulsory, in the sense of compulsion against their will, a measure which they themselves demand.

3285. You do not give us that evidence positively, I suppose?—Of course, it can only be an opinion, because it is something prospective.

3286. I suppose you have taken no direct steps to ascertain whether the persons who regularly use such places, are willing that they should be shut up?—I should suppose that the best answer to that question would be, such a return as the one which I read over, that for total closing, we find that out of 1,129, 802 were in favour, and 204 against; there you have the proportion of those who would be opposed to it; but then that was a ward which would really bring in a larger proportion of those who are frequenters of public-houses than other wards in Leeds.

3287. Taking it for granted that that proportion would be followed all over the borough, there would be some thousands of persons who would be compelled, at the will of the rest, to give up their old habits?—Yes, there would.

3288. There has been, has there not, a great increase in the church-going habits of the people of Leeds, in your recollection?—Yes, there has, to a very considerable degree, been a large extension of religious influence in the borough of Leeds.

3289. Do you think that the habits of the people have greatly improved in your recollection?—That question must be answered with some me care. As regards a large number of the working men, they are decidedly more civilised and more intellectual in every way, and they may be considered to be superior to what they were 30 years ago, but we have a large stratum of a lower class that peculiarly want reaching by some such remedial measures as the one now before the Committee.

3290. Something very like compulsion?—Yes, something that should keep them out of the way of mischief.

3291. Mr. Roebuck.] You say that a large majority of the working men are in favour of this closing system?—I do.

3292. Can you explain to me why so very large a number have petitioned against it?—I am not aware that there has been any petition from Leeds against it.

3293. Are your observations confined to Leeds?—I speak of that which I know.

3294. Then your observation, as confined entirely to Leeds, is that a large majority of them are in favour of this Bill?—Yes, the whole of the evidence which I have offered to the Committee has been confined to my own knowledge of the borough of Leeds.

3295. Mr. Knatchbull-Hugesson.] You gave us some figures just now, do they exhaust the whole population of the ward?—No, the canvass is still going on. I had hoped to have been able this morning to have given the Committee a very much larger amount of canvass returns.

3296. Do you know the whole population of the ward at all, or approximately?—Yes; the population I should suppose to be about 14,000, and this return will cover about 5,600; 1,129 families multiplied by five.

3297. Have any large number of persons or families been canvassed, and refused to return any reply?—No; I think, from what I have known in former years, as well as what this paper shows, that this is a very fair index of what the result of a canvass would be: so many for the entire closing, so many adverse to closing, and so many who would say, "We do not care at all about it."

3298. I understood you just now, in alluding to four fatal cases which occurred in public-houses within a short time, not to state that those cases were cases of drunkenness, but cases of casual illness, through visiting which you became acquainted with the state of things in public-houses?—Yes, but two of them, I think, were cases where death had been brought on by excessive drinking.

3299. Not specially by Sunday drinking more than on other days?—Not at all, but I mention that to support what I said as to the present unwholesome character of the whole system; that they get no Sunday rest.

3300. Was that unfortunate publican who spoke to you a victim to the habits of public-houses?—I should be afraid that he had been a drinker, but I should not say that that would necessarily cause his death.

3301. Was he ill when he spoke to you?—No.

3302. In fact, this case does not bear very much upon the question of Sunday drinking?—It bears upon this, as to the feeling of the publicans themselves upon the subject. He came, and in the most earnest and emphatic way, implored me to do all I could towards assisting in such a measure as this becoming law.

3303. But he was one publican out of 1,500?—

0.69.

Yes, but I mentioned him merely as illustrative of my position.

3304. You would not take that to be the present feeling amongst public-house keepers?—No, I would not say that.

3305. Have you heard of the petition which Leeds presented against Mr. Wilson Patten's Act in 1855?—There was one got up at that time, and I think I heard of it.

3306. Are you aware that the signatures were 25,000?—No.

3307. If that great expression of public opinion took place in Leeds without your knowing it, might not some persons say that you were not cognisant of the public opinion of Leeds?—I should say that that petition by no means expressed the feeling in the borough of Leeds. I believe that a public meeting fairly convened by the mayor of the borough, to which all parties could resort, and where a decision was arrived at by a show of hands, would be far more likely to be a means of ascertaining the truth than any petitions which oftentimes, I need not say, are manufactured in various ways.

3308. At such a meeting convened for the special purpose, no doubt the population of Leeds being very various in their opinions, those who were opposed to your views with respect to this matter might not like to go and cause a disturbance?—Those who would have to fear a disturbance would be those who were in favour of closing.

3309. How so, if there was such a vast majority?—It proved to be so in the result; but that would not be known beforehand.

3310. It rather showed that although they differed in view, they did not go and create an opposition at this meeting?—Most certainly they did; at that time they sent bands of music round the town, and gave men pints of beer to come and vote against Sunday closing.

3311. If they did not attend or make any disturbance, that would rather show their good behaviour in the matter?—It showed that they had done their best to get a vote in their favour, but that they signally failed.

3312. Not if they did not attend?—But they did attend.

3313. I thought that the show of hands was almost unanimous?—It was; at the borough meeting four years ago, it was entirely in favour with the exception of five hands, but at the public meeting in favour of Mr. Wilson Patten's Bill, four years ago, it was by no means so large a proportion, but it was a large proportion.

3314. Where was it held?—In our Cloth Hall Yard, which would hold 20,000 people.

3315. You told us that you thought the working classes would be improved, if the public-houses were totally closed on Sunday?—I do quite say that.

3316. Would you carry that further; should you think that the condition of the working classes would be improved, if they were closed every day in the week?—I am not prepared to say that. I am not an advocate for closing public-houses every day in the week, but if the working people come forward and said, "Close the public-houses," I would let them have their way.

3317. You are not quite sure that you would not think it an improvement?—I would rather keep myself to practical points.

3318. With great respect to you, if a gentleman commences by stating his belief that the existence existence of public-houses at any time is an evil, and that their closing every day would be an advantage to the working classes, I gauge by that the value of his opinion with regard to closing on Sundays?—I scarcely understand the question; my answer was this, that Sunday being a day of rest and a day of leisure, is a day of temptation, and becomes a day of danger and hurt, which does not apply to other days in the week; it is pre-eminently the day when the working men get the harm.

3319. Because they have leisure?—Because they have nothing to do.

3320. You would not deprive the working men of that day of rest and leisure, would you?—Certainly not.

3321. You object to the gardens and amusements which have been opened in Leeds, if I understand you correctly, on account of the amount of evil that has resulted from them to the working classes?—I would not prevent a man going to gardens, but I would prevent him getting drunk at the gardens.

3322. Was it in consequence of the drink that you objected to them?—Yes; I think that drink leads to evils.

3323. How do you think that the working classes in large towns should employ their only leisure day, Sunday, besides going to church?—I very much agree with the former witness, that we ought to have spaces of open ground laid out for them, and every sort of proper accommodation provided for the working man, so that that he may spend a part of Sunday in a manner which would be conducive to his health and his enjoyment.

3324. The only thing you would restrict him from is the facilities for obtaining drink on Sunday?—I would.

3325. You would not oblige him to do any other thing which you might or might not call religious. You would leave him free to go where he pleased, except that you would debar him from going to any public house or to any musical entertainment?—I do not know whether the question would naturally follow from what I have said; if, as I presume, the question refers to the opening of museums and galleries of arts, I am not prepared to reply in the affirmative, but if it merely refers to having open places of recreations, and going out into the country, I should not be at all unwilling, nor to have rooms open where there were books, and things such as Mr. Lupton has described; in fact, such a thing has been thought of within the last week, viz., to open rooms all over the borough for this purpose, and I should be entirely in favour of that.

3326. You do not think that a restrictive measure preventing him from going to certain places of amusement ought to be followed by any measure obliging him to go to places where he would get good?—Certainly not; I do not believe in compulsory goodness.

3327. Mr. Roebuck.] Will you explain one answer which you just now made, you said that you are not ready to give an affirmation to a proposition, which should open galleries of art to the people on Sunday?—No, I am not prepared to give that answer.

3328. May I ask you on what ground you object to art being presented to their eyes?—As a minister of religion, I conceive that a man cannot spend his day better than in attending to his family, taking out his wife and children if he wishes into the country for a walk, and for fresh air, and by attending to the ministrations of religion.

3329. Supposing that he had attended to the ministration of his religion, and that he had walked with his family in the park, and yet some hours remained to him still, might he not do well to take his children and his wife to look at the high efforts of genius, in the way of painting?—It might be so, but I do not think that is ordinarily the case, that a working man would have those hours which you speak of.

3330. But supposing he had?—I am not quite sure that I should be in favour of opening galleries, museums, and anything that would present to a working man more attraction to be away from his own family on that day.

3331. Do you fancy that looking at the high efforts of human genius, could do a man any mischief?—Certainly not.

3332. Could he improve his mind and his body better than by taking his wife and family to look at those high efforts of human genius?—The answer to that on my part would be that everything should have its own time; a working man now with us has Saturday to himself after two o'clock, and he has the whole of that afternoon to see the works of genius and high art to any extent he likes.

3333. But if they do not do harm, and are most likely to do a great deal of good, why should he not go to see them on Sunday as well as on the afternoon of Saturday?—My answer to that is, that Sunday was intended for man for another purpose.

3334. But he cannot pursue that purpose the whole of Sunday; a man cannot be praying all day?—Certainly not; I am afraid he generally does so to a very little extent. But how is a working man's Sunday to be divided? he rises as a rule about eight o'clock, and he has his breakfast; from that to nine the children have to be got off to school. At 10 o'clock, if he is a man who attends public worship, he is on his way to the chapel or the church that he frequents; he comes home soon after 12 and has his dinner; the afternoon he has for himself and his wife to walk out, and in the evening comes service again at his own chapel or church, which is over at eight, and it is then time for him to go home and have his supper and go to bed.

3335. Surely there are times when a man must have leisure, and had he not as well be in a gallery of Art as walking upon the broad flagstones of the London streets?—I cannot speak for the London streets; I speak for my native town, and I say he need not be on the flagstones at all; he may go outside the town with his wife and children.

3336. Do you think it better to go into the smoky fields near Leeds, than to go into a gallery in which he sees those high efforts of human genius?—I believe if he had a choice he would go into the fields in preference.

3337. Then why do you not leave him a choice, and give both to him, and why not let him be able if he chooses to go into those galleries?—It is not exactly the question which is before the Committee at present; but my answer is the same as before, that the working man has half the Saturday, and on that day I would open the museums, galleries of painting, and sculpture, and everything else that could possibly enlarge his mind and refine his taste, but on the Sunday I am not prepared to advocate or even to consent in my own mind to anything whatever that should seem to be a rivalry and an opposition to that to which I believe Sunday is specially dedicated.

3338. Mr. Yorke.] I understand you not to be an advocate of restriction for its own sake?—Certainly not; quite the contrary.

3339. You only consider that restrictions should be resorted to when other means have been tried and have failed in producing the result which you desire?—Exactly. In this case the word restriction seems to me to be scarcely a fair word when the majority of the community are in favour of the measure.

3340. Would you prefer the word prohibition, as regards drinking in public-houses on Sunday the measure is not so much restrictive as prohibitory?—Yes, it is prohibitory of drinking on the premises.

3341. That is to say, the public-house could not be used as a club by working men in that sense on a Sunday?—No, certainly not.

3342. Do you think that all other means have been exhausted of producing the result which you wish; do you think that drunkenness is increasing in Leeds in spite of the progress of education and civilisation by other means?—No, I intended to convey the impression that the mass of our working men are improved, but that there is a substratum which is still very much below what they ought to be.

3343. To what do you attribute the improvement which has already taken place?—Mainly to education.

3344. Rather to education than to the restrictions on Sunday drinking which already exist?—I think that the restriction of closing the houses till half-past 12 has been a most valuable one, which all working men will allow; but I believe that the great uplifting has been from the vast extension of our educational system during the last 25 years.

3345. According to the statistics which have been given to the Committee to-day, on Sunday 158 persons had been found drunk at Leeds, and on Saturday 172; at any rate that shows that there is at least as much drinking on Saturday as on Sunday?—Yes, it appears so; those figures are not mine; they have been given in by a former witness.

3346. If you had to choose, bearing in mind what you have said, that your object is to stop drunkenness, would you not prefer to choose Saturday for restrictive measures rather than Sunday, inasmuch as the drinking is rather greater on Saturday than on Sunday?—I should not, and on this ground, that whatever drinking there was on Saturday, if there were no facilities for carrying it on on Sunday the working man would be again fit to go work on Monday morning.

3347. Do you agree with what the last witness has said, that there would be little or no inconvenience caused by the closing of public-houses to the unmarried portion of the labouring classes who live in lodgings, and who have no place to sit in?—I do not think there would be any inconvenience whatever, because in all the provincial towns, nearly all differing from the metropolis, our houses are self-contained houses, and on Sunday they are made so clean and decent, that I should deem them quite good enough for myself to sit down in as an ordinary rule.

3348. Do those unmarried men who lodge at 0.69.

those houses get their meals there?—Yes, they get their meals there.

3349. Are those houses licensed; do they get anything to drink with their meals?—They would have to send to the public-house for their beer.

3350. Supposing them to dine on Sunday in those houses, what would be the usual hour at which they dine?—Between 12 and one, when public-houses would be opened according to this Bill.

3351. Then this Bill would not interfere with their procuring beer at their ordinary dinner hour?—Not in the least.

3352. I suppose your ministerial duties have given you an opportunity of estimating the comparative amount of private as compared with public drunkenness?—I should think that the private drunkenness is very small in proportion to the public-house drunkenness.

3353. In your opinion would it be increased or not by this Bill?—I do not think so for the reasons which I have already assigned, that a working man would be ashamed to get drunk before his wife and children.

3354. Mr. John Abel Smith.] With regard to that great public meeting at Leeds to which you alluded, and which you have in your memory, the object of that meeting was in reference to Mr. Wilson Patten's Act, was it not?—Yes it was.

3355. Who was in the chair?—The mayor of the borough.

3356. And it was held in the Cloth Hall yard?—Yes, a large area, where the candidates in elections for the county are used to address the electors.

3357. How many people were there present, do you think?—Fully 10,000, but I believe nearer 12,000.

3358. Were resolutions proposed to them?—There were.

3359. And were they carried?—They were, in favour, by a large majority; no doubt whatever it was by a large majority.

3360. Was it an unqualified approval of Mr. Wilson Patten's Act?—It was.

3361. Was there any public disorder or confusion in carrying into execution the provisions of Mr. Wilson Patten's Act during the year that it existed?—None whatever in Leeds.

3362. Do you believe that there would be any public disorder or confusion, if such a Bill as that now before the Committee became law?—Not at all, inasmuch as this Bill provides that for the sale of liquor to be consumed off the premises it would allow every working man to have any quantity he liked for his own table.

3363. Mr. Locke.] When you say any quantity for his own table he could only get it during 3½ hours throughout the day?—He would have it all day by sending for the quantity that he wanted to last him a day.

3364. Draught beer?—Bottled beer if he liked.

3365. Supposing that it is draught beer that he likes, and supposing that he dines at six, where is he to get his beer?—I should not think that there is a working man in Leeds, who dines at six.

3366. Are there no other persons in Leeds besides working men who buy draught beer on Sunday?—Not any I should think.

3367. Then those are the only persons who dine x 2 dine from half-past 12 to half-past two, are they not?—Our working people invariably dine between 12 and one.

3368. Then the public-houses would be shut up at half-past two until eight?—Yes.

3369. Do you think that there is no person in Leeds who would wish to buy draught beer to be consumed at his own house; not a single individual between half-past two and eight o'clock in the evening?—I would not say that, but if they have an opportunity of buying from half-past 12 to two, and again from eight to 10, I think they would have abundant opportunity for providing themselves with liquor to drink the whole day, if they were disposed so to do.

3370. But it would be very bad, would it not, if it were kept; draught beer ought to be drawn and drunk when it is quite fresh?—That is to say, it would be better drunk fresh, but there is the alternative of buying it in a bottle if you prefer it.

3371. But that is more expensive, is it not?—It is a very small charge more, which he would not feel.

3372. But supposing he does not like bottled beer?—I cannot account for his taste in that respect, and I cannot meet the difficulty.

3373. That matter you would not enter into?—No, I cannot enter into that.

3374. You do not think that anybody might be inconvenienced?—That some would be inconvenienced who had been in the habit of attending public-houses every Sunday, I have no doubt.

3375. I am speaking of this particular class of people who eat their dinner at five o'clock, and want to drink something with it, and that beer in draught?—I can have no doubt in answering that question, that the whole requirements of our working population who want to have beer to drink with their Sunday's dinner, would be amply provided for in the measure before the Committee.

3376. You would consider the working men, but as to the others you think that it is unimportant to consider them?—None want their beer on Sunday in that way, as a rule, of the tradesman class, they have it in their houses; they buy it by the barrel.

3377. Do they buy porter and ale in that way?—Yes.

3378. That is the case at Leeds, you think?—Yes.

Mr. GEORGE WALKER, called in; and Examined.

Mr.
G. Walker.

3379. Mr. Baines.] You reside in the heart of the town of Leeds?—I do.

3380. You were formerly a working man, were you not?—Yes.

3381. Were you 14 years employed in a woollen mill as such?—I was.

3382. Have you been 18 years a boot and shoe maker?—Yes.

3383. And eight of those years an employer of labour?—Eight additional years an employer of labour.

3384. Having been before a journeyman?—Yes.

3385. Have you been 30 years a Sunday school teacher?—I have.

3386. Have you also been a local preacher?—I have.

3387. Have you been agent to the Discharged Prisoners' Aid Society?—I have.

3388. Have you been secretary to the Miners' Sick Society?—I have.

3389. Have you paid very frequent visits to sick and poor people?—Very many.

3390. Have you been connected for seven years with that working man's institution of which Mr. Lupton has been telling us?—Yes.

3391. And taking a very active part in it?—I have attended every week.

3392. Having had such opportunities of knowing their habits and characters, as a member of the working classes, will you give the Committee your opinion as to whether the working men spend much of their wages in beer?—Some working men spend none at all; others are certain to spend a sum of 1 s. to 2 s. 6 d.; others will go as far as two-thirds of their earnings, be their earnings small or great.

3393. What day in the week do they spend the most money in beer?—Saturday, decidedly.

3394. Do you think that there is any connection between Saturday and Sunday drinking?—Yes, a very close connection, in my opinion. A man goes to a public-house on Saturday, when he receives his wages, and he becomes intoxicated, and there is not sufficient time between Saturday night at 12 and Sunday morning at 12 for him to become thoroughly sober, and the first thing he wants is a pint of new to quicken the old; that which he had got on Saturday night is dying out (and unless we have been intoxicated we cannot tell his feelings), he wants a pint to revive him.

3395. In your opinion, would it be better that he should have an opportunity of getting the new to strengthen the old, or would it be better to let the old quite die out?—In my opinion, it would be much better if he had not an opportunity of getting the new, because the old would be thoroughly out by Monday morning, and then he could go to his work, like another man.

3396. In what way does Sunday drinking injure the working man?—In the first place, he spends his money, which he has not to spare, he ought to spend it in food and clothing for himself and his wife and his children. In the second place it unfits him physically for his work on Monday. If he has been drinking on Sunday he cannot work on Monday; that I believe is impossible, or thereabouts. And in addition to that, he very often stays away from his work on the Tuesday, and loiters it away, or sits at the public-house, either supping beer, that he has managed to save money perhaps for, or begging a glass of beer anywhere he can. They call that dying off.

3397. You think it would be an advantage if there was a complete break in the opportunities of drinking or the temptation to drink by the closing of public-houses on the whole of Sunday?—I believe it would be the greatest blessing that ever came to the working men, their wives, and their families.

3398. Have you known many cases where men have been prevented from pursuing their industry during the week by their drinking on Sunday?—Yes; if I had every case recorded, I should have thousands before me now, but one one does not note down everything one sees; but it happens every week in the year; some classes are more notorious than others. The coal-miners, for example, and the shoemakers are distinguished, and tailors are remarkable, especially in the summer time, when the trade is good, and they can earn liberal wages; when there is most work and most money, then there is most drinking and the most time-breaking on Monday and Tuesday.

3399. Do you believe that the temptation presented to the working man by the public-house being open on Sunday has a good deal to do with drunken habits?—I believe it has a very great deal to do with them.

3400. Do you think he would drink as much if he had the opportunity of taking drink to his own home, and were it taken to his own home, do you think he would drink half as much?—I should say not a quarter as much; I cannot help giving you the expression of a person that I knew well, and whom I have seen a thousand times: two young men assisted one another, and one of them had got married, and the other said to him, "Now, Matthew, thou hast got married and hast home of thy own, cannot we buy some beer to-night and take it to thy house to drink to-morrow?" Matthew said, "If thou brings any beer to my house, I will throw both thee and the beer into the street in a minute; I am going to have no drinking at my house." I believe that that would be the feeling of nine men out of every 10. They go to the public-house to get beer, but if one were to say, "Let us club together and take it home," nine out of 10 would shrink from taking it to their homes, and would say, "No; I will not let my wife see what I do, nor my children either." I think that the morality of the working man is not so far gone as to submit to a thing of that sort.

3401. You believe, then, practically, that the effect would be that the working man who is rather subject to temptation, would, by the break of Sunday, be kept sober, at least that such would be the tendency?—I believe that he would be kept sober on Sunday, and on Monday morning he would never think of going to the ale-house to get beer, because he would have got freed from the bad effects that it had upon him on the Saturday; he would have had sufficient time to have become thoroughly sober, and he would have got washed, and shaved, and dressed, and got some bread and coffee into him, which would have made him like a new man.

3402. Are there some of the public-houses in Leeds that are closed on Sunday?—Yes; there are some.

3403. Do you know whether that has been found injurious to the interest of the owners of those houses?—I should say not; for we consider those who close on Sundays are the richest of the publicans; and I know one gentleman who keeps a public-house, who announced in the public newspapers some time since that from that time his house would be closed on Sundays.

3404. You think that the closing of all the public-houses for consumption on the premises, as proposed by this Bill, would be a good to society?—I do not know all the particulars of the Bill, but this is my impression, that the Bill allows beer to be sold out during four hours on Sunday.

3405. Would it be good to society to close the public-houses entirely on Sunday for consumption?—

tion on the premises, but to leave them open three or four hours for sale to be consumed off the premises?—My opinion is that it would be a good to us, but it would be best for the drunkard and his family, and for the publican himself.

3406. In what way do the class of men who are waiting from Saturday night to Sunday noon to get into the public-houses, spend their time on Sunday forenoon?—Large numbers of them go into the fields; we should say go down to the water-side; of course, in our town, we know what is meant by that, or, we should say, "Go to Harehills, or to somewhere three or four miles out;" some do that, some lie in bed, some collect together in small groups and stand at the street corners, or near their own doors, in the streets where they reside. In this way they spend Sunday morning.

3407. Do they go to the public-houses as soon as they are opened on Sunday?—I am sorry to say they do.

3408. And sit in them and drink?—Yes, I have seen them frequently as I have been passing through the town, as I have to do every Sunday, going from school to dinner, from east to north; I have seen them frequently on Sunday at various public-houses waiting until the door was opened, in groups varying from six to a dozen, or perhaps less; but I have seen as many as 20 waiting for the public-house door to be opened.

3409. What part of the Sunday are the public-houses most frequented?—I think we should find most people there between the hours of six and 10 on Sunday evening, and considerably more in winter time than in summer time.

3410. Do the men go there for food as well as for drink, or do they generally go there for drink only?—For drink only; if a man was to say that he was going to the public-house to get something to eat in such a place as Leeds, no one would believe what he said; it is a thing which is never done by working men.

3411. Are the public-houses much frequented by females on Sunday?—My impression, and I have got that impression from very close observation, is, that there are odd ones go; but the wives of working men do not go; and I think I may add this, that the working man would not submit to sit and drink in a public-house in public company with his wife sitting by the side of him; he would decidedly object to that.

3412. What do you think is the effect upon those females who go to public-houses on Sunday?—I think it is very injurious on themselves, and the effect is seriously felt by the husband and the children.

3413. I am speaking of unmarried people, those whom you have known as going from your Sunday-school, and other Sunday-schools; what is the effect upon them?—I think it is very injurious on the young women and on the young men also, in this way; I should like a little time just to explain this; I think that this is the most dangerous part of our present system of licensed public-houses; young men, arriving at the age of 15 or 16 begin to feel then that they are something like men; and I do not object to their feeling so; and they say, "We are too big to go to school; now, Fred, let us have a walk; let us go as far as 'John of Gaunt's House,' or let us go to 'Dick Pick's Chained Bull.'" Those are places three or four miles distant from the heart of Leeds; and it is a very nice walk, of course; when they get there, what do they do?

Mr.
G. Walker.

they say, "Let us go in and have a gill;" so they go into one of those houses and get a glass of beer each. The first time, of course, they come away as soon as they have drank it; but it is repeated, and they become bolder, and one pulls out sixpence, and says, "Bring a quart, mistress." Very well, this thing is begun and continued by our young men. And then again, I find on Sunday evening, from six o'clock to 10, thousands of young men and young women meet in Brig-gate, and Woodhouse-lane, North-street, and those places, the central streets of Leeds, and they promenade for four hours, walking up and walking down, and doing nothing else, but occasionally going up the passages to the various public-houses to get a cigar and a glass of beer, or a bottle of bitter beer, just as the case may be. I consider that this is the stepping stone to drunkenness; and it is in this way that our young men and our young women are manufactured into drunkards; because the young men are dressed up like gentlemen, and the young women are dressed up like ladies, and it is in this way that the habit is contracted, and when once the habit is contracted, we are so weak that we cannot easily break it off. Unfortunately, I find that our young men do not break it off. I think also that it injures them in another way. It destroys that forethought which ever ought to characterise young men and young women. They form the habit of spending all their money, and they go on in life upon that plan till the time comes to be married, and then they propose to be married, and get married, and they have not got as much as a sovereign, or, in many cases, not as much as will buy the ring and pay the marriage fees. What is the result? The first week they are out of work they have to apply to the parish board for relief. This, I consider, grows out of the habit which has been formed of spending their money on Sunday in beer and cigars. Working men have got no eightpences to spare for such things.

3414. I do not want to have your opinion upon the sad effects of drunkenness generally, because there is no difference of opinion at all upon that subject, but what I want especially is that you should confine yourself to what belongs to Sunday drinking; do you consider that those dangers are chiefly incurred by Sunday evening drinking?—I do indeed; it is the beginning which injured them, because if they had not those houses open on Sunday they would not begin; they would not have an opportunity.

3415. Do you think there is any need on behalf of the working classes, for the public-houses to be opened for the consumption of beer on Sunday at all?—I think not the slightest.

3416. When people go into the country, as you say some of them do, how do they obtain refreshment?—There are three ways. Some take a little bread in their pockets and eat it, and drink at a spring if they are going such a distance as keeps them away from home at tea-time. Others will go to a public-house and get refreshments, and others go into a friend's house, or a stranger's house, and say, "Mistress, I wish you would make us a cup of tea" for which they pay, and I know this is done frequently. I would not say that as many go to a private house as go to a public-house, but the majority return home again to supper.

3417. Do they need, when they return home, to go to places of refreshment and to public-houses for the purpose of obtaining that refreshment after their return?—When a man has been in the country four miles with his wife, and in coming home after the walk, and they feel tired, and want something to eat, they do not go to a public-house. But this is frequently done: the husband will say, "Now, lass, go and get supper ready, and I will be home directly; I will just call and have one pint or one glass," as the case may be, and he goes into a public-house, and I have known frequent instances where that single pint or that single glass has led to his being drunk that night and absent from his work on Monday. He had no idea of getting drunk at all when he went there, but it is this way. He goes in, and three half-pence slips through his fingers for a glass of beer; there is company there, and there is conversation about something interesting, and another three half-pence slips through, whereas if he had a shilling to pay for it at first he would not have begun it at all; the mountain of money would have deterred him.

3418. Is there much beer taken out from public-houses to be consumed in men's houses for Sunday's dinner and supper?—There is some; I should not say a large quantity. If I take the locality where I lived for 20 years; I should not rate them at more than one family in a dozen that send for beer in that way on Sunday.

3419. You have been a working man, and you know what working men are as well as what employers are; do you think that the closing of drinking-houses entirely for consumption on the premises on Sunday would be attended with hardship to the working men or with public inconvenience?—I cannot see that it would be a hardship to any working man, and I cannot see the slightest inconvenience to arise to anybody. I do not see how it can, and, being a working man myself, I know the wants of working men, and I have had a family myself, the same as other working men.

3420. Do you remember the time when the drinking-houses were open the whole of Sunday morning?—I do.

3421. Do you think that any hardship was suffered by the working men, or any inconvenience was caused to the community, by closing them during the Sunday forenoon?—I think there was no hardship whatever, but I think great good was done. And I will add here that I never heard to my knowledge one man complain of them being closed on the Sunday morning; but I have seen a marked difference myself in the appearance of the town streets on a Sunday morning, the number of drunken men, unwashed and unshaved, strolling about. As I am going through the town on a Sunday morning, I scarcely ever meet such a thing as a drunken man, that is, supposing it to be about nine o'clock on a Sunday morning. I do not know when I did meet a drunken man. I see all the public-house door-sills clean washed, and the streets as quiet as you would desire them to be.

3422. From your experience among the working men of Leeds, does Sunday drinking interfere with their work during the other days in the week?—Very seriously. If a man could be tided over Sunday without getting drunk, that is a sure proof that he will be at his work on Monday morning. I have known instances, and I believe many more could be given, where men have been kept from the public-house on a Sunday, and have been at their work on the Monday, but if they have have had access to the public-house on Sunday, they invariably broke their time on two days in the week.

3423. You have been a Sunday-school teacher for many years; can you say what effect Sunday drinking has upon the youths of the town?—If I am allowed to form my opinion more particularly of those that have grown up under my own eye, and there is a large number who have grown up under my own eye, I have known them born and grown to men of 30 years of age, upon whom it has had a very injurious effect indeed; they have left the school, and have become habitual drunkards; this I see every day of my life.

3424. Why is it that Sunday offers greater facilities than any other day for drinking?—I know no reason but this; they have no employment, they are dressed up, and they want to fill up their leisure time; therefore they go to a beer-house, as I think I have stated before.

3425. You have heard what the Rev. Mr. Jackson has said with regard to the effect of Sunday drinking upon females; would your knowledge of the population of Leeds bear out what he has said as to many young women owing their fall from virtue to the habit of Sunday drinking?—I should attribute more to that than to any other cause, but I think I should agree to this, that it is not so bad now as it was when we used to have music in our public-houses on Sundays; there is not the same attraction.

3426. You are connected with the Working Men's Institute; what number of working men have you in that institute?—The numbers vary, but I would say that, at the lowest, from 300 to 600 daily; that is to say, from 300 to 600 will go in and out of it daily.

3427. What effect do you think those institutions have upon working men?—My impression is, that the effect is good morally, socially, and intellectually; and I hope it does them good religiously, but that is another point.

3428. Do you sell any liquor at your Working Men's Institute on Sunday?—No, we give them plenty of cold water.

3429. Do you find many drunken men come to your institute?—Not many. I have known such cases, and I will add, happily for the man, he has become a sober man afterwards.

3430. Do you find that working men can meet together and spend a social evening without beer?—The working men do that every day at the Leeds Working Men's Institute.

3431. By hundreds?—Yes, by hundreds. I have known 600 in that place, or, perhaps, 700 or 800 spend the whole evening without any beer at all.

3432. Have you ever known the working men in Leeds agitate against Sunday closing?—No, I have not; but I noticed this sometime since; and I believe it would be just when the present Bill was introduced that the publicans and beer-house keepers put on the walls a flaming placard calling upon the working men to bestir themselves; telling them that their liberties were in danger, and to be on their guard, and to meet in masses to oppose it. I have heard of no agitation past that.

3433. Do you remember the public meeting that was held in the Town Hall of Leeds four years ago?—I remember that meeting, and I was there that night.

3434. Is your opinion the same as that which Mr. Jackson has expressed, that there was a very large majority for closing?—The majority was very large. There were very few that opposed the motion.

3435. Was it five or six, or something like that, who held up their hands against the motion for closing?—I cannot, at present, give the number, but there were very few. It was very remarkable. And I remember the meeting at the Cloth Hall yard also 10 years ago.

3436. Do you agree with Mr. Jackson that there was a large majority at the meeting in favour of closing public-houses on Sunday?—There were; and I can say, further, that I know there were publicans there, because I stood beside some listening to the various speakers.

3437. Did you ever know a public meeting summoned with greater publicity, and greater knowledge on the part of the whole community, of what the object of the meeting was than that meeting?—The whole town knew it.

3438. And there was a decided majority in favour of closing?—There was.

3439. Do you apprehend that there would be any discontent, or agitation, or disturbance if the public-houses were closed on Sunday in the manner proposed by this Bill?—I apprehend no disturbances. Give us cheap bread, and the working people will not quarrel over the beer on Sunday, I am certain.

3440. Mr. Locke.] You say that the reason why people get drunk on Sunday is, that they have no employment?—Yes; one reason.

3441. Do you object to their dressing themselves and walking up and down the street?—I do not object to them dressing themselves, nor do I object to them walking up and down the street.

3442. You think that if there were no public-houses it would be a very reasonable thing for them to do?—Yes; I believe that they would walk up and down the streets just the same.

3443. Do not you think that it would be better if they had some more rational amusement than merely walking up and down the streets on Sunday?—I wish they had.

3444. What would you suggest as a mode of counterbalancing the influence of public-houses on the Sunday for the working classes?—Perhaps you will allow me to say this: I think walking up and down the public thoroughfares is better than sitting in a noisey smokey public-house. As to what I would suggest as recreation, I have my own views. I should certainly open, if it could be open, such a place as our Philosophical Hall. I would open, as I suppose we soon shall have, our public library. I would open, if it was closed, our Woodhouse Moor, which is a large open common near the town; and I would have other places something like that; because, whether it favours the Bill or not, I cannot help saying this, that people must have something for Sunday. I cannot see that our working men, men that are accustomed to activity six days in the week, can sit in arm chair moping over a fire all day on Sunday. We must have something for them to do; but there are a hundred things that would be better than sitting in a public-house.

3445. What amusements are there at the Moor that you speak of?—Nothing, but walking about and enjoying the purest air that Heaven can send us.

3446. Would you go a step further than pure air and walking about?—As an individual; yes, I would.

Mr.
G. Walker.
—
1868.

3447. What would you suggest?—If my friends get to know all I say, I know they will find fault with me. I should not object to a band of music myself; not as an individual, but I should willingly submit to the majority, and if they said we had better not have a band, I should not urge it.

3448. But you think that a band of music would be an advantage?—I think there is nothing so sweet and so heavenly on Woodhouse Moor as a band of music.

3449. Do not you think that the introduction of things of that sort would lead very much indeed to the diminution of drinking on Sunday, because, if a man is out on Woodhouse Moor listening to a band of music, he could not be at the same time at a public-house drinking gin?—If the drinking custom remains as it is, it would be a tenfold evil to bring people on to Woodhouse Moor and a band of music, because there is the Manor House there, and young men and young women would assemble there, and they would be always thirsty, and always running in.

3450. That is so at Leeds, is it?—I would like to say, for any gentleman's information, that it so in London. I witnessed that yesterday; a number of young men and young women had been not more than a quarter of an hour, or from that to half-an-hour, from leaving the pier head on the Gravesend boat than they began getting their bottles of bitter beer, at 7d. per bottle, and swallowing it in two or three minutes; both young men and young women. I saw myself scores of bottles drunk in that way yesterday.

3451. That was at Gravesend, was it?—No; it was between London Bridge and Gravesend that it was drunk. I took the boat yesterday to go to Gravesend. I wanted to be where there was, as I thought, some pure air. I did not much like this smoky London. I had my eyes open, as I have endeavoured to have through life. You referred to its being the practice of Leeds. I merely wish to remind you that it is the practice of London, so that human nature is about the same; and if you give facilities to young men and young women they will indulge in these evils.

3452. They did not get drunk, I hope?—There were persons drunk before we reached Gravesend.

3453. Were they drinking on board the boat?—Yes.

3454. Did they take it with them?—No, they bought it; they went down into the cabin and brought it up; I suppose they got it there; they bought it from the steward.

3455. You went on an excursion yesterday to Gravesend?—Yes.

3456. Then, you have no objection to excursions, of course, if you indulge in them yourself?—I do not object to people going there.

3457. Only when they commit excess?—I wish to give this as my opinion, that it is an evil to young men and young women to be allowed the privilege of drinking on Sunday in public-houses, and that was a public-house for them for the occasion; but let them go to Gravesend without beer, then there is no harm, at least to me; I do not think it wrong.

3458. What refreshment did you take yourself yesterday when you went on an excursion to Gravesend?—I will tell you honestly; I got up at six in the morning, and I went to Chelsea Hospital to see an uncle of mine, who happens to be there; I was told that I could not see him until one o'clock; I said to a College man, where can I have my breakfast this morning; he pointed to a coffee shop, and I went in, and called for a cup of coffee and some bread and butter; the man brought it; I gave him 2s. 6d., and he gave me 2s. 3½d. back out of it; I paid him all he charged, and I suppose it was honest; I then had a walk to London Bridge, and took the boat, and I got my dinner after I arrived at Gravesend.

3459. What hour might you have arrived at Gravesend?—Say one o'clock; within a few minutes either way.

3460. Where did you dine then?—Three or four doors above the pier; I do not know the name of the house; there was a boy standing at the door, and he said, "We have beef and mutton, beef and mutton;" so I knew that beef and mutton would suit me as well as anything.

3461. You had something to drink, I suppose?—Yes; the good lady brought me a glass of cold water, which I drank freely.

3462. That had no bad effect upon your head?—No, not at all.

3463. Did you take nothing but cold water?—I did not.

3464. Is that your habit?—No; I sometimes occasionally take beer, for this reason; we used to sing, as lads, "Johnny Brew'd a Peck of Malt," but it happens that Mary brews a peck of malt with me, so that I occasionally get a glass of beer that Mary brews.

3465. Supposing a person has not a Mary belonging to him, and he is thirsty, as you might be, what is to become of him?—I am very happy to say there is no man that lives in Leeds but that either has a Mary, or he can have a Mary.

3466. But I suppose it is not every man in Leeds who is able to keep a Mary?—That man is happily provided for in this way; he goes into lodgings; that is his home; his food is provided for him on Saturday night in 99 cases out of 100, and it is carved out for each day in the week, and that is as much his home as my house is mine with Mary; it makes no difference.

3467. But who brews this man's beer?—The mistress that he lodges with will brew it if he wants it; or, if not, she will fetch him a gill, or, if not, when she goes to market she can bring half-a-dozen gill bottles of Bass's, or Guinness's, or Bentley's porter, or anybody's he likes; we have as great a variety at Leeds as anywhere.

3468. Is not that rather a roundabout way of getting it?—I think it is the most convenient way of getting it; it is ready to your hand, and you have nothing to do but draw the cork and sup it.

3469. But that bottled beer is effervescing, is it not?—No, it is not.

3470. Then is not bottled beer that is carried about in that way, and that is not effervescing, very nasty stuff?—My impression is that beer is sold in thousands upon thousands of bottles every week; the people have it in their own homes.

3471. But you would not prefer it in that state to when it is drawn fresh from the cask?—I prefer it best when it has been brewed about a week out of our little tub.

3472. And put into a bottle and carried about by Mary?—Yes, I like it all the better if she brews it, and carries it about, or fetches it out of the cellar.

3473. I am speaking of those cases where there is only a Sarah, perhaps, where the man lodges?—It is in this way: In Leeds there are, I think, think, many houses where they sell bottled beer, which I know has been bottled by themselves, and you can get half-a-dozen bottles. I have done it myself and taken them home and used them when we have wanted them.

3474. You do not wish to prevent people from drinking beer on Sunday, provided they do not drink it in a public-house, or provided it is bottled?—I should not object to a man going for a gill of beer or sending for it, but I think he would be better without it on Sunday.

3475. Why should he not eat his dinner on Sunday and drink his beer in the same way as he would on Monday, seeing he has more time to do it comfortably?—I say I do not object to it.

3476. You have spoken of the institute that you have at Leeds; is it a working man's club?—No, it is an institute open where working men can go in at nine in the morning and remain until 10 at night; say, from nine till six in the evening, there is nothing going on, but the newspapers. Any man that is out of work can go there and look at the advertisements. In the evening there is the reading room, which has all the papers in it, and there is room set apart for chess and draughts; nothing else; and besides that there is a large room where we have various kinds of musical entertainments and lectures, and sometimes discussions.

3477. What refreshments are there there?—There is nothing, but cold water, unless you want tea and coffee, for which you have to pay; you can have that if you choose, but nothing besides that.

3478. Tea and coffee, and bread and butter, I suppose?—Yes, they will boil you an egg, or if you take a steak they will fry it for you.

3479. Can you do that during the whole day?—Yes, the whole day; people can have anything to eat during the day.

3480. You have all descriptions of refreshment there with the exception of fermented liquors?—Yes.

3481. And those are not allowed?—No.

3482. They have ginger-beer, I suppose?—No.

3483. Nor soda-water?—No, nothing but water or tea and coffee.

3484. You have not introduced chocolate yet?—No, it is too greasy for us.

3485. How many subscribers are there?—A penny a-week constitutes a member; if you take a penny ticket you can go in as often as you like during six days. Sometimes the number will be as low as 500, and I have known them as high as 2,000.

3486. Is it open on Sunday?—It is open on Sunday afternoons and Sunday evenings; but the men do not frequent it much on Sunday.

3487. Then it has not the effect of attracting them entirely so as to prevent their going to public-houses?—No; if the workmen who belong to the institute are in the habit of going to public-houses, it appears not, but I do not know that they are; some of them may be, but I am not aware that they are.

3488. Chairman.] Though you are a master now, you have been a working-man yourself?—Yes, I have.

3489. And whilst you continue to follow your trade, you occupy yourself in doing what good you can?—I do.

3490. You will not think that I am asking the question offensively, but I suppose naturally you meet with a good deal of thanks and respect for the exertions which you make for the good of others?—Yes, I should say so.

3491. Do not you think there are some who, whilst they own that you are doing a great deal of good, sometimes look upon you as going rather far; are there not many working men who do not support you while they show you all respect?—Some men would say that I am going too far in advocating this Bill, and they would say let things be as they have been; but I should find a large number who would not hold up their hands whether it were to close them or to keep them open. They are the indifferent class; and I find another class, which I think would be the majority who would say, "Close them according to the present Bill." I have not neglected to listen to what people have said about this. I have talked to, I should say, hundreds of individuals in passing as I come across them daily, coming into my shop, and so on.

3492. You must be aware that there are a great many, say, of the working classes, who do not interfere with you, who let you go on with your movement in support of such a change as this, but, at the same time, you know that they do not agree with you?—Yes, there are many who would not agree with me, though they would not oppose it.

3493. You are putting in operation many good plans for reforming your neighbours, but is it not the case that you have not sufficient faith in those means, but you want to get the law at your back?—All the means that I have seen tried hitherto have been inadequate; I have seen them tried now, say, for 30 years; I have been trying for 30 years, still I find that they have not accomplished that which we have desired; but that new drunkards are continually being manufactured from our boys and our girls, and to make a man a drunkard is to make him one of the most expensive creatures that there is almost in the kingdom.

3494. We are, of course, not disputing about the desirability of putting a stop to intemperance, but besides all the voluntary means which you are putting in force, you now want to put the screw on, and to compel people not to get drunk by preventing them having the means?—Yes; I think it is the best thing that can be done to put the screw on.

3495. Would you also put the screw on many people who do not want to get drunk, but want to indulge themselves in a moderate way?—Here I see a difficulty, and I know that that difficulty exists; I know that there are some men who go to a public-house, and who never get drunk; they go on Sunday night, say, and have, say, two glasses or three glasses of beer, and they do not get drunk, but they come to their work on Monday morning; I have known many instances of that sort, and that there are many such I cannot possibly deny, and this class I cannot complain of; but whilst they are doing that, am I sure that they will continue to do so? Is it not likely that they will slide from this moderation to intemperance, and become habitual drunkards?

3496. The majority of the people who use public-houses do not get drunk, do they?—The majority do not get drunk, that is to say, the majority of the population do not get drunk.

3497. So that you are advocating a severe restraint, and a compulsory change in the habits of a great number of persons in order to restrain a few who cannot restrain themselves?—Yes; but the

the class that we should deprive of this social enjoyment, that enjoy it rationally, I think, would not be more than one in 10 of the whole of the male population.

3498. But still the principle being generally that a man may do as he likes, so that he does not interfere with his neighbour's rights and property, you are proposing to prevent their doing as they like, not for their own benefit, but to prevent others doing themselves harm?—Yes; I think it is good for a few to make sacrifices for the good of the whole; this principle must be acted upon in society.

3499. Quite so; that is a Christian duty; but you are going to compel them to make sacrifices?—Yes; I find that the law often steps in and compels us to do things which we should not otherwise do; but, then, when the law says you must do it we soon learn that it is for the good of the whole, and we learn to be obedient and do not complain.

3500. The law frequently tells a man that he must not do something or other that would be for the injury of others that would interfere with other persons liberty and property, but you want, do you not, to prevent a man doing something that hurts nobody else in order that you may save some third party doing himself harm?—Yes; I certainly should advocate that the one in 10, supposing there to be one in 10, should be deprived of that privilege for the good of the whole, and I think that would be equitable and according to the laws of our country, for I find myself that liberty is that which the law allows and nothing more; because if I wish to keep a dog you say to me you shall not do so unless you send us up here 5 s. every year. So far as my experience and observation goes, we must, some of us, feel inconveniences by the working of every law.

3501. That is not quite a sequence, is it; you say to a man you shall not keep a dog unless you pay 5 s., and you say to a man you shall not drink a glass of beer unless you pay for it, but it would be a different thing to say you shall not keep a dog at all?—Yes, it would, certainly; but I think that few would be very glad to make a sacrifice if you would only let them free.

3502. Mr. Roebuck.] I gather from you that the leisure of Sunday conduces in a great measure to the mischief which happens on that day?—Yes.

3503. And you, in order to prevent mischief, want in some way a law to interfere with and prevent a man indulging in certain things which he wishes to indulge in, such as going into a public house?—Yes.

3504–5. Do not you think that before the law does that it ought to take every precaution to make sure that it has employed all the means in the power of the law without that coercion?—I think myself that the law when it was altered to close the houses on the Sunday mornings was a step in the right direction; and having found that it works so admirably, and everybody approves of it, even the drunkard himself, would it not be wise in us to take another step in the same direction.

3506. The way I put it is this: Would you coerce a man in that way before you have decided that you have taken all the means in your power without appealing to that coercion?—I would at present coerce the man.

3507. But would you coerce the man without having ascertained that you have taken all the means in your power to obtain the same end without coercion?—I think we have tried.

3508. You have just now said that there ought to be recreation for the working men; has the law given the working man all the means in the power of the law to employ those hours innocently and happily which they have at their disposal on Sunday?—The law has not given us that; but does not the law give us what necessity requires? As soon as we discover the necessity for a thing, then the law steps in and supplies that need; but so long as the public-houses provide that place of amusement and recreation where men can spend those leisure hours, there is no need for the law to step in; it is acting now.

3509. I do not think you have quite seized my proposition. You say that mischief arises from want of employment, and I ask you if the law ought to prevent a man going into a public-house without ever having ascertained that it has employed all other means possible for his enjoyment of those hours of recreation. For example, has the law permitted our exhibitions of art to be at the disposal of the working men on Sunday?—No.

3510. You say that he has hours which he is very prone to employ in a pot-house; would not the law do well, before it resorted to coercion, to give him every possible facility for employing those hours in an innocent, rational, and proper way?—It would be a good if the law would give it them at once; but as the law has not done that, and seeing that the other is so great an evil, it had better step in and do the other thing, and then the law will provide the second thing.

3511. Put yourself in the position of the Legislature; do not you think it the duty of the Legislature, before it takes those coercive measures, to adopt all other means in its power that are not coercive; would you begin by the harsher means before having tried the milder and better plan?—No; I have never myself adopted harsh means first; I have generally stroked the head, and spoken kindly to a boy first.

3512. That is what I want you to do now for the working man; stroke his head and show him beautiful pictures, and allow him to go in and see works of art; would you object to that?—No, I would not.

3513. Therein you differ, do you not, from the preceding witness?—The Rev. Mr. Jackson and I may not agree upon all points; we do not come here to agree upon everything.

3514. Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen.] I think you said, did you not, that one in 10 of the population of Leeds might be taken as using those public-houses on Sunday for drinking on the premises?—I hardly remember saying that.

3515. Do not you think that a very considerable number do use them; I think you said about ten per cent.?—I think I said, speaking of the class of men who went to get a pint of beer on Sunday, but who did not get drunk, that those might be one in ten of the men.

3516. Do not you agree with the statement of one of the previous witnesses who said that five per cent. of the whole population might be taken as drinking in public-houses on Sunday?—That might be, but I alluded only to one class of drinking men in public-houses.

3517. Supposing that to be correct with regard to this public-house drinking, of which we have heard so much, the whole population of Leeds being being something over 200,000, and this meeting, which you alluded to, being stated to be attended by 10,000 persons, of whom the majority were in favour of this Bill, why should we take the expression of opinion of that 10,000 being five per cent. of the population of Leeds more than the ten per cent. who gave a practical expression of their adherence to the present law by attending those public-houses?—For this reason, if I had been opposed to the Bill when the mayor had called the meeting, I should have felt it my duty to go there and oppose it; and if I did not go, my absence would approve of the decision of that meeting. I had an opportunity of going; all was done that could be done to warn me of what was going to be done, and then if I am absent the fault is with me. As we say, “Silence gives consent.”

3518. Do you mean to say, that if I do not like either of two candidates at an election, and I do not vote for either, because I do not care about them, that, therefore, I approve of the man who succeeds?—I should say you did not care, but that you believed that the one was as good as the other.

3519. Does it not come to this, that the expression of a meeting of that size in the town of Leeds, could not be taken as signifying the real feeling of the whole population of Leeds upon such a subject as this?—We do take it so in all matters for anything I know. I do not know any other mode of testing the feelings, or of understanding the opinions of men but that.

3520. It is possible that a great number of people did think that it was very unlikely that any further restriction would be imposed, and, therefore, they would not trouble themselves to go and oppose it?—No, I should not think so.

3521. You said that you thought that this restriction was best for the publicans themselves. Do not you think it wise, so far as the publicans’ interest in the matter is concerned, to leave them to decide for themselves?—I think it would be best for them for the law makers to say, “You shall rest one day in seven.” For example, a sickly man may be a physician, but I am told they always send for another physician; they will not treat themselves; and I think it is so with publicans to a very large extent.

3522. You think that they would ask the opinion of another publican; but do you think that they would be content with your expression of opinion?—They will not legislate to close the houses themselves, but if the law makers step in and say you shall close them, they will acquiesce, and there will be nothing more about it.

3523. That shows, does it not, that they are a respectable body of men, who obey the law?—I am not disposed to find fault with them myself.

3524. Do not you think that if it was really for their interest, that great organisation which we have heard of would be in favour of this Bill instead of against it?—Yes, if we could get every man to be of one mind, but I find that we cannot. You know there is disunion in all trades.

3525. Then the majority, I suppose, carry the sway?—Yes, but you cannot compel the others to close. That has been tried hundreds of times in the case of early closing. Some will keep open untill 10.

3526. Do not you think that if this restriction was carried into effect a great number of those who are now apathetic in the town of Leeds would find themselves thoroughly aroused to action?—If this Bill were to become law, I believe that in a month from now there would be no more disturbance in Leeds than there has been for the last twelve months. It would pass over, and we should know nothing at all about it, any further than that we should have fewer cases of drunkenness. That is my opinion of Leeds.

MR. SAMUEL GREENWOOD JOWETT, called in; and Examined.

Mr.
S. G. Jowett.

1868.

3527. Mr. John Abel Smith.] ARE you Superintendent of the Town Mission, at Bradford, in Yorkshire?—Yes; I am.

3528. Formerly, were you in the Town and City Missions of Halifax and Manchester?—Yes.

3529. Were you originally a boiler-maker by trade?—Yes; I was.

3530. At Manchester and at Stockport?—Yes; and at Hull, and also at Bradford.

3531. You are thoroughly practically acquainted, are you not, with working men and their habits and dispositions, and wishes in those towns?—I think I am to a great extent.

3532. Have you seen the Bill which has been introduced into Parliament, and referred to this Committee?—Yes; I know the provisions of it.

3533. Are you in favour of further restrictions on the Sunday drinking of beer in England?—I am.

3534. For what reason?—Because I consider it detrimental to the poorer classes; more especially detrimental to the morality and to the families of the people.

3535. Is it not true that the Sunday drinking entails on others than the drinkers themselves the loss of their time on the Monday?—It does to a great extent.

3536. Will you explain that to the Committee?—Because in many trades, such as boiler-makers, smiths, brick setters, and in some cases engine-fitters and moulders, those who are off drinking on Sunday and Monday hinder those who are their mates or partners in work for Monday, and very often for Tuesday. I have had sorrowful experience of that myself, and I know that there are thousands of cases of that kind.

3537. Are you in trade at this moment?—No.

3538. Chairman.] Have you no occupation beyond assisting in the Mission?—No; I have been 11 years in connection with Town and City Missions.

3539. In fact, as a missionary?—Yes.

3540. Mr. John Abel Smith.] Do women drink much now at Bradford?—Not to a very great extent, as far as my experience goes.

3541. Do you think that they drink more than they used to do?—I could hardly say; I have not taken notice of that for many years.

3542. Do you think that there is more drinking among young persons than formerly?—There are a great many young persons found in public-houses on Sunday evenings at Bradford.

3543. Is that one of your objections to public-houses being open on Sunday evening?—Yes, that is one great objection.

3544. Last winter you took notes, did you not, of what occurred in various public-houses at various times?—I took notes of the number I found in them, and a few observations besides.

3545. Will you state what numbers you found in them?—I visited the public-houses and beer-houses in Bradford during the last winter, from November to January, from seven to ten o'clock on Sunday evenings, and I found in 137 houses 2,596 persons. We have, according to the returns of the chief constable, 443 beer-houses and public-houses in Bradford; so that, in the same proportion, there would be in Bradford about 8,394 persons in public-houses at one given time.

3546. Out of a population of what?—130,000.

3547. You do not mean to say that you remained there during the whole of those three hours?—No; I mean between the hours of seven and ten. We usually set off about quarter to seven, and commenced our visiting by seven o'clock.

3548. Was there music and dancing, or anything of that sort, in those public-houses?—I saw no dancing, but very often a fiddle and a piano were going.

3549. Were they singing sacred music or songs?—No; I never heard much sacred music singing. In one house, in the district of Bowling, there were 24 persons in one room, mostly young men, and one was singing, accompanied by a fiddle and a piano, one of the most obscene and filthy songs it is possible to imagine. I believe the song has not been printed. I have tried to get it, in order that the Committee might have a copy of it, but I cannot obtain it.

3550. Were there a good many prostitutes amongst those who attended the house?—Not in that case; but generally in the public-houses we find them, and I have found six, seven, and even nine in one house, on a Sabbath evening.

3551. Chairman.] Persons who appeared to be or whom you judged to be prostitutes?—Yes; there was no mistake about them, because their dress and manners showed it fully.

3552. Mr. John Abel Smith.] Generally speaking, in Bradford do you believe that the feeling of the more respectable working men is in favour of further restriction on Sunday drinking?—I do.

3553. Have

3553. Have you had any public meetings at Bradford on the subject of Sunday closing?—We had a public meeting about the 16th or 18th March, in St. George's Hall, which holds 4,000 people: it was not full, but there would be about 500 persons present, chiefly of the working classes, and resolutions were past in favour, not merely of the Bill which has been introduced, but of closing for the whole of the day. I was asked to say a few words at the meeting, and I jestingly put it to the audience whether there were half-a-dozen men in the meeting who would like to have their houses next door to a public-house, and if there were I hoped that they would hold up their hands; that resulted in the hand being held up, and a voice from the audience said, "He lives in one."

3554. Who took the chair?—Mr. Alderman Mark Dawson, in the unavoidable absence of the Mayor. It was a town's meeting called by the Mayor.

3555. The Mayor meant to have taken the chair, did he not?—Yes, he did; but he had a prior engagement for the evening to which the meeting was altered.

3556. Was he understood to be favourable to the object of the meeting?—There was no remark made about that at the meeting, I think.

3557. Did his substitute, Alderman Mark Dawson, say anything in favour of the object of the meeting?—He said that he had not made up his mind either way, and so he thought he was a safe man to take the position. He was not decided about it.

3558. But there was hardly any opposition, was there, at that meeting?—There was some little opposition. There were two or three speakers who advanced arguments for things remaining as they were, but by way of vote there were only about 20 or 30 hands held up in the meeting against the resolution proposed in favour of closing for the whole day.

3559. I suppose, like a great many other towns in the north, the majority would be in favour of total closing on Sunday, would they not?—That is the case in Bradford.

3560. If all are in favour of total closing you would accept the Bill which has been referred to this Committee, merely as an instalment and the best you could get?—We should be very glad of that if we can get nothing else, but, I believe, we are prepared to go a little further in Bradford, than all that I have seen and heard.

3561. But you would consider this Bill a great boon, would you not?—Yes, it would be one.

3562. I presume your past experience and your daily habits make you personally acquainted with the general feeling in the manufacturing districts?—Yes.

3563. Do you believe that the provinces are very much prepared for a greater restriction on the drinking of beer at public-houses on Sunday?—Yes, I do. I was in Manchester a fortnight ago attending a meeting of the Manchester missionaries; they have 88 city missionaries at Manchester, and I took the opportunity of putting the question to them, as to how the people of the poorer classes in their district felt about the matter, and they said that they were nearly all in favour of this Sunday Closing Bill or of a total Sunday Closing Bill.

3564. If such a Bill as that referred to the Committee were passed, should you anticipate anything like disorder or confusion or public resistance?—No, not at all; I believe that the respectable working classes are quite prepared for this, and even for the whole of the day; they want to save their children from ruin and distress.

3565. There are, I suppose, in Bradford, as there are in most towns, a certain number of roughs?—Yes, there are.

3566. Would they make a disturbance, do you think?—No, I should think not.

3567. What would the respectable men do if the roughs tried to make a disturbance?—I can hardly tell what they would do; I suppose they would assist all they could in getting things straight again as regards mob law.

3568. What I mean by asking the question is, are the working men of Bradford zealous enough to lend themselves to preserve quiet, if there was any inclination to create a disturbance?—I think there is no doubt about it, from the fact of the meetings that we have had. There has been a series of lectures upon this subject in Bradford, given by Dr. Campbell, and Dr. Russell, and other ministers in the town, and I think that the minds of the people are thoroughly permeated with this subject, and they are all fully acquainted with it in Bradford.

3569. Have you had any canvass in the place?—No, I do not know that there has been. The fact is, the Committee for the Permissive Bill have been canvassing the town, just to get an idea who was in favour of it, and it would have thrown them into confusion had they commenced to canvass on the Sunday closing question, or I believe it would have been done. One of our missionaries, I may say, tells me in a letter, "In the course of a week's visitation," he says, "I met with 120 men, to whom I put the following question: Are you in favour of Sunday closing? And 101 of those men answered in the affirmative; those men are working men, many of them slaves to the drink, and the majority of them Sunday drinkers." That is the only canvass that I am aware of, any further than the general statement of the members of the Alliance Committee, who have told me that there had been a misunderstanding on the subject, the idea being that it was for the Sunday Closing Bill, but when it is explained to them, some of them said that they would have signed it if it had been for Sunday closing, but they would not sign for the Permissive Bill; and that shows, from their general feeling, that had it been for Sunday closing, I have no doubt the result would have been in Bradford, as it is in other towns, six or eight to one in favour of it.

3570. What I understand to be the summary of your evidence is this, that you find that the existing state of the law gives a room or licence for indulgence in this temptation which opposes or neutralises the efforts made for the moral and religious improvement of the people?—That is so.

3571. You distinctly believe that you are speaking the feeling of Bradford as a whole when you say that the town would be in favour of further restriction on Sunday drinking?—I really do believe that I am speaking the feeling of an overwhelming majority of the people of Bradford.

3572. And further, although it does not quite come up to your own wishes and idea of what is required, you wish success to the Bill which has been referred to this Committee, and approve of its provisions?—Yes, as far as it goes, I do.

3573. Mr. Baines.] Do you believe that the magistrates

Mr.
S. G. Jowett.
1868.

magistrates of the borough would generally approve of this Bill?—I believe that they would, but I am not in a position to say for certain, that they would; I think there has been no expression of opinion by them.

3574. Have you had any opportunity of ascertaining what is the opinion of the ministers of religion of all denominations generally with regard to this Bill?—I am acquainted with all the ministers in the town, for I have to send them circulars every month, except the clergy.

3575. What is their opinion of the Bill?—They are all in favor of it.

3576. Are they very decidedly in favour of it?—Decidedly.

3577. What is the opinion of the Sunday-school teachers?—I am not connected with Sabbath schools, and I have not had much connection with the teachers.

3578. Do you know whether many of the Sunday scholars are found in the public-houses on the Sunday evening?—I found some when I was visiting the public-houses.

3579. I believe the Mayor of Bradford is Mr. Law?—Yes.

3580. Do you know that Mr. Law has signed a paper, recommending the Bill proposed by Mr. John Abel Smith?—I am not aware of it, he was not at the public meeting.

3581. However, that is a fact; what should you say with regard to the wives of the working classes generally; do you think that they would be favourable to a Bill like this?—Most decidedly; they cry out about the drinking habits of their husbands whenever we are visiting them, and they do wish that something was done in order that their husbands might be saved from the temptation, and kept at home.

3582. Do you think that the families of the working classes, generally, would be at all materially bettered in their circumstances, made happier, more peaceful, better fed, better clothed, and better educated if this Bill were passed?—I do indeed, arising from the fact that, many of them leave their families on the Sabbath day, and spend all the hours they possibly can in the public-house. Moreover, it continues their Saturday evening drinking, extending to Monday, and they lose a day or two at the beginning of the week, many of them, besides spending their money.

3583. Do you think that it would be a considerable improvement to close for the sale of liquor to be consumed out of the house at 10 o'clock, rather than at 11?—Yes, I believe it would.

3584. Have you seen a considerable number of persons in the public-houses between 10 and 11 o'clock?—Not betwixt 10 and 11. I have generally finished my visiting by 10 or a quarter past at the farthest.

3585. There are very large employers of labour, are there not, in the large factories, and iron works, and so on in Bradford?—Yes.

3586. What is their general opinion with regard to the probable operation of the Bill for closing the public-houses for consumption on Sunday?—I have not made any formal canvass of them to ascertain their opinion; but the few that I have met with and mentioned it to are decidedly of opinion that it would be of a great benefit to the working men in their employ.

3587. As far, then, as you know of the working classes themselves also, by a considerable majority, would be in favour of this Bill?—Yes.

3588. I believe I have nearly gone through all the classes of Bradford; are there any classes in Bradford that you know who would not be favourable to this Bill?—There are the publicans and those who are continually drinking at the public-houses; but even a great many of those wish to be saved from themselves. As the quotation which I have read from the letter says, those men are slaves to the drink, and continual Sunday drinkers, and yet they say that they would be very glad if such could be done.

3589. Do you know whether any publicans have expressed any opinion in favour of this measure?—I am not aware. I know that they put out some bills similar to those mentioned by the Leeds witnesses when the Sunday Closing Committee advertised a town's meeting in the Mechanics' Institute, and for fear that there should not be a free discussion allowed, and as the Mechanics' Institute only holds about 1,000 or 1,100 people, they took the St. George's Hall in order to ascertain the real opinions of the people.

3590. I think you have resided some time in Halifax?—Yes, I have.

3591. Can you tell us whether the feeling there is like that in Bradford?—I cannot say with regard to the feeling of the working classes. I was going to say that the drinking customs are of a similar nature, for I visited the public-houses in Halifax on the Sabbath evening, but I never took note before this past winter.

3592. You have been yourself a working man, I think?—Yes, I have.

3593. And for a great many years?—For 10 years I was a boiler maker.

3594. And you think that you know well what the feelings and wishes of the working men are?—I think I do, to a great extent.

3595. And their opinion is what you have expressed, that on the whole there would be a large majority in favour of this Bill?—Yes, a large majority in favour; there is no doubt whatever about it.

3596. Mr. Malcolm.] You say that you think there would be a majority of something like eight to one amongst the working classes in favour of this Bill, at all events; with such an enormous preponderance as that, could not they do anything to help themselves without interfering with those who might not wish it?—In what respect?

3597. In abstaining from going to the public-houses?—Yes; but you understand something, I dare say, about men's passions, especially with reference to drink; and, as I have just said, there are a great number of them who would be glad if the temptation was removed out of their way.

3598. And without that removal they are not able to restrain themselves?—A great many of them are not.

3599. Mr. Locke.] And they have no consideration for those people who can restrain themselves?—I did not ask them the question.

3600. They only said that they wanted to take care of themselves?—Just so.

3601. In what places do you say that you know that the wishes of the working men are in favour of this Bill?—In Bradford; I cannot answer for any other place than that.

3602. You say that you have not asked them generally through the place?—I have ascertained it in the case of a thousand families.

3603. Whom

3603. Whom have you asked in those families?—I have asked the heads of the house.

3604. Male or female?—Male, of course.

3605. Do you say that those were persons very much addicted to drinking, a great many of them?—No, I did not say that. This was the statement of the missionary in the case of the 120 that he asked just in one district of the town.

3606. Do I understand that he asked 120 drinking people?—Yes he did.

3607. Were they all drunkards?—No, not all drunkards; they were in the habit of drinking; they were slaves to the drink; he puts those words, and the majority of them Sunday drinkers.

3608. Slaves to the drink and continual Sunday drinkers; that was the expression, was it not?—Yes.

3609. All those 120 were slaves to the drink and continual Sunday drinkers; were they sober when the question was put?—Yes.

3610. Considering that they indulge to this great extent in drink, they wish all the public-houses to be shut up on Sunday?—That is their wish.

3611. What did they say about Monday?—They did not say anything about the Monday.

3612. Did they make any reference to Saturday night?—No.

3613. They did not say that they wanted the public-houses shut up on Saturday night?—There was no question asked about that.

3614. What was the precise question that was put; I suppose it was drawn out already, cut and dried?—This is drawn out cut and dried, because it was given to me by the missionary himself; and the question he put to them was, "Are you in favour of closing the public-houses on Sundays?"

3615. But there was no other question put?—No; I think not.

3616. And it assumed that they would be open all the rest of the week?—Yes; I suppose it would be so.

3617. Supposing that all those public-houses were entirely closed on the Sunday, what do you suppose that those 120 men who are slaves to drink and continual Sunday drinkers would do on the Sunday?—Stay at home with their families.

3618. They would all stay at home with their families, would they?—I hope so. I cannot answer for that, but I hope they would; there would be a better chance for them to do so.

3619. When they stayed at home with their families, what do you think they would do?—Instruct them I hope, and teach them something good.

3620. You think that all of these 120 drunken men would turn of a sudden and stay at home with their families, and teach them something good?—I do not think so, but I hope so, and I believe the majority of them would do that.

3621. Do you not think that many of those 120 men, not having had their minds properly regulated, would find that rather dull?—Yes; perhaps they might.

3622. Do you think they would then look out for some other excitement?—I dare say they might take a walk into the park.

3623. Would they take their wives out with them?—Yes; I think so.

3624. That would be a very great improvement there is no doubt?—Yes, when they have got something to take them out in.

3625. Would you furnish them with some other recreation than merely walking into the park; if there were a band of music in the park for them to listen to, would you have any objection to that?—I could not sanction anything that would tend to a desecration of the Sabbath.

3626. Then you would leave those men either to sit at home, or what else?—Or to attend the House of God, or take a walk out.

3627. And those are the two things that you would leave to them?—Yes.

3628. And you think that those are the only two things that a man could do on the Sabbath, as you call it, but I call it Sunday?—If there is anything else of an innocent nature, I should have no objection to it.

3629. And you do not consider that listening to music is innocent?—Yes, in itself it is; but there are always some associations with it that are injurious, I believe.

3630. But there are associations that are injurious, if people choose to make them so, everywhere, are there not?—Yes, I daresay.

3631. There have been bad associations in people going to chapel even; that has been known before now?—Yes, but we had better not increase the number of those that we have any doubts about.

3632. Then you would not let them go to chapel?—Yes, I would; I would urge them to go.

3633. But what I ask you is this, whether if persons are evil-disposed, there is any single place that they can go to where they may not act wickedly instead of properly?—There is the Working Man's Institute open on Sunday.

3634. But I ask you whether, if a person is evil-disposed, there is any possible place that he may go to that he may not turn to a bad purpose instead of to a good purpose?—Yes, I should think they cannot do that in the House of God; not openly, at any rate.

3635. But they have to go there and they have to come back, have they not?—Yes, that has always satisfied me ever since I knew anything about things. During the years I was a working man I neither wanted a public-house open or any other place.

3636. Nobody supposes that you did; but as you are as proper a man as could be selected for the question to be put to, I ask you this: supposing they were debarred from the public-house and nothing else was found them for the purpose of recreation, what do you suppose they would do?—I can hardly say what they would do. We should have a better opportunity of bringing them up to a higher level.

3637. You stated, did you not, that the 120 people who were asked the question about this Sunday closing and the Permissive Bill were all against the Permissive Bill, and were in favour of the Sunday closing?—I did not say that. The statement I made was in reference to the Permissive Bill canvass, and not to the 120 men; and a certain number were against the Permissive Bill who would have signed if it had been a Sunday Closing Bill.

3638. They were in favour of the Sunday closing and against the Permissive Bill, is that so?—Yes, a number of them were.

3639. Will you be kind enough to say whether they stated any reason for their entertaining that opinion?—Many of them said that when they went into the country they wanted somewhere to call at.

Mr.

1868.

Mr.
S. G. Jowett.
1868.

3640. I mean those who were in favour of the Sunday Closing Bill and were against the Permissive Bill, what reason did they give to you for being in favour of the one and against the other?—Simply because they would want to get something to drink.

3641. On week days?—Yes; and they thought they could not do it if there was none sold.

3642. What was their ground; was it that they did not like drinking on Sunday, or was it that they did like drinking, but not on Sunday?—On account of the immorality of the thing.

3643. They did not think it was immoral to get drunk on Monday?—They did not say anything about getting drunk; it was as to getting drink.

3644. That was only on Sunday?—There is a difference between getting drunk and getting drink. I was not saying anything about getting drunk.

3645. However, they were against the Permissive Bill because it would prevent their drinking on all the other days?—Yes; but with regard to Sunday they considered that it ought to be a day of rest.

3646. Chairman.] You have stated that there were a number of persons in certain public-houses in the town upon the Sunday evening who might be considered as about five or six per cent of the whole population?—Yes, I suppose it would be that. I have given the Committee the numbers.

3647. Of course the greater portion of those would not be consenting parties to their being prevented from going to the public-houses on Sunday?—The greater portion of them perhaps would not, but many of them would.

3648. You make the recommendations that you put to the Committee clearly seeing, do you not, that you would be putting an involuntary restraint upon that large number of persons?—Yes.

3649. Are there not a great many working men (as you have spoken of the feelings of working men) who are very averse to being too much restrained; I do not mean bad men, but men who think that they should not be too much interfered with, and that they ought to have freedom of action?—With regard to the better and more respectable class of working men, there are very few of them but would be in favour of this Bill.

3650. You would not say that you know so much about working men as to say that there are very few, would you?—Very few; I mean, taken in comparison with the whole of the working men of the town.

3651. Very few of these you know?—Yes; but I have a general acquaintance with working men, and I know the type of men generally, they do not differ so very much in a town.

3652. Do not you think that there are differences of opinion among working men, just the same as in any other class?—Just the same.

3653. You find, do you not, that some take one side and some the other of every question, just the same as any other class?—They do.

3654. Do not you think that on the whole, knowing that you had a strong opinion upon a certain point, they would not be likely to come and argue with you, but would rather avoid argument upon that point?—They are independent enough generally to express what they mean about anything.

3655. Are you not more likely to meet men who agree with you than those who do not?—Not from the fact that I am in favour of it.

3656. If you could not have all you wish you would like to have a change in that direction, would you not?—Yes, very much.

3657. Would you consider it a great advantage so far if you could get half the Bill, that is to say, if you could get the public-houses closed on Sunday except during four hours, and, during those four hours only, people should be allowed to buy liquor?—Yes, I believe it would be an advantage on account of the number of people gathered together in public-houses.

3658. If it were thought by those who consider all classes of opinion that this Bill was proposing to go a little too far, you would take an instalment, would you not, rather than have none at all?—Yes, I would, rather than have none at all.

3659. Mr. Horsfall.] I think you stated, in reply to the Honourable Member for Southwark, that there were 120 persons who had been met with by one of the missionaries who were slaves to drink, and who were in favour of closing public-houses on Sunday?—Yes.

3660. And, in addition to that, you stated that you had yourself visited a thousand families who were in favour of entirely closing?—Not a thousand families in favour, but a large majority of a thousand people; the heads of families.

3661. What proportion of the thousand families would be in favour of entire closing?—I should think, though I took no note of it at all, that there would be two-thirds at least.

3662. And those were of the working classes?—Yes, they were.

3663. And what proportion does that thousand families bear to the whole population of Bradford?—The population of Bradford is 130,000.

3664. Then you have only tested it to 1-130th part of the population?—That is all, but it was not done with any design of this kind. The proportion tested was one in 26, allowing five persons to a family.

3665. Had you a house-to-house canvass?—There was a house-to-house canvass for the Permissive Bill, but we had not a canvass of the town generally.

3666. You told the Committee that there had been a large meeting at St. George's Hall; what was the precise object of that meeting?—To pass resolutions in favour of closing for the whole of the day. That feeling in Bradford is rather stronger than in favour of Mr. Abel Smith's Bill.

3667. What resolution did that meeting come to?—Most decidedly they were in favour of closing the whole 24 hours.

3668. You are yourself generally in favour of the proposal of closing the whole day, are you not?—Yes, I am.

3669. And you would prefer that to Mr. Abel Smith's Bill?—Yes, I should.

3670. But you have already been asked whether you would not prefer an instalment to letting matters remain as they are?—Yes, I would.

3671. You prefer that they should be closed for the 24 hours, and the less they are open the better?—Yes.

3672. Has drunkenness increased at Bradford lately?—I have only been in Bradford three years and five months, and therefore I am not able to say.

3673. Have you noticed whether there is a greater proportion of drunkenness amongst the men men than amongst the women?—It is more amongst the men than amongst the women.

3674. Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen.] You have not known Bradford very long, have you?—I lived in it 16 years ago, but since then I left it for some years, and I have been there now three years and five months.

3675. It is rather a good place for large meetings, is it not?—Yes.

3676. The people are rather excitable there, and if anything agitates the public mind, they meet in large numbers, do they not?—Yes; I believe they take their part in anything that is brought before them.

3677. Did you ever attend a reform meeting there?—I have been once present at one.

3678. Where was that meeting held?—In St. George's Hall.

3679. Was it quite full?—No, nothing near.

3680. Have there not been some very large meetings held there?—There have been lately, in connection with various political matters, but not reform meetings specially.

3681. What sort of number do you get at meetings on political matters?—In connection with the Irish Church, and meetings which Mr. Miall addressed, and such like, the place was always crowded.

3682. Have you not seen a report of a meeting at Bradford on the Irish Church question, at which there were 10,000 persons present in the open air?—I do not know, there may have been, I never attended any political open air meeting. I remember seeing the advertisement of such meeting, but did not attend it, or read the proceedings.

3683. At this meeting at St. George's Hall, something less than three per cent. of the population were present?—Yes.

3684. Therefore that subject was not so interesting to the population as some other subjects?—No, it was not; circumstances had not arisen to cause the same excitement on this subject.

3685. What class of people are the Sunday school teachers that you were asked a question about?—They are chiefly working people.

3686. Are they persons who frequent public-houses at all?—No, I should say not.

3687. They do not require it?—I do not know that, they will make other days satisfy them I think if they do.

3688. That is not their habit?—I have not met with any.

3689. The large employers of labour who are in favour of Sunday closing, do not frequent public-houses on Sunday, do they?—I have not met with them.

3690. They have got their own houses?—Yes, they have their own houses.

3691. The ministers of religion, do you find them in public-houses on Sunday?—I do not.

3692. Therefore, those three classes who are unanimous in condemning the opening of public-houses on Sunday, are three classes of persons who do not require them for themselves?—They do not require to go to them.

3693. Mr. Yorke.] What are the duties of the mission that you belong to?—To visit from house to house, to read the Scriptures, and instruct the people generally, and persuade them to go to a place of worship.

3694. Does that give you large opportunities of knowing what people's opinions are upon these kinds of subject?—Yes, it gives us an opportunity of knowing.

3695. At this meeting which was held in Bradford, that you speak of, you put a question from the platform, whether there were any persons there who would like to live near a public-house, and there was only, I think, one person who said that he would; I suppose that any house, where the public resort much, would be considered as more or less deteriorating the value of house property in the neighbourhood, would it not?—Yes, I believe it would.

3696. For instance, a school?—No, not places of that kind, because they come out from those places as sensible as they go in, or far more so; but you seldom find that to be the case with a public-house, you know.

3697. Is it not the case, that anything which introduces crowds of persons, even though they are orderly, tends to affect the value of house property in the neighbourhood?—I have never heard of such a thing, with regard to anything but a public-house.

3698. If the streets are crowded with noisy children going out to play, or assemblages of persons who come from time to time for any purpose, making more or less noise as they came and went, would not that interfere with the quiet of a man's dwelling, and so far deteriorate the value of his property?—Yes, it might, but it is not a common case. I have never heard of such cases, and if so, there is always easy means to redress a wrong of that kind, I think.

3699. You think that a public-house is an extreme case?—Yes, I do.

3700. Mr. Baines.] On how many nights at the close of the year, between October and January, did you visit public-houses in Bradford?—On seven Sunday evenings.

3701. On the week-day nights did you visit in the month of April, last month, some public-houses?—Yes.

3702. As to those, what was the number that you found?—In 78 houses I found 641 persons.

3703. And that would give how many for the whole 443 public-houses?—About 3,640, as compared on Sunday evening with 8,394.

3704. In the one case there were seven nights and the other case only three nights?—Yes.

3705. Then you must make allowance for that?—Yes; I only reckon an equivalent proportion.

3706. What was the proportion of women on those seven Sunday evenings?—The proportion was one woman in 13.

3707. I want to know the proportion that you found there on Sunday evening and the proportion that you found there on week days; what is the comparison?—On the week-day evenings in 78 houses I found 641 persons; so that, in the 443 houses that we have in Bradford, there would be 3,640 on the week evenings, as compared with 8,394 on the Sabbath evenings. I took the Wednesday and Thursday evenings, and visited them.

3708. What is the proportion between the week evenings and the Sunday evenings; is it $2\frac{1}{2}$ to 5?—Yes, I think that is the proportion.

3709. So that the upshot of the whole is that the proportion of persons attending on week-day evenings is not one-half the proportion on Sundays?—Not one-half. I wish to say that I visited them on those week evenings to compare them, because I knew that I was coming here. I did not visit them them on the Sabbath evenings with any idea of the kind. As I have stated to the Chairman, I visited the public-houses on the Sabbath evening giving tracts, talking to the people, and doing the best I could, merely as missionary work; but, during the month, as I went round, I found so many that I thought I might as well have notes of the number of people in each; that is the reason why I took them. I never took them before.

3710. Mr. Malcolm.] Then you did not compare the same times of the year, one being in summer, and the other in winter?—It just happened so; I did not do it with any intention, but the evenings would be nearly the same in April as in October, I apprehend.

The Reverend SAMUEL ALFRED STEINTHAL, called in; and Examined.

Rev. S. A.
Steintthal.

3711. Mr. John Abel Smith.] ARE you a Non-conformist Minister at Manchester?—I am.

3712. Are you resident there?—Yes.

3713. How long have you been resident there?—This last time I have been resident there about four years.

3714. Have you for a considerable number of years paid very close attention to all matters connected with the social effects of the law regulating the trade in intoxicating liquors?—Yes, for more than 20 years.

3715. Have you had good opportunities of forming an opinion as to the operation of the present laws, and the need of their amendment?—I think so.

3716. Are you in favour of extending the existing restrictions on the sale of liquor on Sunday?—Yes.

3717. Were you for eight years the first minister to the Liverpool Domestic Missionary Societies?—I was.

3718. And were you then brought into daily communication with the skilled artisans of Liverpool and the dock labourers, and not unfrequently with the criminal classes?—Yes, I was in constant communication daily with all those classes.

3719. And were you connected with several Reformatory Institutions there?—Yes; my work lay so very much amongst those various classes that I was compelled to take part in various reformatory movements of different kinds; for instance, I was visitor for some time at one of the boys' reformatories, and I used very frequently to visit one of the girls' reformatories, and I found it necessary in the course of my work to establish a special refuge of my own, where I could receive, without any previous testing of character, any women whom I found about in vicious practices and habits.

3720. Are you aware whether there is now a very large amount of Sunday drinking in Manchester?—I can speak both for Manchester and Liverpool, and I believe that there is a very large amount of drinking going on, on Sunday evenings especially.

3721. Are you at all cognisant of any calculation that has been made of the numbers frequenting public-houses in Manchester on Sunday?—There was a calculation made, but I have not got the figures; it was made at a time when I was not in Manchester, and I have not got the figures, and I could not at this moment lay my hands upon them.

3722. But it is probably a very large attendance indeed, is it not?—Very large.

3723. Were you secretary of the Liverpool Provident Society, which collected annually a large amount of the savings of the poor?—I was not the secretary of the society; I was one of the district secretaries of the Liverpool Provident Society. They divided the town into something like 30 districts; I forget the exact number; and I was secretary of a district which collected the largest amount of savings of any district in the town; I was secretary of that district for somewhere about seven or eight years.

3724. Do you think that that gave you special advantages in knowing the habits and disposition and manners of the working classes?—With regard to Sunday drinking especially it gave me this advantage; I was obliged in fulfilling the duties of secretary, at least as visitor of that society, to go round collecting at various houses of the people, and I chose for that purpose an early hour on Monday morning; I had under me at that time somewhere about eight to 10 visitors who pursued the same course, and who reported and paid in the money to me. This brought me on Monday mornings to a great number of houses, and a little bit of practice soon showed me what had been done on the Saturday night, and the Sunday, by the inmates of those houses; I found the effect very strong indeed: that persons who had received large wages on Friday or Saturday were very often unable to pay anything on Monday morning, because the amount had been spent in drink; and there were some curious little things which gradually came to my notice in connection with that visiting. The people did not like the appearance of not being able to pay on Monday morning, and I have known such things as persons pawning articles of clothing or of furniture on the Monday morning early, so that they might be prepared for me, or any other visitor, with a sum of money to put in as savings; they seemed to be ashamed of having to confess their want, or rather their extravagance on the other nights.

3725. You are connected with the United Kingdom Alliance, are you not?—I am one of the executive committee of the Alliance.

3726. And with the British Temperance League also?—I am a member of the British Temperance League, and I was for three years the honorary secretary.

3727. Is it in virtue of either of those positions that you have made inquiries of chief constables and others?—No, it was not in that connection. That has been done in connection with the Central Sunday Closing Association. We sent out circulars to the chief constables of the chief places all through the kingdom, but we have not received replies to them all. The circular that we sent out was to this effect, headed with the name of the association: "To the Chief Constable at []. Please furnish us with the following particulars as to the number of persons apprehended for drunkenness and drunk and disorderly on Sundays. Number of persons []. On the whole of the other six days of the week []." In reply to that we received answers during the year 1866 from Bolton, Birkenhead, Bristol, Kingston-upon-Hull, Dublin, Newcastle, and Warrington. In the the year 1867 we received replies from Birkenhead, Birmingham, Blackburn, and a long list of places, from which it appears that on six days of the week the number of drunken cases that came under their charge was 44,031, and on the Sunday 12,214. I am sorry that those reports have been taken from 12 o'clock on Saturday night until 12 o'clock on Sunday night, because from what I have heard since the Committee sat, I think it would have been better if we had taken rather a later hour.

3728. From those figures it would appear that the proportion of drunken cases was considerably greater on the Sunday than on the other days of the week?—Yes; I have not only those replies, but I have in my hand several statements from the chief constables, in which they make remarks upon the subject; some of them very strongly in favour of restrictive measures. For instance, I just open one from Hull, in which the chief constable sums up his ideas in this way: "In my opinion, the only way to prevent drunkenness on Sunday is to prohibit public-houses being opened on that day." There are, however, some reports which are the other way. There are some that state that they are in favour of keeping the law as it is at the present time. These are the special statements (handing in the same).

3729. You do not consider, do you, that the police statistics do give an accurate picture of the amount of drunkenness existing in the country?—I do not believe that the police returns give an accurate account of what the condition of things is in a place. The instructions to the police officers are always of such a nature that they do not measure the actual intemperance of a community. They are very valuable, taking them year by year, and comparing them, because you can compare year by year and see what change has taken place; but if you wish to know the real state of sobriety or of intemperance, you must visit in the homes of the people, and see what is going on.

3730. Do you believe, as the result of all your inquiries, that a great number of the working men are in favour of the total prohibition of drinking on Sunday?—A very large number are in favour of it.

3731. Not the majority, do you think?—I believe the majority are. Indeed, I have some facts upon that subject. The Committee with which I am connected, of the Central Association, was anxious to obtain, as far as possible, an accurate knowledge of the state of things among the people, and we sent out to a large number of towns circulars asking them to make, if possible, a house-to-house canvass to inquire into the views of the people upon this question, giving a schedule to be circulated from house to house, which should be filled up by the householder and returned; and I have brought a copy of the form with me, which I can show the Committee. It is a blank form headed with the title of the association: "Household Canvass Schedule.—A Bill is now before the House of Commons having for its object the greater restriction of the sale of intoxicating drinks on Sunday. The action of Parliament in this matter will very much depend upon the wishes expressed by the people. A very large proportion of the people are of opinion that the trade in intoxicating drinks should be put upon the same footing as other trades, and the present restrictions extended to the whole of the 24 hours of Sunday. On behalf of the association we represent, we shall feel obliged if you will signify your wish in this matter by answering the following question: Are you in favour of extending the present restrictions on the sale of intoxicating drinks to the whole of the 24 hours of Sunday?" Then there is a place for the Christian and surname, a place for the residence, a place for the trade or profession, and then three columns, "Yes," "No," "Neutral." "Please give your opinion by making a cross thus + in the column marked yes, no, or neutral." And this was signed by the officers of our society and circulated pretty widely. Various towns took the matter up, and we supplied them then with the following directions: "1. Each ward to be divided into districts of, say, 250 houses, and one captain for each district. 2. Each captain to secure for himself the services of five men to take about 50 houses each, the captain having first arranged with the ward secretary of the district. 3. Each captain to deliver to his men a memorandum book for putting down anything special, also a paper for every house in his sub-district. 4. The captain to copy into a book name, residence, trade, how voting, &c., from the papers when returned, and send the same duly cast out to the secretary. 5. Urge your men to put aside every engagement until the canvass is complete, as it is very urgent." We have also had printed forms directing the canvassers, which I have brought with me also; I will only mention one of them. They were instructions given in order to make the thing as correct as possible. For instance, we gave instructions that if the occupier could not write, the name was to be filled in by the canvasser, but he was to sign by the side of it with his own initials, to mark it, and special instructions were given to canvass every publican and beer-seller. We have received returns to that form from 56 different places, but the canvasses of all those places, I am sorry to say, are not complete; there are some of them that are still in progress, but the general aspect of the thing is pretty strong. We have had them from Brierly Hill, in Staffordshire; from Hanley, from Kirkham, in Lancashire; from York, from Chapeltown, near Sheffield; from Audley, in Staffordshire; from Little Hulton, in Lancashire. The latter are small places. Also from Burslem, from Staveley, Buxton, Salford, Stoke-upon-Trent, Boston, Ramsbottom, Farnworth, Newcastle-under-Lyne, Heywood, Bury, Altrincham, and a long list of places, and amongst others, Manchester, about which I can, perhaps, give some more accurate information than about the others. The result of that canvass hitherto, making it up to what I was able to make it up to last night, was 88,876 persons in favour of total closing, 13,809 against, and 11,127 declaring themselves neutral. With regard to the way in which the canvass was got up, to show the accuracy of the thing, I have brought with me the canvass copies of some of the wards of Manchester which we completed.

3732. Mr. Horsfull.] Was the aggregate number which you have stated the return from all those towns?—Yes, from all those towns; the 88,776 were all householders.

3733. Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen.] Do you put side by side in the return the number of householders in all those towns?—I cannot do that in all those cases. Here is one of the canvass books for one of the wards in Manchester (producing the the same) which will show how we do it. The very fact of there being some slight discrepancies in the addition show the bona fides of the thing. The result of the canvass is this: the number of houses visited in that ward were 2,446, but we have returns for a number slightly in excess of that, namely, 2,465.

3734. Mr. John Abel Smith.] There might be more than one man in one house?—Yes; very possibly there may be more than one; there may be two householders in joint occupation. This is one of the worst wards in Manchester; it is the St. John's ward, and it contains Deansgate and all the streets that run off from Deansgate; I think, perhaps, in some respects the lowest, as far as regards moral condition, of any district in Manchester, and the returns there in favour of were 1,474. "No," 364; "Neutral," 175; "Refused" (that is, would not have anything to do with it), 201; "Out when the canvasser called," 203; "Empty houses," 48. The book entered up with each street, each number in the street, the name of the person inhabiting the house, and, wherever possible, the occupation. I may say that I have not brought them into the Committee-room, but I have in London all the autograph schedules filled up.

3735. Chairman.] How are the funds provided for this sort of work?—By private subscription.

3736. Under the auspices of the society?—Yes.

3737. Mr. John Abel Smith.] Was not a great deal of this canvassing work done voluntarily?—Out of 560 canvassers, perhaps, that we had in Manchester, I believe, with the exception of ten or a dozen, at the outside, they were all voluntary canvassers. I have also the canvass of the New Cross Ward, which is thoroughly a working man's district, in Manchester; and the summary of the New Cross Ward gives us, 2,251 in favour, 278 against, 165 neutral, 113 refused to answer, 37 houses empty, and 106 persons not at home when the canvasser called. That was a large ward, and I have brought specimens, if any one likes to see them, of the autograph schedules of the various people. I only want to show that we have really done the thing as much as possible with accuracy, and with a desire to get at the truth of the case. There were some more towns on that list, that went on a different plan rather to what we had done. Instead of taking the schedule that we put out with the simple question, "Are you in favour?" they put in a further form, as to whether they were in favour of restriction. Leicester, Stockport, Bolton, Brymbo, Rochdale, Grimsby, Derby, and Wrexham, went upon that plan, and I have the returns here of those places as well. In the Leicester return, of which I have here the form, the question was, "Are you in favour of closing public-houses and beerhouses during the whole of Sunday?" "Would you prefer that the sale of drink should be allowed during any part of Sunday?" "Do you prefer the law as it is?" The return is in nine sheets, for the districts canvassed in Leicester, and it gives in the abstract that 113 professional men were in favour of total closing.

3738. Colonel Fane.] By professional men, do you mean public-house keepers?—No; I mean by that lawyers, medical men, clergymen and ministers. Manufacturers and tradesmen, there were 1,629; working people, 6,104; publicans and beersellers, 22. For total closing, 7,908; in favour of further restrictions, 706; in favour of the law remaining as at present, 19 professional men; 288 manufacturers and tradesmen; 1,953 working people, and 147 publicans and beersellers; making a total of 2,407 as against 7,908.

3739. Mr. Malcolm.] Does the return represent the entire population of Leicester?—I do not think it does. These are the districts of Leicester that were canvassed. There were not the entire town that I know, but only certain districts were taken in order to be a type of the whole town. It was too great a task if the committee were to undertake the whole town. Those people who make the return are, of course, householders and occupiers.

3740. It is only a canvass of part of the town, and we do not know what districts they were?—I am sorry to say that I cannot inform you.

3741. Colonel Fane.] Can you give the total number of occupiers in those districts?—No, I have no return upon that subject. I have a similar classified list for other places. For instance, here is one with the signature of the chairman of a public meeting attached to it, and this meeting passed a resolution, "That this meeting is of opinion that the Sunday closing canvass has been conducted fairly, and the result as stated is a correct one." It gives the number of houses canvassed in Ramsbottom, a small manufacturing place about 13 miles from Manchester. I have here also a return of the canvass papers collected in the parish of Staveley, which, as is well known, is one of the colliery district; and it is well known because of the great strike that took place there, and the contest amongst the working people. That return shows that of the various householders there were 900 in favour, 57 against, 54 neutral, 6 persons refused, and 81 persons not at home. A few publicans are amongst those that said yes. I have also some of the Welsh Returns, and they are all included in that long list which I put in.

3742. Chairman.] Do you state generally that the result is the same?—Generally speaking, the result gives a very large majority in favour of total closing wherever it has been tested. I can say this much, that in those parts of Manchester, in which the warehouses are situated, where the occupiers are merchants and men in good circumstances, and in the districts in which those gentlemen reside, the returns are not so favourable to the closing of public houses as they are in the clearly working men's districts of New Cross and St. John's, and St. Michael's wards, the working men's wards, those are the strongest in favour of closing.

3743. Was the question which you put to those people, whether they would have them closed altogether on Sunday?—Yes.

3744. Even for the sale of drink to be consumed off the premises?—Yes.

3745. Mr. John Abel Smith.] Do you conceive that the parties who are in favour of total closing wish success to the Bill now before this Committee or not?—I should say, yes; they wish success to this as an instalment of what they want to get.

3746. Do they not look upon the Bill now before the Committee as going far enough?—No, not far enough.

3747. Do you personally yourself apprehend that such a Bill as that before the Committee would, if it were carried into a law, produce anything like disorder or confusion or violence amongst amongst the people?—No, there is not the slightest danger of that.

3748. Do you believe that the respectable working classes would resist any movement of that kind?—Any riots of the kind that you indicate, they would resist certainly.

3749. But in Manchester and in all towns there are a considerable number, are there not, what are called roughs?—Yes.

3750. Would you have any trouble with them, do you think?—No, I think not.

3751. Do you believe that the respectable working men would side with the administrators of the law in preserving peace, if there were any disturbance?—I do not think there would be any disturbance, but I am sure that the working people would side with the authorities; and what more, in one of those wards which I have been speaking of, New Cross Ward, which contains, I believe, in Ancoats the greatest number of roughs that we could find in Manchester, I believe that they would be strongly in favour of the measure.

3752. When will the canvass of Manchester be complete?—That would be a difficult thing to say; I left Manchester yesterday, and the committee there knew that I should be examined to-day, and I fear that that will rather stop further canvassing.

3753. But you put in the results as far as you have gone?—Yes; the results, as far as I have put them, for Manchester, include numbers like these: 27,612 in favour, 4,096 against, and 2,190 neutrals; that is as far as we have gone. Besides that, this morning I received a return from Manchester. That return says that the city, including all the houses within the Parliamentary boundaries, was divided into 15 districts, and 426 houses have been visited. The householders are divided into classes for statistical purposes; Class 1, comprising clergymen, ministers, solicitors, physicians, surgeons, ladies and gentlemen, civil engineers, auctioneers, secretaries, schoolmasters and schoolmistresses; Class 2, brewers, innkeepers, and lodging house-keepers; Class 3, grocers, drapers, chemists, booksellers, and tradesmen generally; Class 4, blacksmiths, carpenters, bricklayers, journeymen mechanics, and artisans; and, Class 5, labourers. The following is a summary of the canvass: Class 1. Yes, 67; No, 24; Neutral, 17; refusing to receive the canvassing papers, or to give an opinion, 9; persons from home, empty houses, and lost papers, 10; Class 2. Yes, 18; No, 27; Neutral, 4; refused to receive canvassing paper, 33; total, 92; Class 3. Yes, 79; No, 40; Neutral, 9; refused to receive paper, 115; persons from home, empty houses, and lost papers, 5; total, 198; Class 4. Yes, 83; No, 75; Neutral, 55; refused to receive canvassing paper, or to give any opinion, 214; persons from home, empty houses, &c., 14; total, 441; Class 5. Yes, 82; No, 70; Neutral, 53; refused to receive canvassing papers, &c., 181; persons from home, &c., 2; total, 398. I have also just had a note giving me a report of what is going on in Sheffield, but the canvass there is not yet completed.

3754. In addition to those, has there been any canvass of the employers of labour?—Yes; we went out to the various employers in the country to form for them to fill up, if they were in favour of our measure. This is simply a statement, therefore, of those who are in favour of our measure. I cannot speak to any canvass on the general question; but we have, from a long list of employers that I hold in my hand, employing 77,707 hands in all branches of labour, a return that they are strongly in favour of closing public-houses, as a benefit to them and to their workpeople.

3755. Have you any workshop canvasses?—Yes, we have done that also. We thought that a household canvass did not touch the lodgers amongst the workpeople, and that it would be advisable, therefore, to go into the workshops whenever we had an opportunity, to see what the opinion of the workers was upon the subject. We asked them the simple question also, whether they were in favour of closing or not, and we put into their hands a paper, and left them to fill it up. We canvassed the workshops of Dixon and Company, of Manchester, timber merchants, the Globe Spinning Company, the Manchester Carriage Company, Hall, McKerrrow & Company, Whitworth Brothers, merchants, Parr, Curtis, and Company, machinists, and a large number of others. I am sorry to find that I have not got all my papers with me. I thought I brought everything, but I have left a larger list of workshops at home than I have brought with me; but that which I have got here shows a very large majority of the working people in favour of the total closing, which I will put in, and I will furnish the remaining workshop canvass that I have. I may say that all those papers were filled in by the workpeople themselves. They received their schedule in the morning and it was brought back and collected in the afternoon.

3756. There was no solicitation?—No solicitation and no argument with them, we had not the time; it would not be allowed in a workshop to have any argument upon the subject, it was simply placed in their hands and collected again without any talk upon the subject, simply getting their opinions unbiassed.

3757. Mr. Knatchbull Hugessen.] Did they have that circular which you mentioned?—Yes, they had this form which I have here. That was the exact form which was put before them (handing in the same) with a slight difference in the wording of the question. One was worded "Are you in favour of increasing the restrictions," and this is simply "Are you in favour of closing."

3758. Mr. John Abel Smith.] Speaking generally, you wish to see the Bill before this Committee become law?—Yes.

3759. Colonel Fane.] This Bill proposes that during certain hours drink may be procured to be consumed off the premises; do not you think that that would lead to a considerable amount of illicit drinking, and that the people would take a great deal of liquor to their own houses, where they would not have the supervision which to a certain extent now exists, and that drunkenness would exist very much more in their houses?—I, perhaps, have not as great faith as some of the gentlemen who have been examined before in the supervision which those public-houses have at the present time.

3760. Then you think that that which I have indicated would not be the case?—No, I have no fear of that.

3761. Mr. Malcolm.] You take a great deal of interest in this Bill, and you have attended this Committee, I think, from the first?—I have.

3762. I think you said in the first paper that you put in with regard to the Sunday drinking, that it was taken from 12 o'clock on Saturday night to 12 o'clock on Monday morning?—Yes, I ought to have said Sunday night, I meant the 24 hours.

3763. In reference to those voluminous canvasses and statistics which you have put in from Leicester, and so on, you say that they were only partial canvasses, canvasses of certain districts of the town; do you really consider that canvassing certain districts in a town is a fair test of the feeling of that town?—If the districts are fairly chosen; if you take, for instance, one district which is a thoroughly working class district, another which is a shopkeeping district, and another where professional men live, I think you get at the general average of the opinion.

3764. If you were canvassing London, would you take St. George's and St. Giles, and put them as two specimen districts of their classes?—Yes.

3765. Mr. Locke.] I think you said that the police statistics were not much to be relied upon as indicating what was the state of drunkenness?—Not as indicating the absolute amount of drunkenness.

3766. And I think you went on to say that it is necessary to ascertain the state of the sobriety in the homes of the working classes?—Not to ascertain the state of sobriety, but to visit in the homes, to see what is really going on amongst the people. You must be familiar with the house of a person before you can know what his habits are.

3767. How have you ascertained the habits of the people in their houses; was it by visiting?—By constant visiting.

3768. What do you say is the state of sobriety, generally speaking, in the houses which you have visited?—I find a great amount of intemperance amongst the people of Liverpool, and at the same time I do not wish to say that all the houses that I visited were the houses of intemperate people; but I did find more intemperance in my daily visits than I think is generally imagined to exist by persons who are not equally familiar with the condition of things.

3769. That was in their own houses?—Yes; but do not misunderstand me in thinking that I found them always drunk at home. I do not mean that; but I saw, from the state of the houses, that they were intemperate people who lived there.

3770. They were people who got drunk there?—No, I do not say that; they were not people who got drunk there. Very rarely indeed is it found that working men get drunk at home.

3771. How is it that they do not get drunk at home?—Because they get their drink at the public-house.

3772. Supposing they could not get it at the public-house, do not you think they would have it somewhere?—I do not see how they could. If you stop the sale I do not see how people are to buy.

3773. But you do not stop the sale; the sale is not stopped by this Bill?—No, not by this Bill; I thought you were speaking generally. By this Bill they will take the drink home.

3774. You are assuming total abstinence?—I thought that your question assumed it. By this Bill they would certainly be able to take drink home.

3775. That is just the point I want to ask you about. You say that you have gone into the houses of persons and have found drunken persons; but you say that they have got drunk at the public-houses; if the public-houses were open for three hours and-a-half every Sunday, do you not think that there would be an opportunity of their buying liquor and taking it home, and getting drunk at home?—There would be an opportunity, no doubt.

3776. If a man took a quantity of liquor home he would take a tolerably good supply if he was a drunkard, would he not?—Very likely he would.

3777. Would not he be more likely to get drunk in that way than if he merely went into a public-house and took a pint of beer?—If he restricted himself to a pint of beer, yes; but if he was an intemperate man he would not.

3778. He would not be likely to take merely a pint of beer home if he was a drunkard, would he?—In our part of the country, it would be rather introducing a new system; people do not generally take drink home. The trade is in drinking on the premises rather than in supplying for consumption at home.

3779. Supposing the only opportunity that man had of drinking on Sunday, unless he got a good store already in his house, was, by taking it home to drink it, do you or do you not think that that would be done to a great extent as in his leisure day, and he has nothing to do, and he has acquired the habit of drinking?—That would to a considerable extent be done, I have no doubt.

3780. Would not that be likely to create in many instances much greater inconvenience than that which exists at the present time, and which this Bill is intended to remedy?—No, I do not think it would create a much greater inconvenience; I think that this Bill would so much limit drunkenness that the amount of drunkenness that is created in the way that you have suggested would not be at all to be compared with the present amount.

3781. What is your reason for thinking so?—Because every difficulty that you put in the way of the consumption of drink always seems to diminish the sale and to limit drunkenness; whenever you remove the facilities for getting drink, you diminish drunkenness.

3782. Your view then is, that you would remove the facilities altogether, and you would not allow anybody to have any drink at all; do you go that extent?—I am one of the executive committee of the United Kingdom Alliance for the entire prohibition of the sale of drink.

3783. What do the Alliance propose?—We propose to get the entire prohibition of the sale of drink.

3784. Colonel Fane.] Do you propose to have a Maine Liquor Law?—We have not proposed the Maine Liquor Law exactly. We have proposed a Permissive Bill, which is a means of obtaining the same end.

3785. Mr. Locke.] I suppose that if you could carry out your views to the full extent, you would forbid not only the sale of any liquor, but the manufacture of any, and you would neither allow wine, beer, spirits, or any of those things to exist upon the face of the earth?—You put rather a wide question; but if you were to give me the power of destroying the thing altogether, I know that by destroying it altogether I should do much good, and I would do it.

3786. And you would destroy it if you could?—If I could I would destroy it; but I do not generally try for impossibilities.

3787. Then, what would become of the doctors?—I think they would find their practice very much limited.

3788. Do you not think that a bold doctor might recommend a glass of brandy-and-water to the honourable Member for Leeds; do not you think that such a thing as that might occur?—I know that some medical men do.

3789. To a very great extent, do they not?—I know they do; but I have not yet learnt that medical men are always correct in their prescriptions.

3790. Then, are those always correct who drink nothing but water; they die as well as the rest of us, do they not?—Yes, they do; but, taking our average of life, it is longer than that of the rest. The statistics of the insurance societies show that.

3791. I should like to have those statistics; I think they would be much more instructive than any we have had, for I never saw such statistics in my life?—I shall have very much pleasure in furnishing them; I have not brought them to-day. I did not think that they belonged to our subject; but I certainly will furnish the honourable Member with them.

3792. Perhaps one might be allowed to ask how those statistics are obtained?—From the insurance societies. They have two classes of lives which have been insured; the class of moderate drinkers, for they do not accept any that are intemperate, and the class of total abstainers; and it is the results of the deaths in those two classes of lives that I refer to.

3793. But are not immoderate drinkers and total abstainers both objectionable lives in an insurance office?—No, total abstainers are considered very valuable lives.

3794. What insurance offices get the total abstainers; I am a director at an insurance office, and we never insured anybody of that sort, at least I never heard of the fact?—Perhaps not, but I will furnish you as I say with full statistics. I do not like to quote the names of the societies without being sure that I am quoting them quite accurately.

3795. Mr. Horsfall.] With regard to the returns which you have presented to this Committee, I think those from Chichester were the worst, that is to say, the least favourable to the views which you have expressed to the Committee?—I think they are.

3796. Can you account for the difference between Chichester and other towns?—I think if you take the north of England generally in Lancashire, Yorkshire, Derbyshire and the Midland Counties, teetotalism and the Alliance agitation connected with the Permissive Bill, has elicited a very strong popular sentiment in favour of restrictive measures generally, even where it has not brought people up quite to a full agreement with the principles which the promoters of those measures profess.

3797. I think you stated that you were in favour of the Bill before the Committee becoming law?—Yes.

3798. But you would infinitely prefer entire closing?—Yes.

3799. Are you of opinion that the returns which you have laid before the Committee fully express the opinions of the majority of the working classes in favour of entire closing?—I think so.

3800. You stated a short time ago that from the houses which you had visited in Liverpool you thought it was rather a drunken town, or that drunkenness was carried on to a great extent there?—I speak from what I knew when I lived there. 0.69.

in Liverpool; it is rather more than four years since I left Liverpool.

3801. Were you long a resident there?—About eight years.

3802. Were you aware that a canvass of that town had been made?—Yes, I was aware of that, but that was at a time when I was not in Liverpool.

3803. Were you aware that 80 per cent. of the householders have signed papers similar to those which you have laid before the Committee in favour of entire closing?—I am aware of that.

3804. And do you think still that there is an excess of drunkenness there notwithstanding that?—Yes. I think you often find, indeed my own experience has shown me very often, that persons were desirous of closing the public-houses who were very regular frequenters of them as long as they were open.

3805. But they were themselves unable to resist the temptation?—Yes.

3806. And they would be very glad if somebody would put a restraint upon them?—Yes.

3807. Mr. Knatchbull Hugessen.] With regard to this canvass, it was instituted, was it not, by persons who were desirous of obtaining particular answers to the questions which they asked?—Yes.

3808. Therefore, a large number of easy-going obliging men, who like to say yes when they can, would be likely to return a favourable answer without even having fully considered the subject?—The canvassers would not have time to discuss the question, because their instructions were simply to leave the paper at the house one day, and go after one or two days and fetch the paper back; they would not have time to discuss the question.

3809. But this schedule which you have been kind enough to hand to me would rather of itself incline persons to a particular answer, would it not, and it was so intended?—I do not think it was intended to incline people; it was a statement of fact.

3810. Let me put this question to you. You state in this schedule, which every person receives, that a very large proportion of the people are of opinion that the trade in intoxicating drinks should be put on the same footing as other trades; would not that rather tend to induce people to wish to agree with this large proportion of people?—I should be very glad if it did.

3811. Supposing, for instance, that you had put this instead: A very large proportion of the people are of opinion that, whilst the upper and middle classes of society can obtain their liquor at present on Sunday, at their clubs or in their private houses, it is unjust to deprive the operative classes of those limited facilities which they at present possess, by means of the partial opening of the public-houses upon that day; that would be an equally true way of putting it, and should you not have thought it rather an argument in favour of that view?—I am not quite sure that I caught the whole of your question, or whether I should say it was equally true.

3812. You do not deny that a considerable proportion of those persons, for instance, who signed "No" against this schedule in its present form, whether from that argument or from some other, do not desire the restrictions which you advocate?—A good many do not desire them.

3813. May I not say a considerable proportion?—A considerable number do not.

3814. When you state that a very large proportion of people are of opinion that the trade in intoxicating intoxicating drinks should be put on the same footing as other trades, is not that giving a kind of direction as to the answer which you expect to the circular; and if, on the contrary, any person were to send round a circular to say this, "A very large proportion of the people are of opinion that, whilst the upper and the middle classes of society can obtain liquor at present on Sunday at their clubs, or in their own private houses, it is unjust to deprive the operative classes of those limited facilities which they at present possess by means of the partial opening of the public-houses upon that day;" would you not have said that that evidently pointed to one particular view?—I quite agree with you that it would be so.

3815. All that I wish to arrive at is this, that that circular rather influenced the people as to the answer which they should give?—I cannot exactly say for certain, but it may have done so.

3816. It must be very satisfactory to you to think that that, or something, has produced so large a proportion of answers in favour?—Yes, it is so, certainly.

3817. Mr. John Abel Smith.] Are not the working men in the north quite able to give a distinct answer when they are asked; do not they clearly know what the difference between no and yes means?—I think they do.

3818. They are independent enough to state what they mean, are they not?—They are generally very independent.

3819. Mr. Baines.] Have you had much opportunity of learning the opinion of Sunday-school teachers upon this subject?—Yes; I have gone through written statements from, I should say, about 120 Sunday schools in Lancashire and Yorkshire, and the districts around, all of which expressed opinions strongly in favour of this Bill. I had those papers, but as they only expressed opinions in favour of the Bill, I did not bring them with me. I thought that facts were what were absolutely needed, but those papers have all stated a strong opinion with the exception of one, by the superintendent of a Baptist school in Nottingham, I think it was, but I am not quite sure, who expressed himself as being in favour of this measure, if, at the same time, we closed all the clubs of the upper and middle classes. That was the sole exception.

3820. Have you any knowledge with regard to the Sunday scholars themselves attending public-houses on Sunday evening, and of any effect produced upon them?—Yes; I have seen that myself. I have known Sunday scholars attending public-houses on Sunday evening, and I have known that it has had evil effects upon them, and that it has been the beginning of drinking habits, and has led them away from that sobriety and industry which we should have been desirous of seeing promoted.

3821. Do you know what is the opinion of the women of the working classes generally with regard to the desirableness of closing the public-houses on Sunday?—The great majority would be strongly in favour of closing the public-houses.

3822. Do you speak of that merely as an inference, or do you speak of that from what you yourself have actually heard?—From what I have actually heard in my ministry amongst the poor; I have frequently heard them expressing that wish, and even stronger wishes than that.

3823. Do you believe that there is a general wish among the wives of the working classes in favour of this Bill?—Yes; I cannot say that I have discussed this Bill with them; it is the total closing to which I refer.

3824. Do you believe that it would conduce much to the comfort of the women, and to the good clothing, feeding, and education of the children of the working classes, if this Bill were passed?—I do.

3825. Mr. Hibbert.] Have you given any evidence with respect to the attractions which there are in some of the public-houses of Manchester on Sunday evening?—No; I have not been asked anything about that, but I do know of the music that they have in various places on Sunday evening in the public-houses.

3826. Can you state to the Committee any particulars with respect to that?—I have known of their having organs, and having sacred music on Sunday evening. I have known, also, of rooms where they have a piano, and a variety of other musical instruments, and where singing goes on on Sunday evening. I have seen an advertisement in a public-house in Deansgate, which struck me, I remember, at the time; it was an announcement that there was a free-and-easy on certain nights in the week, on Tuesday, Wednesday, and Saturday, and, on Sunday evenings, sacred music.

3827. At what time in the evening do these amusements generally commence?—Generally you find that the music would begin somewhere about eight o'clock in the evening.

3828. Up to what time?—Up till closing time.

3829. And do you know what kind of people generally visit those places; are they young people?—I have seen in some houses young people; indeed I have known that that is the time when the Sunday scholars of whom I have been speaking have been tempted in that way.

3830. Do you know whether the magistrates ever attempt in any way to interfere with those houses?—I do not think they do. There is nothing illegal in having music on Sunday that I know of; I know that it is so in London.

3831. In the metropolis they are compelled to have a license?—Yes, I believe they are, and now also it is the case in Leeds; but I think that in other places it is legal without a license.

3832. Do you know whether those places extensively prevail where this kind of attraction is afforded?—I do not think they prevail very extensively; they are to be met with in certain districts, which are generally the worst districts in the town; but it is not a very common thing I should say.

3833. Do you suppose that if the houses were closed at an earlier hour, that would tend to get rid of some of the objections of those places?—Decidedly it would.

3834. Do you know whether there is much drinking going on in those places where there is music?—I should not like to express an opinion; you generally see drinks on the table. I believe they do not charge for admission; people pay by taking refreshments as a general rule.

3835. Do they have refreshment tickets?—No, that would not be legal.

3836. Mr. Locke.] But what they require to take out in refreshments is a very small sum?—Yes; it need not be much, something like 2d. or 3d.

3837. They go there principally for the music, and not for the drinking?—I think they do. I think I may say that if the idea of drinking could be separated from amusement, and if that feeling could be introduced more amongst us, it would be a very great blessing indeed.

Mr. John Abel Smith.
Mr. Frederick Stanley.
Mr. Yorke.

SIR JAMES FERGUSSON, BART., IN THE CHAIR.

Mr. JOHN SMITH ELDRIDGE, was called in; and Examined.

Mr. J. S.
Eldridge.
18 May
1868.

3838. Mr. John Abel Smith.] You are Clerk to the Magistrates of Southampton, are you not?—I am, and have been so for 25 years.

3839. Have you not a local Act at Southampton?—Yes, we have one passed in 1844.

3840. Is that in any way restrictive on Sunday drinking?—It is.

3841. Will you point out to the Committee in what way?—By the 326th section of the Act passed in 1844, called the Southampton Improvement Act, it is provided "That no licensed victualler or other person shall open his house within the limits of this Act, for the sale of wine, spirits, beer, or other fermented or distilled liquors, or permit the same to be sold, drunk, or consumed therein on Sundays, Christmas Day, Good Friday, or any day appointed for a public fast or thanksgiving before the hour of one in the afternoon, under a penalty not exceeding 5*l.* for each offence, provided that nothing herein contained shall extend to prevent refreshment to travellers."

3842. Did that continue in full operation until the general Act of 1848?—It did.

3843. And then the Act of 1848 in its general provisions overruled the local Act?—Yes.

3844. Has the working of the Acts of 1844 and 1848, been useful in Southampton by the production and increase of good order?—I should say it had.

3845. Was there any resistance offered to the Act?—None whatever.

3846. Did you adopt the Act of 1864?—We adopted the Act of 1864, on the 17th of May 1865, by a unanimous vote of the council.

3847. Were there very stringent provisions in your own local Act of 1844, with regard to Sunday trading?—There is also a clause in that Act, the 327th clause, which enacts, "That if any person shall, within the limits of this Act, keep open for the sale of any goods whatever, any shop or other building, or sell or expose for sale any goods whatever on the Lord's Day commonly called Sunday, except such goods as may now be sold on that day, he shall, on being convicted thereof before any justice, forfeit and pay for the first offence any sum not less than 5*s.* nor more than 20*s.*, and for the second and every subsequent offence any sum not less than 20*s.* 0.69.

nor more than 5*l.*, as the justice before whom any such person shall be convicted shall adjudge."

3848. There has been a very considerable restriction both with regard to drinking, and with regard to Sunday trading in Southampton?—Very considerable, particularly as to Sunday trading.

3849. Are you in favour of that restrictive policy?—I think so, certainly.

3850. You think that past restriction has worked usefully?—I am quite sure it has.

3851. Have you read the Bill which is referred to this Committee?—Yes, I have.

3852. Are you aware generally of the provisions of the Bill which are to prevent all drinking on the premises during Sunday, and only opening the houses for the sale of beer or spirits across the counter from half-past 12 to half-past 2, and from 8 to 10?—Yes.

3853. Are you in favour of such a provision as that?—I am.

3854. Southampton is a town with a very fluctuating population, and one rather unruly, is it not, at times?—We are a seaport town at which the boats start and arrive, and there are a great many sailors on their homeward voyage who will indulge sometimes.

3855. Have you found that those restrictions have worked usefully for the peace and quiet of the town?—Yes, certainly, since 1864, drunkenness has been on the decrease, all the houses being closed at one o'clock in the morning, whereas before that time they were open the whole night.

3856. You have found that the Closing Act, Sir George Grey's Act of 1864, has been productive of great benefit?—Very great benefit.

3857. Before that, persons remained drinking all night, did they not?—Yes; and unfortunate girls of the town were seen wandering about all night in the town, whereas now they have no place to resort to, and the streets are quite quiet and clear after one o'clock. There certainly is a very marked improvement in that respect.

3858. With regard to the general feeling of the population with respect to drinking on the Sunday, do you believe that there is any improvement in the feelings and opinions of the working men on that subject?—I gather from the superintendent

Mr. J. S.
Eldridge.

tendent of police that some portion of the working community would gladly avail themselves of closing; but there are some who certainly would be glad to see the houses closed.

3859. Do you know which would be the majority?—I do not.

3860. Are any public-houses closed now voluntarily in Southampton on Sunday?—I do not think there is one, but I have had an opportunity of speaking on licensing days to publicans about it, and I think that some of them would gladly close on Sunday altogether, were it a general measure; that is what I gather from those whom I have had an opportunity of speaking to.

3861. Are the magistrates in favour of a restrictive policy on Sunday?—I think the majority would be; I do not say that all would.

3862. Chairman.] Have you reason to believe that the majority would?—I have reason to believe that the majority would.

3863. How have you reason to believe that?—I have spoken to them on the subject.

3864. Are you prepared to say that more than half of them have expressed an opinion in favour of further restriction on Sunday?—I think they would, those that I have spoken to about it.

3865. Are you prepared to say that a majority would?—We have 30 and odd magistrates, but they do not all attend the bench.

3866. How do you know that the majority are of that opinion?—From those whom I have spoken to on the subject. I do not allude to those who do not attend the bench; perhaps we do not muster above six or seven in a day.

3867. Mr. Roebuck.] Then the majority would consist of four?—Exactly so.

3868. Mr. John Abel Smith.] Have you any statistics as to the increase or diminution of drinking, and drinking with violence, in Southampton?—No, I have not.

3869. Do you believe that there is more drinking on the Sunday than on other days?—I think there is.

3870. Do you know anything as regards the drinking cases on Monday, as compared with other days?—There are more.

3871. That is taken from, what o'clock on Saturday night?—After the rising of the bench on Saturday till Monday, that would be the time.

3872. Mr. Roebuck.] When do they rise?—It is according to the amount of business; but they generally rise about two o'clock in the afternoon.

3873. Mr. John Abel Smith.] Those cases will go from two o'clock on Saturday afternoon until Monday morning?—Monday morning at 11.

3874. You do not know the comparative number?—No, I do not.

3875. Do you believe that if such a Bill as has been referred to this Committee were carried, there would be any disorder or confusion or public resistance to it in Southampton?—I think not.

3876. Mr. Hibbert.] Have you many cases brought before the bench for an infringement of the present law on the Sunday?—We had several.

3877. Are they for selling drink in prohibited hours?—Yes.

3878. Do you know whether there is much private drinking going on during the prohibited hours on Sunday, of beer which has been got from a public-house?—Yes; the beer is got in this way, that although the police may be vigilant a man is set to watch the premises, and to get the beer when the police are not looking on.

3879. Do you anticipate from that, that in case this Bill were to become law, you would have any great difficulty in watching the public-houses, supposing they were closed the whole of the day, with the exception of four hours?—No, I do not.

3880. Is there any illicit drinking carried on on Sunday in houses, which are not licensed?—No, I do not think there is; we have not had any information of that sort.

3881. Do you think that it would be more desirable to adopt this Bill than to carry out a further restriction in the present law?—Further restriction, I think, would be desirable.

3882. You think that further restriction of the present law would be better than adopting the proposed Bill?—I think so; the more restriction, I think, the less drunkenness there is.

3883. Do you mean by further restriction of the present law, a restriction which would allow public-houses to be open, both for sale and consumption on the premises and off the premises, during certain hours of the day?—I think they should be open to enable the labouring classes to obtain what they call their dinner and supper beer.

3884. Do you mean by that that houses should be open for them to go into the house and consume liquors on the premises?—No, I think I should have it off the premises.

3885. The question I put to you was, whether you think it better to have the restrictions of the present law carried further, or whether you would approve of the restrictions of this Bill?—The restriction of consuming it off the premises, I think, would be the best, so that a man should take it home and enjoy it with his wife and family.

3886. Do you know when the greatest number of drinking cases occur on Sunday, in what period of the day generally?—There are men brought in at all hours of the day. I could not tell exactly at what time most come in, but I can carry it in my mind from the police sheet; the hour is entered when a man is brought in, and my recollection would be that they are brought in at different times in the day, morning, evening, and night.

3887. Do not you know whether there is a greater number at the later hours in the day between 8 or 9 and 11?—No, I could not say that.

3888. Mr. Locke.] You seem to think that it would be right to close public-houses altogether on Sunday for consumption on the premises?—Yes, except for travellers and lodgers, as contemplated by the proposed Bill.

3889. Supposing a person is living in Southampton, may he not want to go into a public-house and take his dinner?—I do not see why he should if he is living in the town.

3890. Supposing he were living in lodgings?—He could get it at home. He could dine at his lodging as well as he could dine out.

3891. Supposing he has nobody to cook his dinner, what then?—Then he must go out.

3892. Would not it be inconvenient to such a man if he could not go into a public-house in such a case?—I think that would be an inconvenience.

3893. But you never thought of that?—No, I never thought of that. I thought that he might get his dinner at home.

3894. Could

3894. Could you guess how many of that class of people there are in Southampton?—I could not.

3895. You never formed an idea of it?—Never.

3896. You never gave those people the slightest consideration?—I never thought of them.

3897. All you have thought of is the dinner and supper beer of the working classes?—Yes.

3898. Do you think that they all dine between 1 and half-past 2, and that they all sup between 8 and 10?—I think the labouring class would.

3899. Are you quite sure that they do?—Not quite sure, but I think that is the general hour.

3900. You have never given that any consideration?—As a general rule, the hours would be between 1 and 2, and between 8 and 10.

3901. Is it a general rule that working men are obliged to dine between 1 and 2, and sup between 8 and 10?—There is no obligation upon their part that I know of.

3902. For aught you know, they do not?—For aught I know they do not.

3903. Then whether it would be an inconvenience to them or not you cannot say?—No.

3904. You have stated that beer is obtained now in prohibited hours?—It is so.

3905. Can you state to what extent?—No, I cannot.

3906. Supposing there was a greater number of prohibited hours, would it not naturally follow that more beer would be obtained during those hours?—I think that a certain class of men would endeavour to get it certainly if they wanted it.

3907. That is the case with human nature generally, is it not, to get what you want if you can?—Some drink more than others.

3908. Some people want more beer than others?—Yes, they want more.

3909. Do you think it is right, if a man wants beer, that he should not have it?—At proper times, I think.

3910. What do you consider proper times?—At reasonable hours.

3911. What do you consider reasonable hours?—Between 8 and 10.

3912. What makes between 8 and 10 more reasonable hours than between 5 and 11?—That is supposed to be the supper hour, I think; I think the labouring class generally retire to rest about 10 o'clock.

3913. Would not it be a very unpleasant thing for yourself if there were legislation, and a body of persons were to say what they considered to be your reasonable hour for dining, and were to make laws, so that you should never get drink at any other time than that reasonable hour?—I do not think I should like that, I must say.

3914. You have never stopped to inquire whether those people would like it?—I say that some would not like it, I think.

3915. And yet you say that you do not know how many people there are who would not like to have this law passed, and yet they would take it quite quietly, and would be highly delighted with the legislation?—I gather from the superintendent of police that there are some who would gladly accept it.

3916. Do you think that the superintendent of police is a very good exponent of the feelings of the working classes?—I do not know; he mixes a good deal with them; perhaps he may not be; but that is where I get my information.

3917. You do not get it from the working classes themselves?—No.

3918. You have not inquired of the working classes?—No.

3919. Your information is derived from the superintendent of police?—It is so.

3920. You say that drunkenness is on the decrease at Southampton?—Yes, since 1864.

3921. The Act of 1864 closed the public-houses at 1 o'clock in the morning?—Yes.

3922. That has caused a decrease?—Yes.

3923. But that has nothing particularly to do with Sunday?—Not much; it has acted beneficially.

3924. Do you think that besides the operation of that Act, persons have less inclination to be drunken now than they used to have?—I think they have; decidedly I think that is the case.

3925. When you find everything going on well, a decrease in drunkenness, and people being less disposed to get drunk than they used to be, do not you think it is rather a dangerous thing to come in with a law, to tell people that they shall not do a thing which they are not doing to a very great extent now?—That I am not prepared to say.

3926. Do not you think that it very often happens that when you tell a man he shall not do a thing, he becomes determined that he will do it?—I think there are many who do that.

3927. That is human nature, is it not?—I think it is.

3928. People do not like sumptuary laws or being dragooned into doing what other people think they ought to do?—That is so.

3929. They like to judge for themselves?—Yes.

3930. That is the feeling of Englishmen, is it not?—That is so.

3931. And of late years we have adopted that course of legislation, I believe, in this country?—I believe we have.

3932. Now we are beginning to take a leaf out of the book of America, in these sort of things, the Maine Liquor Law, for instance, and try this American experiment upon English people; has not that been the view of a great number of persons in this country?—I have heard it said so.

3933. In point of fact it is so; and are you aware of the result of those sobriety laws in America?—No, I am not.

3934. You do not know how they have worked there?—No, I do not.

3935. You are not aware that they have been entirely upset in a great many of the States, and that the people would not submit to them?—No, I am not aware of that.

3936. Chairman. There is a large floating population in Southampton, I think you have mentioned, of sailors, and so on, men who are there for a short time, and are not your permanent inhabitants?—Yes.

3937. How would this Bill bear upon them, supposing those strangers wanted to get refreshment on Sunday, and under the provisions of this Bill they were not allowed to buy liquor and consume it upon the premises of the public-houses; how would they get their beer or liquor at all; for instance, take the case of sailors on board ships, coming on shore, how would they be able to get any drink on Sunday under the provisions of this Bill?—They would not, except during the hours when the public-houses would be open for them to do it.

3938. They would not be allowed to drink on the premises, and they would not be allowed to drink it on board the ships, would they?—I do not know that they would not be allowed to take it on board ships.

3939. I suppose that sailors are not allowed to take drink on board ships generally?—I do not know. I think that in the mercantile shipping they would be allowed to do it. I do not think there is any objection to it. There are a great many colliers who, I do not think, would object to taking liquor on board.

3940. Supposing the crew of one of the men-of-war in the river were allowed to come on shore for a holiday, they would not be allowed to get drink at all?—Perhaps they would be travellers under the meaning of the Act, coming from their ships to the shore.

3941. Colonel Fane.] Would they be allowed to take drink within the dock-gates?—Yes, I think they would.

3942. Take the Peninsular and Oriental Company's vessels, for instance, would they be allowed to take drink on board them?—I do not think they would be allowed to do so on board one of the Peninsular and Oriental Company's vessels, but they would on board the colliers.

3943. Not within the dock-gates; would not the gate-porter stop any one from going in with beer?—I am not aware of that.

3944. Chairman.] There is always a man-of-war in the river, is there not?—Yes.

3945. Supposing what they call the liberty men from that man-of-war in the river went on shore, as sailors do, if they wanted to go and have some drink, they would not be able to get any, would they?—I do not think they would, unless they could be considered as travellers from the vessel to the shore. Although the clerk to the magistrates, I could not define whether it might be done or not. It is a very open question at this moment.

3946. Then it would depend upon the condition of their residence in or about Southampton, whether this relaxation of the four hours during Sunday would be of any use to them or not?—It would.

3947. Did I correctly understand you to say, in answer to an Honourable Member, that you would like to have some additional restriction, even if you could not get as much as this Bill?—I think so.

3948. Do you think that it would be a great gain over the present law, if the public-houses were only opened for four hours for drink to be consumed either on or off the premises?—I think it would perhaps, so far.

3949. That would be fair to everybody, would it not?—It would be so, I think.

3950. Mr. Roebuck.] How long have you been the magistrates' clerk at Southampton?—Twenty-five years.

3951. How many times a week do the magistrates sit?—Every day at 11 o'clock.

3952. For the town and county of Southampton?—Yes; for the town and county only.

3953. Are they at all connected with the borough magistrates?—Those are the borough magistrates.

3954. Then, from its being a county, you are not the town clerk?—Precisely. Southampton is a borough and county of itself.

3955. During the whole of those 25 years, have you seen any great change in the habits and manners of the people of Southampton?—Yes; for the better.

3956. They have grown now, I should hope, from what you say, a well-to-do, well-behaved, well-mannered, and well-conducted population?—They are much better than they were, and they are improving, I think, from year to year.

3957. We do not expect perfection, of course, but should you not say of your town that it is really a well-conducted, orderly, and comfortable place?—It is a very well-conducted town, indeed.

3958. Under the present law?—Yes, as we now stand. Our local improvement Act assists us a great deal in that direction; by that Act all Sunday trading was done away with, and there has been another regulation to the effect that no flies shall be allowed to ply on hire in the streets on that day.

3959. So that if I, being a lame man, were down at one end of the town of Southampton, I could not get to the other?—There are flies frequenting the railway stations, and by sending to the different mews flies can be had.

3960. I could hire a fly at the mews, but I could not find one in the street?—That is so.

3961. Why is that discrimination made by your local Act?—I cannot say why, but it is the fact.

3962. Could they be had from the mews at cab fares?—I think not. I think that if sent for from the mews, the cabman generally charges for a private carriage.

3963. So that if I, being a lame man, and, being a poor man, had a very great necessity of going from one end of the town to the other, I could not go unless I walked?—No; you could not.

3964. Do you think that was a wise regulation?—I do not say that; I say that it keeps the town quiet; there is no rattling about of flies on Sunday.

3965. Do you not know that good may sometimes be counterbalanced by evil?—I think it may.

3966. I want to know whether you think that a wise regulation?—I really cannot say whether it is or is not; it was passed, and so it has been worked ever since.

3967. Do you always adhere to what is passed, because if you do, why do you not adhere to the present law; I think I may take it from you that the present state of the town on Sunday is a highly decorous state?—It is so.

3968. What good do you expect to follow from increasing the restriction?—There are cases of drunkenness still.

3969. Do you think that that would put an end to all cases of drunkenness?—I think the more the restriction, the less the drunkenness.

3970. Do you think that because restriction up to a certain point has done good, therefore further restriction must necessarily do good?—I do think so.

3971. Then would it not be good to prohibit drinking altogether?—No, I do not think it would; men must have some relaxation.

3972. How

Mr. J. S.
Eldridge.

1868.

3972. How do you make that agree with your former proposition?—I say this, that restriction at the present moment has tended to decrease drunkenness; and then I say that further restriction, I think, would produce still greater good.

3973. I want you to explain to me why you think so; I put this question to you, and you say that further restriction would do good because it is restriction; then I ask you if there were complete restriction, do you think that that would be a good thing?—I do not think it would.

3974. I come back to my first question; how do you make that agree with the proposition that further restriction must of necessity do you good?—Because restriction has hitherto tended to do good.

3975. Then to pursue that argument, further restriction must do good because past restriction has done so; then the necessary consequence is that perfect restriction would be better still?—I do not go quite so far as that.

3976. You do not come to that conclusion?—I do not.

3977. So far then we may conclude that your logic is rather bad?—Perhaps it may be.

3978. Supposing you have this restriction that you ask for, do not you think that there would be illicit drinking?—I think some people would endeavour to get it.

3979. Would not that involve increased inspection?—I think it would.

3980. Would not that involve a prying disposition on the part of the police to look into private houses?—Yes; to endeavour to detect it.

3981. Do you think that that would be agreeable?—I do not think it would be agreeable.

3982. That is one of the consequences of this Act, that it would not be agreeable to the people of Southampton?—I do not think that the prying system would be agreeable.

3983. But you say that the prying system is a necessary consequence of this Bill?—To detect crime it would.

3984. And therefore I say that as one of the consequences of this Bill it would not be agreeable to the people of Southampton?—That might be so.

3985. Having been occupied in the administration of the law for so many years of your life, did you ever consider that there was an evil in over-legislation?—No; I cannot say that I did.

3986. You never considered that at all?—No.

3987. Do you think that you are competent to give advice to the Legislature unless you have considered this important question?—I only give you my evidence of facts.

3988. That being the state of your mind about legislation, I need not ask you whether you have considered that what is called a paternal government, looking at the habits of the people and the way in which they pass their time in their own houses, is a great mischief?—I never thought of that.

3989. And you do not know anything of the experience of the American people from their blessed Maine Liquor Law, do you?—I do not.

3990. You have not seen the remarkable document that has been figuring in all the papers lately, namely, the report of our consul at Massachusetts, have you?—No.

3991. Mr. Yorke.] I understand you to say that you are not an advocate of restriction for its own sake?—No.

3992. If you saw any other way of improving the state of the population than restriction, you would prefer to adopt it, would you not?—I think it would do as well.

3993. For instance, supposing any other attractions could be offered to the people on the Sunday which would divide their attention with the public-houses, would you prefer that to prohibiting their drinking in the public-houses?—I think the prohibiting would do more good.

3994. You would prefer that for instance to providing them with a park in which they could walk on Sundays?—We have parks.

3995. What provisions of that sort are there in Southampton?—There are very excellent parks indeed; I think there is more than 60 acres of park ground, and there is a beautiful common near Southampton.

3996. Are they much used by the population?—Yes; I think they are.

3997. How long have they been established?—Southampton Common has been in existence some hundreds of years, and the parks have been laid out within the last 10 or 15 years.

3998. Do you attribute any part of the improvement which has taken place in the population to the establishment of those parks?—No, I think not; I think they are a different class of men altogether that frequent the parks.

3999. What is the class of men who frequent the parks?—All classes.

4000. If they are all classes, I presume they would include a proportion of that class who are in the habit of frequenting public-houses?—They would.

4001. Then to that extent they have done good?—They seem to be very much enjoyed by the public.

4002. If you could devise some means of increasing the attractions of the parks or opening other places where the public could go, would you not prefer that to increasing the restriction which already exists?—I should go in for restriction, I think.

4003. Mr. Evans.] Do you think that any good object would be attained by closing the public-houses on Sunday at 10 instead of 11 in the evening?—No, I think not.

4004. Did I rightly understand you to say that persons take their meals at public-houses in Southampton?—I do not know; I could not say.

4005. Do many persons in Southampton go on excursions?—None, I think; there are no excursions, I think.

4006. Mr. Roebuck.] Are there no excursion steamers to the Isle of Wight?—No; I do not know of any.

4007. Mr. Evans.] Are there no excursion trains?—No, not now, nor excursion steamers.

4008. Then people who go on an excursion, either drive or walk?—Yes.

4009. Mr. John Abel Smith.] Do you recollect the passing of Mr. Wilson Patten's Bill in 1854?—No.

4010. Then you are probably not aware of the provisions of that Bill?—No.

4011. I suppose that I am accurately stating your opinions when I say that I collect from your evidence that you think that restriction at Southampton has worked usefully and well, and that further restriction might be advantageously resorted to?—I think it might.

4012. I suppose I may also collect your opinion to be that restriction could not be carried so far, as to be intolerable in its provisions, with any consideration for the peace and convenience of the people?—I do not think it could.

Mr. J. S.
Eldridge.

4013. Mr. Roebuck.] Can you tell me the what is the population of Southampton?—I think as far as I can recollect, it is about 50,000.

4014. You do not include in that, what you call the floating population, the seamen who come into the port, do you?—No; I could not do that.

4015. Could you form any idea what that floating population amounts to?—I do not think it would be very great, for this reason, that the sailors in the ships are resident in the town.

4016. Have you any idea what this floating population, that comes in and out on shore, amounts to?—No, I have not.

4017. I suppose it is rather large at Southampton, as it is a seaport town?—There are a great many.

4018. Mr. John Abel Smith.] What do you call a large number?—I do not know the number, but there are a great many yachts in the rivers.

4019. Are there a thousand, do you think?—Yes, more than that; because there are the sailors in the large ships, and there is a very great deal of shipping there.

4020. Mr. Roebuck.] Then all those persons would, to a certain extent, be inconvenienced by this Bill?—Many would be inconvenienced by it.

4021. In your adoption of this Bill, have you ever taken into consideration that one item of inconvenience?—No.

JAMES BARLOW, Esq., called in; and Examined.

J. Barlow,
Esq.

4022. Mr. John Abel Smith.] YOU are the Mayor of Bolton in Lancashire, are you not?—Yes.

4023. What is the population of Bolton?—76,000.

4024. Has there been any evidence of the feeling of Bolton, in favour of the Sunday closing, recently?—Yes.

4025. Will you state what has occurred?—For many years there have been large public meetings held upon the subject; from 2,000 to 3,000 have generally assembled, and the votes have been almost unanimous regularly.

4026. Has there been any canvass of the town lately?—Yes.

4027. Can you put it in?—Yes; I have it with me.

4028. Will you state to the Committee what the result has been?—The town was canvassed; 10,000 papers were left at the ratepayers' dwellings, with certain questions, of which the first was this: "Are you in favour of closing public-houses and beerhouses during the whole of Sunday;" and in reply, 6,377 men in favour of it, 1,783 answered No, and 1,557 were neutral. The total number of papers returned were 9,717.

4029. To whom were those papers issued?—To the householders all over the town.

4030. Do you know how many householders there are in the town?—I am not prepared to state exactly, but some 15,000 to 16,000.

4031. Ought the number at any public meeting of the town to be taken as a test of the truth or accuracy of the opinion of the town?—Yes; as the public papers stated, there were 3,000 persons present.

4032. Who was in the chair?—The ex-mayor, Alderman Fergusson.

4033. Was it called by you, as mayor, or how was it called?—It was called by the committee who made the canvass.

4034. Was there a resolution as to the accuracy of that canvass?—Yes.

4035. What was the public opinion that was expressed thereupon?—That it was an accurate canvass, and that it represented the public feeling of Bolton.

4036. Do you believe that that public meeting fairly expressed the feelings of the town?—I do.

4037. Do you believe that the working men of Bolton as a whole, are largely in favour of increased restrictions on Sunday drinking?—I do.

4038. Why do you believe so?—I have had very large intercourse with working men for more than 20 years, both as a large employer and mixing freely with them in various ways.

4039. And that is your conclusion?—Yes.

4040. Are you a large employer of labour yourself?—I am.

4041. How many men do you employ?—Over 1,000.

4042. Are you conversant with their opinions generally?—I am.

4043. Do you see them constantly?—I have constant communication with them, day by day.

4044. Do you collect from them that their opinions would be in favour of further restriction on Sunday drinking?—I do.

4045. Do you know the provisions of the Bill which is referred to this Committee?—Yes.

4046. Do you think that there would be any disorder or confusion, or resistance of the law if such a Bill as this became a law?—I do not.

4047. Do you know anything as Mayor of Bolton, of the amount of Sunday drinking?—I know it is very large; taking the average of several years, the cases of drunkenness are more than double on Monday.

4048. That includes the Saturday drinking as well as the Sunday drinking, does it not?—It includes the Saturday evening as well as the Sunday.

4049. Do the magistrates of Bolton sit every day?—No; they sit Monday, Thursday, and Saturday.

4050. And the Monday charges are more numerous you say, than those on Thursday or Saturday?—Very much more numerous; in fact, we have had several instances in which every case has been drunk, drunk and disorderly, and drunk and incapable, on Monday.

4051. Are the cases of drunkenness with violence more numerous or less numerous than they were within these last few years; are they increasing or decreasing?—I am scarcely prepared to say that; I should not say that they were increasing.

4052. You think that upon the whole the habits of the population are improving?—I do.

4053. Do you attribute that at all to the existing restrictions on Sunday drinking?—I have no doubt that that has its effect, but I think there are other causes in addition to that.

4054. What

4054. What causes do you refer to?—General efforts in the way of education, and other matters.

4055. Education has improved very much, has it not, within your recollection?—It has.

4056. Are there any means of recreation or amusement open to the people of Bolton on Sunday?—Yes, the parks are open.

4057. Are there excursion trains on Sunday?—During the summer season there are cheap trains on Saturdays, returning on Sunday evening.

4058. Are they numerously used?—Yes, they are.

4059. At what hour do those people return to Bolton?—They generally return from 9 to 10 o'clock; sometimes later.

4060. If they closed the public-houses at 10 o'clock for the purchase of beer across the counter, would that be any serious inconvenience to the excursionists of Bolton?—I think not.

4061. Do they generally take their provisions with them, or do they buy their food when they go out?—Many working people take their provisions with them in small baskets.

4062. Containing drink as well as food?—Yes.

4063. As Mayor of Bolton, which is a very important manufacturing town, you consider that you are doing what is right by those around you, if you lend yourself to an extension of the existing restrictions on Sunday?—I think so.

4064. Generally speaking, do you believe that restriction on drinking is followed by an increase of temperance?—Yes.

4065. Therefore you are in favour of the principle of restriction, and wish to see it carried still further?—I do.

4066. Those opinions in the town of Bolton are carried a long way, are they not; there was a very large manifestation of opinion in reference to Mr. Somes' Bill, was there not?—Yet, there was.

4067. How many people petitioned then?—I am not prepared with statistics, but very large petitions were sent from the town, and from the various churches and chapels in favour of it.

4068. Do you recollect Mr. Wilson Patten's Act in 1854?—Yes.

4069. Do you know that it was in operation from August one year to August the next year?—Yes.

4070. Do you know how it acted in Bolton?—I am not prepared with statistics, but it was considered to act beneficially generally.

4071. Did you view its removal with regret?—Yes.

4072. Do you believe that the provisions of the Bill before the Committee would entail any inconvenience to any great extent upon the people of Bolton?—I should not consider that it would produce any serious inconvenience.

4073. Is there much illicit drinking at Bolton?—There is a little, but not to any large extent.

4074. Do you believe that if there was further restriction, that illicit drinking would be carried on to any noticeable extent?—I have no doubt that it might increase a little, but I do not think it would be very serious.

4075. Have you music in your public-houses on the Sunday at Bolton?—I think there is in several.

4076. You have no local Act which prevents it?—No, I believe not.

0.69.

4077. Mr. Hibbert.] You say that you think Mr. Wilson Patten's Act worked satisfactorily in Bolton?—It was considered so.

4078. I suppose you know that that allowed drinking to take place on the premises as well as off?—Yes.

4079. Do you remember what the hours were that the houses were open under that Act?—I do not remember it exactly, but I think from 1 to 2; there was an interval, if I remember rightly, but I have not refreshed my memory.

4080. They were open from half-past 12 to half-past 2, and then closed until 6 o'clock, and then open from 6 till 10?—Yes, I think that was it.

4081. Do you not think that if there ought to be further restrictions placed upon the drinking habits of the people, it would be a wise thing to go back to something like a restriction of that kind, instead of the one proposed by this Bill?—If you ask my personal opinion, I should say they should be closed the whole Sabbath.

4082. You would prefer total closing?—Yes, I should prefer total closing.

4083. Would you prefer total closing to this Bill now before the Committee?—I should, personally.

4084. But as a matter of convenience connected with the different classes of the people, do not you think it would be better, if we are to have a restriction, that it should be a restriction which will not act with any great inconvenience to the people, and will allow public-houses to be open during certain hours, both for drinking on the premises and off the premises?—If you ask my personal opinion, I should say that parties who would drink on the Sabbath should get it on Saturday evening and bottle it up.

4085. Do not you think that when we come to make a change, however desirable the change may be, it is a pity to make a change which might cause a reaction of public feeling against restriction altogether?—As far as Bolton is concerned, I do not think that we should have any reaction of the kind.

4086. Supposing this Bill were allowed to be adopted in a permissive form by the different local authorities, do you think it would be adopted in a place like Bolton without any inconvenience?—I think so. If the permissive principle was adopted, I have no doubt we should adopt it in Bolton, and, personally, I should favour that principle.

4087. You would prefer that it should be left to be adopted or otherwise by the different localities?—I would personally.

4088. Colonel Fane.] You are aware that this Bill proposes to close public-houses in the country altogether for drinking on the premises, except for travellers?—Yes, for liquor to be drunk on the premises.

4089. You spoke of the very large number of excursionists that go out of Bolton on Sunday? do you not think it would be a great inconvenience to those people going out into the country not being able to get a glass of beer when they got there?—I think it might be an inconvenience to them, but I understand that this Bill provides for travellers, and I should look upon those persons as travellers.

4090. You are, no doubt, aware that that is a vexed question?—Yes, I am.

4091. Mr. Locke.] You say that there are

76,000 inhabitants in Bolton; that is including men, women, and children?—Yes.

4092. And 14,000 householders, do you think?—I am not prepared with statistics, but I should say there were 12,000 or 13,000 householders.

4093. With regard to the paper which was sent round, and to which signatures were obtained, who were the persons who signed it?—Householders; the master of the house.

4094. Only the master of the house?—Only the master of the house.

4095. No women?—I believe not.

4096. Are you sure?—I am not prepared to say, but the paper was addressed to the householders.

4097. But how many persons in the house signed?—Only one in a house.

4098. You are quite sure of that?—I am quite sure of it.

4099. Then you say that about half of the householders in the town, or rather less than half, signed it?—More than 8,000 signed it.

4100. Six thousand three hundred and seventy-seven signed in favour of total closing?—Yes.

4101. That would be not quite half?—I have no statistics, therefore it is simply guess work, but I think it was more than half.

4102. Have you ever seen the paper which was signed?—There were separate papers, and this is the form of paper (handing the same to the honourable Member).

4103. I mean, have you seen the signatures; there were different papers sent round, were there not?—No, that one was sent to each dwelling-house.

4104. And those were collected?—Yes.

4105. And have you seen the papers which were the produce of this house-to-house visitation?—I have not seen them personally.

4106. There was some dispute about their accuracy, was there not?—I am not aware that there was.

4107. You say that there was a resolution come to at the meeting; somebody must have disputed the accuracy of the return in order to make it necessary to put it to the vote whether it was right or whether it was wrong?—I have a certificate here from the parties who superintended it, stating that it is a correct return; and any person who disputed it was invited to go and see the papers.

4108. You say it was not challenged, but will you let us have exactly what was said at the meeting?—I cannot lay my hands upon it now, but here is a report of the public meeting where the statistics were read over, and it was said how they were obtained, and the number and the classification of the parties signing, and which was as follows: Of the professions, 170 said "Yes," and 10 "No;" of tradesmen, 1,071 said "Yes," and 201 "No;" of the workpeople, 5,141 said "Yes," and 1,471 "No," and 5 beer-sellers declared in favour of Sunday closing, while 132 were against it.

4109. That was of course taken from the different papers that were produced?—Yes; the public meeting was simply to declare the result of the canvass to the public meeting.

4110. And somebody objected to it?—No, I am not aware of any objection.

4111. Mr. John Abel Smith.] It was done in order that it should be discussed if there was anybody who wished to dispute it?—Yes.

4112. Mr. Locke.] The phrase used was that it was put to the vote whether it was right or whether it was wrong, as I understand you?—No.

4113. What was the truth?—The result of the canvass was given at the public meeting; that public meeting was addressed by working men exclusively as to their views upon this question, and at the meeting it was stated that if any one disputed the truthfulness of that canvass, the canvass papers were there open for their investigation.

4114. Where were they open for investigation; was it at the meeting?—At the residence of one of the parties at the committee-room, and at the meeting. People were told that they might go at any time and see them.

4115. A person, in order to ascertain the truth, would have to go into 9,657 returns?—Yes.

4116. Nobody undertook that laborious work, I suppose?—I am not aware whether they have or not.

4117. By whom was this meeting called; was it by the Alliance?—No.

4118. By whom was it called?—It was called by a committee appointed to canvass the town.

4119. Who appointed the committee to canvass the town?—I am not prepared to say.

4120. With whom did the idea of canvassing the town originate? I see there are three gentlemen's names to this paper, and there are these words, "Central Association for Stopping the Sale of Intoxicating Drinks on Sundays; Bolton Auxiliary."

4120.* Will you be kind enough to tell us what the Central Association is; where do those people carry on the association who call themselves the centre of it?—In Manchester.

4121. And that is an association for stopping the sale of intoxicating drinks on Sunday?—For furthering that object.

4122. Then there is a Bolton auxiliary to that?—Yes.

4123. Was this meeting called by them?—I believe so.

4124. Were the persons who were sent round to collect those papers persons sent round by the Bolton Auxiliary Association?—I should judge so, but I am not aware.

4125. Were you in the chair upon this occasion?—No.

4126. Were you present at the meeting?—No.

4127. I see it says, "The committee of the above association respectfully request the occupier of this house to write 'Yes' opposite to whichever of the following questions he assents to;" could all the people write who put their names to this?—I am not prepared to say, but I should think so.

4128. Probably you are not prepared to say whether they could all read?—I think the majority of them could.

4129. Not all?—I am not prepared to say that.

4130. Some of them might make a mistake. I see there are four questions here. You have not said whether anybody signed as to the fourth. "Do you authorise the Committee to put your name to a paper calling on the Members for Bolton to vote in Parliament for stopping the sale of liquors during the whole of Sunday." Did anybody answer to that?—I am not aware.

4131. They would not carry the thing as far as that; they would not sink every other consideration ration in the Sunday closing question; the people of Bolton have not come to that, I presume?—The whole of them would not.

4132. It appears, according to your statement, that none of them did, because nobody signed that fourth proposition?—I did not say that they did, I do not know.

4133. You have given us no account of anybody who did, and therefore, I presume, nobody did?—Those resolutions, sympathising with the movement, were passed unanimously, and the borough Members were requested to give their hearty support to this Bill in Parliament.

4134. However, there were 1,783 persons against it, and there were 1,557 who were neutral?—Yes.

4135. As to the mode in which this was got up you cannot exactly say; you were not there yourself?—I was not there myself.

4136. You do not know what took place of your own knowledge at the meeting?—No, I do not.

4137. Are you aware who the persons were who attended the meeting?—It was a public meeting.

4138. There was a platform, I presume?—Yes.

4139. And were there tickets for the platform?—No, no tickets at all.

4140. Then all the persons who went there were members of the central association, I suppose?—No, it was a public meeting; the meeting was called by placard.

4141. Have you got the placard?—I have not, but I saw it.

4142. Did the central association announce themselves on the placard?—No.

4143. Was it a public meeting called by the mayor?—No; if it had been I should have been there.

4144. Were you requested to call the meeting?—No.

4145. We were told the other day that there was a distinction between a public meeting and another ordinary meeting, and that it was considered a public meeting when it was called by the mayor of a provincial town?—We call that a town's meeting. I do not know where the distinction is.

4146. Then this was not a town's meeting?—No. We had a town's meeting in favour of Sunday closing, at which I presided; and a large requisition was got up by the public of Bolton in favour of Sunday closing altogether; the meeting was attended by nearly 3,000 people, and the resolution was all but unanimous; there were not 20 people who voted against the resolution, and that was a town's meeting.

4147. Mr. John Abel Smith.] In what year was that?—This year.

4148. Mr. Locke.] Were the central association there in a body?—No, they were not there; they had nothing whatever to do with it; it was a meeting of the ratepayers.

4149. Did they go to the meeting?—Not all; no doubt some of them did.

4150. Who was it that asked you to call it?—It was a large requisition signed by a large number of people, ratepayers.

4151. At the instance of the central association?—Not that I am aware of.

4152. Perhaps you did not inquire?—I did not inquire; I did not consider that my business. If a large number of respectable ratepayers requested me to call a public meeting, I should consider it my duty, whatever my private opinions were, to call a meeting in reference to it.

4153. Whether they were the central association or anybody else, you cannot say whether they were interested in getting the meeting called?—If the publicans had asked me by a requisition to call a meeting, I should have done it.

4154. Chairman.] You know probably, who had the management of this movement?—I do.

4155. Are they people in whose honesty and straightforwardness you would have confidence?—I should not doubt them for a moment.

4156. So that if they told you that the thing was honestly got up, you would believe it?—I should.

4157. Are those two gentlemen, Mr. Eardley, and Mr. Stephenson, clergymen?—They are Dissenting ministers.

4158. Mr. Roebuck.] You have stated that the number of the whole population of Bolton is 76,000; have you any idea what the number of excursionists is out of Bolton during the fine summer months?—I cannot state the number, but they are very large.

4159. Very large every Sunday?—Yes.

4160. Do they go far out?—They principally go to Blackpool and Southport, the watering places.

4161. I gather from your evidence that you are what they call a teetotalter?—Yes, I am.

4162. And that if you were a legislator you would vote for the total prohibition of the sale of intoxicating liquor?—If I was a legislator I would not go beyond what I believed the public feeling to be.

4163. Then though you are a teetotalter yourself, you would not impose upon everybody else to be a teetotalter?—No.

4164. You would be guided by what they call public opinion?—Yes.

4165. You would not put forth Bolton as a type of public opinion in England, would you?—No, I would not.

4166. Therefore, when you talk of public opinion you only speak of the public opinion of Bolton?—Yes.

4167. I suppose you would be governed by the public opinion of Bolton, supposing you were the representative of Bolton?—Yes.

4168. Whatever your own opinion might be?—As I stated before, in answer to some other questions, that I should go for the permissive principle, and allow those towns who wish to introduce it to do so.

4169. I gather from what you said to me now, that what is called the permissive principle you agree to?—Yes.

4170. That is that the Legislature should abdicate its powers, and hand them over to each separate town?—In matters of that kind I should recommend it.

4171. That would be your idea of good legislation?—Yes, in matters of that kind.

4172. Have you ever thought of the hurley burley and the row-dow that the whole country would be in, in consequence?—I do not think that there would be anything of that kind.

4173. Then from the line of your thought I suppose your mind has been a good deal concentrated upon the doings in America upon this matter, has it not?—Yes, it has.

4174. Have you not heard it proclaimed aloud

that

that the great principle of teetotalism was triumphant in Massachusetts?—I have heard that statement.

4175. And you believed it, did you not?—I believed it to a certain extent.

4176. Do you believe it now?—I believe it to a certain extent.

4177. Have you read the late reports from our authorities in Massachusetts, our Consul to the Home Government upon the working of that Act?—I have not read them all.

4178. Have you read the one that has been in all the newspapers within the last week?—I have not.

4179. You did not hear that the whole thing was a failure; that it created a system of espionage; that it troubled the people so that they rose up pretty nearly as one man against it, and it was put down; that that was the result of the legislation which you would adopt?—I have not read that, but I have travelled through Massachusetts at the same time when this was in operation.

4180. Did you ever hear of what is called the "Striped Dog"?—I did not.

4181. Did you ever go into a public-house in Massachusetts?—Yes, many.

4182. Did you ever know that people asked for liquor and were told that they could not get it?—Yes.

4183. And thereupon a man came and told them, "We have a striped dog in a room by the side, and if you will pay half-a-crown you may see it"?—I have heard of that, but I never saw it.

4184. You never tried it?—I never tried it.

4185. Did you ever hear of a friend of yours who did?—No.

4186. Those questions of mine all come to this; do you believe that, supposing you adopted your principle of legislation, there would be a good deal of evasion of the law?—I believe there would be evasion, as there is evasion of every other law which interferes with the evil habits of a large class of the community.

4187. I take it that the law against stealing is tried to be evaded?—Yes.

4188. But we do not put the case, I take it, upon the same grounds as those restrictions of excise; for example, the limit of taxation which governs the Legislature is the evasion of the law, but the evasion of the law feeling does not do so, so that you see there is a distinction between the two?—Yes.

4189. If that be the case, would you not consider the evasion of this law a moral evil?—I should.

4190. And added to the evil of drunkenness?—Yes.

4191. If, over and above drunkenness, you add plus the mischief arising from evasion of the law, do not you think that that would be a greater mischief?—I think it would be a mischief, but I think the prevention of drunkenness would be a great good, and that the good would preponderate over the evil.

4192. That is to say, if you could prevent drunkenness; but supposing with all your restriction you merely got evasion and not prevention, what should you say to that?—I believe that every restriction prevents drunkenness to a certain extent.

4193. That is the very point that we want to get at; you, I think, reason thus, that restriction hitherto has done good, in which I agree with you perfectly, and therefore further restriction would do good?—I believe so.

4194. That is your mode of reasoning?—Yes.

4195. I put to you the distinct question which I put to a former witness, whether, in point of fact, the total prohibition of drinking would prevent drinking altogether?—I do not think it would.

4196. But nevertheless you would be for complete prohibition?—I should be very glad to see it.

4197. You would be very glad, I suppose, if there were a good effect flowing from it, but if it could be shown that it would not produce good, you would not so far follow your hobby as then to advocate total closing, would you?—No.

4198. You say, I think, that you employ over a thousand men?—Yes, men and women.

4199. What is the general character of the body of your working people?—Their general character is that during the week they are steady and attentive to their work, but very often on a Monday morning we have a large number short, particularly of men; a considerable number during the forenoon of Monday, and many during the whole of Monday.

4200. And they are short in consequence of being tipsy on Sunday, are they?—Yes, I believe so.

4201. When do they get their wages?—On Friday.

4202. Do you find a great deal of drunkenness on Saturday?—There is a little.

4203. In the cases brought up on Monday morning, is there always a distinction between the Saturday cases and the Sunday cases?—Yes.

4204. Can you tell me the average number of cases of people drunk on Sunday?—I am not prepared to give the number.

4205. If you have not the numbers, how can you draw a comparison between the Saturday and the Sunday?—In 1866, we had 433 Sunday cases, taking Saturday night and Sunday, and 360 the whole week besides.

4206. So that the Sunday overbears the whole week in Bolton?—Yes, that is my statement.

4207. Do you believe that?—Yes.

4208. You really do?—I do.

4209. That is to say, two days in the week overbear all the other days of the week?—Those numbers are merely from Saturday night to Monday morning.

4210. Do you really believe those figures?—Yes.

4211. How are they gathered?—They are compiled by the chief constable.

4212. From what records?—From the magistrates' books.

4213. You sincerely believe that that is a true description of the drunkenness of Bolton?—Yes, I do; I beg your pardon, it is not a true description of the entire drunkenness; we do not take people up for being drunk merely, it is only when they are drunk and disorderly, or drunk and incapable.

4214. The whole population is 76,000, and during the whole 52 weeks you have had a little more than 700 cases of drunkenness before the magistrates?—Yes.

4215. And that you consider a very bad state of things?—These are simply drunk and incapable and drunk and disorderly; we do not take people up merely for being drunk.

4216. I know that, but I want to know from you whether you consider that a very horrible state of things?—I think there are towns that are much worse.

4217. You

4217. You have not answered me, but never mind about that; now let me come to another point; you have been an inhabitant of Bolton pretty nearly all your life, have you not?—For more than 20 years.

4218. Have you remarked any great change in the manners and habits of the people of Bolton in that time?—I have.

4219. And for the better?—Yes, for the better.

4220. There has been a gradual improvement in their morals, their habits and their manners?—I believe so.

4221. And this has been done under the present Legislation?—Yes.

4222. Have you ever tried, in order to improve the habits of the people to improve their education?—Yes.

4223. Can you give me any idea of what the educational power is in Bolton?—I am not prepared with statistics; but we have a large number of day schools and a very large number of Sabbath schools.

4224. Have you opened any parks for the people?—Yes.

4225. What sort of recreation can they take in that park on Sunday; is it merely walking about?—Merely walking about.

4226. Have you any music in the park?—No, not on Sunday.

4227. Have you on week days?—Yes.

4228. Do you find any mischief arising from that on week days?—No.

4229. What is your objection to having it on Sunday?—The question has never been raised with us.

4230. I suppose you know that that happens in London every Sunday pretty nearly, and that Government sanctions it?—I believe so.

4231. Though you in Bolton have never raised the question, do not you think it would be in advantage to the morals of the people to give them a perfectly harmless amusement, and good music on Sunday?—That question has never been put before the council.

4232. But you prefer going to this sort of legislation, to trying those more gentle means?—We did try opening the park; when the park was opened in the first instance, it was closed until noon on Sunday, but the matter was brought before the council, and we passed a resolution to open it the whole of Sunday.

4233. You have not answered my question; why do you prefer this stringent legislation to the more merciful mode of providing cheerful amusements for the people on Sunday; that I suppose never suggested itself to you as a means of preventing drunkenness?—I have heard it suggested.

4234. But you do not adopt it?—No.

4235. But you would rather adopt this stringent legislation than the more mild and merciful mode of giving good music to the people on Sunday?—I would rather give good music in church than in the park.

4236. But you would not suppose that the people should be in church all day?—No.

4237. They have a great number of leisure hours on Sunday, have they not?—Yes.

4238. Do you think that while they are walking about in the park with their wives and families they could enjoy it better than by listening to the great efforts of human genius, in the shape of fine music?—I believe it is a great benefit to them to walk in the park, and I should say that I voted in favour of opening the park the whole of Sunday, but if your question is with regard to providing music in the park, I should vote against it.

4239. I want just to come at your mind, that is all; I do not express any opinion about it, but, to adopt the very wise mode of the honourable Member for Chichester, who sums up the evidence of the witnesses, I may conclude that your opinion is, that it is better to have stringent legislation for Sunday drinking than to employ the more mild and merciful mode of improving the habits and manners of the people?—It is simply a matter of opinion as to what those mild and merciful modes may be; I prefer the more mild and merciful modes, and in voting for the opening of the park, I think I was adopting a mild and merciful mode, and I believe that it has been very beneficial; I walk in the park occasionally myself to see its effect.

4240. But those mild and merciful modes do not include, in your mind, music?—No.

4241. I suppose that Bolton has a number of newspapers, has it not?—Yes.

4242. Have you any idea what their opinion is upon this question of Sunday drinking?—I believe they all advocate Sunday closing.

4243. I want to get at the feeling of the people, because you can get that very well through the newspapers?—We have three newspapers, and they all advocate Sunday closing.

4244. A newspaper is generally written to the opinion of the people, or what they believe to be their opinion; written for the purpose of being sold?—No doubt.

4245. I want to get at the general opinion of the newspapers about Sunday closing, and you say that it is in favour of it?—Yes.

4246. Has that been the case with every paper there?—Yes, I believe so.

4247. Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen.] You stated, did you not, that the condition of the people of Bolton had improved during the time you have known the town?—Yes.

4248. Has that arisen, do you think, from the moral influence of gentlemen like yourself who have been most desirous to promote the moral, intellectual, and social improvement of the people?—I believe it has to a considerable extent.

4249. Do you think that there is any chance of that moral influence being weakened if you bring restrictions in to support it?—I think not.

4250. Do not you think that people who are willing to be led by such influence are rather apt to recoil from those who would drive them by restrictions?—I believe that the majority of the working people are in favour of more restrictive measures.

4251. In short, do you believe that moral influence is not weakened by a stringent law being called in to support it; or, to put it in another way, do you think that people may be as easily driven as they can be led?—Not altogether.

4252. Do not you think that in trying to drive you may sometimes repel those who might be led?—I have often found it to be the case in my own personal experience in talking with drunkards, that in many instances the drunkards themselves are in favour of this movement; they say, "Why do you not close those places?" Many drunkards have said that to me.

J. Barlow,

4253. Those are persons who cannot trust themselves, and who are not to be affected by your moral influence; do you think it is right for their sake to impose restrictions upon a much larger class of people, who, in an ordinary community like Bolton, must exist, and who might use those houses without making a bad use of them?—I go back again to my former answer, that my opinion is that if the majority are in favour, I would certainly go in favour of it.

4254. You stated just now that you were in favour of a permissive Bill; you are in favour of it, I presume, because in such cases as these the local community are the best judges of the wants of their own localities?—Yes.

4255. I presume you do not give your support to a Bill by which the Legislature is called upon to do that which in many cases would override the opinion of the local community?—I would go rather in favour of the permissive principle.

4256. Being in favour of the permissive principle, you are not in favour of legislative coercion or restriction?—If you apply that to the Sunday question alone, I have a strong opinion that the liquor trade should be put on the same principle as every other trade in this country. You compel me to stop my work on Sunday, and you compel grocers and butchers to close their shops on Sunday, and I think that the liquor trade ought to be put on the same level as any other trade.

4257. What I want to get at is this; I want to know if you are in favour of letting localities decide those questions for themselves, how is it that you are supporting a Bill which takes that out of the power of the localities, and imposes, by the central legislative authority, restrictions upon the community?—I simply say that if asked which I would prefer, I would prefer the permissive principle.

4258. Therefore you take this Bill, not as a satisfactory settlement of the question, but as an instalment leading to something which you want to get afterwards?—Yes.

4259. With regard to closing, do you close in Bolton earlier on Saturday than on other days?—At one hour earlier.

4260. Are the working class generally liberated from their employment earlier on Saturday than on other days?—Yes, at 1 and 2 o'clock on Saturday; other days at 6.

4261. And Sunday, of course, is a leisure day with them?—Yes.

4262. Therefore, of course, in the statistics which you have given, it comes to this, that the majority of cases occur upon the two days in which the people have more leisure to go to public-houses, and more money in their pockets, than upon those five days when their leisure is much smaller, and they have not received their wages?—Yes.

4263. In that canvass which you have spoken of, did you ever ask the lodgers as well as householders for their opinion?—No.

4264. Is not a lodger less likely than a householder to have his beer at his command in his own house?—In a place like Bolton there are not very many lodgers.

4265. Still there are some, and those you did not ask?—No; simply the householders.

4266. Mr. Yorke.] With regard to those statistics, I think you said that there are 433 cases of drunkenness on Saturday and Sunday, and 360 on the rest of the week?—Yes.

4267. And you said that the bench met three days a week?—Yes.

4268. Did you mean that there were 433 cases on Monday, and that there were 360 on Wednesdays, or on Wednesdays and Fridays together?—On Thursdays and Saturdays together, so that on Monday we heard all the cases from the Saturday to Monday morning, including a Sunday evening.

4269. You mean that you had 433 cases on Monday, and do you mean that you had 360 on the Thursdays, or 360 on the Thursdays and Saturdays put together?—The Thursdays and Saturdays put together.

4270. Mr. Evans.] You stated, did you not, in answer to a question from the honourable Member for Sandwich, that there were not many lodgers in Bolton?—Yes.

4271. Can you tell me whether any considerable number of persons take any of their meals in a public-house?—I should say very few do. In connection with most of the public works we have public dining-rooms specially for them where they can warm their meals, or get them during the dinner hour.

4272. You think that very few persons are in the habit of taking their meals in public-houses as distinguished from drinking?—Very few in Bolton.

4273. The public-houses are open in Bolton on Sunday until 11 o'clock at night, are they not?—Yes.

4274. Do you think that any good purpose would be answered by their closing at 10 instead of 11 on Sunday?—I believe that every shortening of the hours is an improvement.

4275. Do you think that the greater part of the drinking to excess takes place late or early in the public-houses on Sunday?—I should say that the night was the worst time.

4276. In fact you think that if the hours were made two hours shorter on Sunday evening that would have a good effect as far as it goes?—I do.

4277. Mr. John Abel Smith.] I only want to put your opinions accurately and fairly with regard to the Permissive Bill; I understand that you prefer a Permissive Bill to this or any other direct and distinct legislation?—Yes.

4278. But you do not consider that an abdication of the powers of Parliament, but merely the fact that each separate locality is the best judge of its own wants and wishes?—Yes.

4279. Do you believe that the feeling at Bolton is in favour of a Permissive Bill?—I do.

4280. You have been subjected to a very severe cross-examination by an honourable Member of the Committee, but do I correctly understand from you that you believe the canvass of the town to have been fairly and honestly conducted, and that the general feeling of the community in Bolton, both of the upper and working classes, is in favour of increased restrictions on Sunday drinking?—I believe so; I may say in addition that the town council, as representing the town, passed a resolution in favour of Mr. Somes' Bill, when it was before Parliament.

4281. Mr. Locke.] That was for total closing on Sunday, was it not?—Yes.

4282. Chairman.] You have told us the number who have given replies to those inquiries, but those numbers do not amount, do they, to above half of the householders of Bolton?—Yes, they do; they amount to more than 8,000.

4283. Eight

4283. Eight thousand gave answers, and 1,500 gave no answers?—Yes.

4284. And were papers issued to the remainder?—Papers were issued, but for various reasons they were not collected. Some people would destroy the papers, and others were not in when the people called; and this of course being voluntary work, if a person called for a paper once, and the man was not in, I presume he would not call again. Therefore, supposing there to be 13,000 householders in Bolton, and 6,377 answered in the affirmative, and 1,783 in the negative, there were all the rest who were either avowedly neutral, or who gave no answer at all.

4285. Therefore, of the whole of the householders, you could not say that the majority answered in favour?—I am not prepared with the exact number; but if you take the number at 12,000, you have a majority; but if you take it at 13,000, you have not a majority.

4286. You are not prepared to say whether the householders of Bolton are 12,000, 13,000, or 14,000?—They would not be 14,000, I am certain.

4287. But you think that certainly there would be over 12,000 and under 14,000?—There are over 12,000, I know.

4288. Mr. Hibbert.] Can you state what number of papers were issued, because you may not have issued the same number of papers as there are householders?—I am not prepared to state that; but 9,717 papers were collected.

4289. Mr. Roebuck.] I see that the paper runs thus—"The committee of the above association respectfully request the occupier of this house to write 'Yes' opposite to whichever of the following questions he assented to;" you did not ask them to give any negatives, did you?—If you read over the questions, one of the questions is, "Are you in favour of the law as it stands?" and of course "Yes" to that would be against Sunday closing.

4290. But you do not ask him to say "No" to any question?—No, I believe not.

4291. Then how do you gather the negatives?—The answer "Yes" to the question "Are you in favour of the present law as it is?" would be a negative used against Sunday closing, of course.

4292. Is that the only way in which you got at the negatives?—I presume that is the only way provided for in that paper.

4293. What I understand now is, that all the answers "Yes" to the question "Do you prefer the law as it is?" you took to be negatives?—Yes.

4294. That is the way you got the negatives?—Yes, I believe so.

4295. And that is the only way you got the negatives?—I believe so.

4296. Mr. John Abel Smith.] Have you any doubt that that was the general understanding upon the subject?—None whatever.

4297. Mr. Locke.] This paper is only addressed to the occupier of the house, that is the householder?—Yes.

4298. That is to say, the person who pays the rates?—Yes.

4299. Are there no lodgers in Bolton?—There are some, but not many in Bolton.

4300. There are 76,000 people, and there are only between 12,000 and 14,000 householders; how do you make up all the 76,000 people if you have not a great many lodgers?—Very easily; with five or six people in a house you will get the number.

4301. But are there five or six people in every house?—I should say so; I think that is the average.

4302. But you have not had the opinion of those other five or six people, who are in the house, at all?—No.

4303. As to the householder, the person who lives in the house, and who is the master of the house, it would not be as necessary for him, would it, to have a public-house open on the Sunday as it would be for a person who was a lodger?—No, but we have very few of these in Bolton.

Mr. ALDERMAN MACKIE, called in; and Examined.

4304. Mr. John Abel Smith.] ARE you an Alderman of Manchester?—Yes.

4305. You have had, I think, the unusual honour conferred upon you of having been elected three times Mayor of Manchester?—Yes, that is so.

4306. I think that you are very largely engaged in the liquor trade?—Very largely indeed.

4307. Are you in the liquor trade at Manchester, and at Kirkcudbright in Scotland?—I am a landed proprietor at Kirkcudbright; I am not in the liquor trade in Scotland.

4308. But at Carlisle, Dublin, Liverpool, Manchester, Birmingham, Birkenhead, London, and Brighton you are in the liquor trade?—Yes, I am; but perhaps I may be allowed to say, that I am a banker at Carlisle, and not in the liquor trade there.

4309. You are a proprietor of public-houses, are you not?—We have retail licenses in connection with almost all our wholesale businesses; I am not the proprietor of public-houses at all.

4310. Have you the power of influencing the closing or opening of those houses on Sunday?—I have never opened any of them on the Sunday; 0.69.

I have been in business for 40 years, and I never opened one on the Sunday.

4311. Are you largely cognizant of the lives, feelings, and opinions of the working men in Manchester?—I cannot say that I am; I do not mix much with them; I only have the same opportunity that all other gentlemen have, from the public prints, of gathering the opinion generally.

4312. Have you a conviction that their opinions are in favour of further restriction on Sunday drinking?—I think they would not at all object to it; that is my feeling.

4313. Do you believe that it would advance their moral improvement and their social comfort if that were done?—Yes, no doubt; that is my private opinion, otherwise I should open upon Sunday the same as other people.

4314. Do you believe that there is much drinking in Manchester on Sunday?—I cannot say that I know that myself.

4315. Do you live at Manchester?—I live out of Manchester a little way; I live within the Parliamentary boundary; but I am not in the city at all on Sunday, except going to church.

Mr.
Alderman
Mackie.
—
18 May
1868.

4316. With regard to this very extensive trade in intoxicating liquors in which you are engaged, have you from the first, during a long course of years, set yourself against the practice of Sunday trading?—Yes.

4317. Do you believe that it is not necessary for a publican to open on Sunday, with reference to his own interests?—I do not think that it is, and I have taken various opportunities, in public meetings, of advising publicans to shut up on Sunday, inasmuch as I think that it would tend to their respectability, and that probably they would get a more respectable class of servants.

4318. You cannot speak anything as to the drunken cases in Manchester, or to the extent of drunkenness?—No; although I am a magistrate I do not go upon the bench; I avoid it as much as I possibly can.

4319. Are you a visiting magistrate?—Yes.

4320. Do you go to the gaol?—Yes.

4321. Is there much evidence there of the effect of drunkenness?—Yes; I understand that a great many of the prisoners are put there in consequence of drunkenness and what results from it.

4322. Do you believe that drunkenness is directly and indirectly the cause of a very large proportion of crime?—I do believe so.

4323. Have you read the Bill which is referred to this Committee?—No, I have not.

4324. Do you know the provisions of it?—I know something of it, but I have not read it in detail.

4325. The provisions of the Bill are, first, that there should be on Sunday no drinking whatever at the counter on the premises on Sunday; secondly, that the houses should be open for the purchase of beer across the counter from half-past 12 to half-past 2, and from 8 to 10 in the evening; do you think that those hours would fairly meet the necessities and convenience of the working classes?—I am quite of that opinion; but I would go a little further than that. I am for Sunday closing altogether, but at the same time, I think it would be well to begin here and see how this goes on, and probably by-and-by it may be found necessary to close such houses altogether on Sundays.

4326. Do you believe that the Bill if carried into a law would be found to produce a good deal of public confusion or resistance among the people of Manchester?—I have not the slightest conception of such a thing. I think that the opening of the houses on Sunday causes a great deal more confusion.

4327. Do you recollect the passing of Mr. Wilson Patten's Act in 1854?—Yes; I just recollect it, although I have no very distinct recollection.

4328. You do not recollect its working particularly?—No. I forget the tenor of the Act altogether. Although I have been engaged in the trade, we never kept open above two-thirds of the hours that we are allowed to do by law, because we open at 8 in the morning, and shut at 10 at night, except on Saturday. Therefore I never paid any attention to these Acts, inasmuch as they never applied to my particular case.

4329. Are you in favour of the Permissive Bill?—No; I am not in favour of that Bill.

4330. Do you believe that a great improvement has taken place in the people since you were in business?—I think that the tone of society has very much changed for the better. I do not think that there are so many drunken cases as there used to be. Certainly, in Scotland, it holds good to a very great extent.

4331. Do you attribute that in any degree to the restrictions now existing?—I do think that the Forbes Mackenzie Act has had a beneficial effect in Scotland.

4332. Are you favourable to the principle of restriction if it is not carried to an intolerable extent?—Quite so.

4333. And you do not believe that such legislation as I have described to you would carry restriction to such an extent as to provoke resistance?—Certainly not.

4334. Mr. Hibbert.] You state that you close all your houses on Sunday; are they principally situated in Manchester, or are they in different parts of the country?—To explain that it will be necessary to state, that at the beginning we aimed only at a wholesale business, but we could not get a retail license except by going into the retail trade, to enable us to supply private families with smaller quantities than the wholesale license would allow us to do; so that we were driven by necessity to go into the retail trade.

4335. Mr. John Abel Smith.] Is not this a short way to describe it, that you found that by no other means could you sell single bottles?—Yes, that was so; there is a licensing Act now, which has been passed lately, and which gives us the privilege.

4336. Mr. Hibbert.] And you sought to obtain houses in different parts of the country?—Yes; in every place where we have wholesale establishments, but nowhere else.

4337. In all those different places where you have establishments you close your houses on Sunday, do you not?—Yes; we do not open them at all.

4338. You find no inconvenience to arise from that?—Not the slightest; I believe we have done 10 times more business from the fact of our not opening upon the Sunday; such is my feeling.

4339. Mr. Locke.] You sell more in the six days than other people do in the seven?—Yes.

4340. Mr. Hibbert.] You stated that you recommended publicans to close on Sunday; should you think that any great number of publicans are in favour of your principle of closing on Sundays?—I think that a number of publicans would be very well satisfied to close on Sunday; that is my private opinion; and indeed some few of the best do close on the Sunday; but the others are afraid, and they say, "If I do not open on Sunday, and my neighbour does, and he gets my customers upon the Sunday, he will get them in the course of the week;" that is the idea that they have.

4341. Do you think that a greater number of publicans would close altogether on Sunday, if they got certain advantages in the license, for instance, supposing they could take a license for six days?—I think that it would be a capital idea to make those who would open on Sunday pay three times the license, or something of that kind, for the seventh day more than for any other day, and then you would see whether they were in earnest upon the question, or not.

4342. Do you think that the advantage which they would thereby get, would lead a great number to close altogether on Sunday?—I am sure it would.

4343. You say that you do not know the particular particular details of this Bill; do you think that it would be better to carry out so great a restriction at once, or would you have a smaller restriction in the first instance, that is to say, if instead of closing as now at 11, the public-houses were closed at 9 o'clock on Sunday?—Yes; I certainly think that the less there are open on the Sunday, the better, because it involves the keeping of servants employed, as they must be there.

4344. Therefore, your own opinion is in favour of total closing?—Yes, that is my own opinion; but perhaps it would not be a prudent course to carry that out, to begin with.

4345. Some questions were asked a previous witness, about certain attractions and amusements for the people on Sunday; do you know whether any attempts had ever been made in Manchester to introduce music in the parks on Sunday?—Yes; there was an attempt made of that kind some 8 or 10 years ago.

4346. Was not that very unsatisfactory to a great many people?—It was discontinued; there was a good deal of public excitement about it, and the thing was discontinued.

4347. Do you know why?—It was simply the gathering of the people together in the parks.

4348. Was it not the case that the Manchester council gave their consent to music taking place in the parks on Sunday, but that a large number of people in Manchester were very strongly opposed to it?—That was so; a large number were opposed to it.

4349. And, so to avoid a strong public feeling upon the subject it was entirely given up?—Yes.

4350. Do you know anything about the public-houses that have musical attractions on Sunday evenings in Manchester?—I do not know of my own knowledge whether it is so or not; I have told you that I do not live in Manchester, and in fact, I have not made any inquiry.

4351. During the time that you were Mayor of Manchester did it not come to your knowledge in any way?—No.

4352. Do you think that further restrictions should take place with respect to those musical attractions?—I do not know whether they exist or not; I know that there are musical saloons in Manchester, but whether they are open on Sunday night, I do not know. I should think it is very likely that they are.

4353. Mr. Locke.] What is your precise business?—I am engaged in a great number.

4354. I mean with regard to liquors?—The same as all other wine and spirit merchants.

4355. You were stating that you were obliged to alter the course of your business in order to sell by retail; what was the precise mode that you adopted in order to come within the Act?—We could not carry out our wholesale business as we wished with private families without having a license which would enable us to sell a single bottle. Under the wholesale Act we could sell nothing less than two gallons; but a person would not be inclined to buy two gallons of gin, or two gallons of brandy, at a time, when two bottles would answer his purpose; and, therefore, we had to get a retail license to enable us to supply those customers.

4356. Was that retail license obtained from the magistrates?—Yes.

4357. The same thing as a licensed victuallers' license?—Yes; in every respect the same.

0.69.

4358. Do you sell beer in casks?—Yes, certainly.

4359. But you do not sell any on draught?—Yes, we do; the same as a licensed publican.

4360. Where?—In Manchester or anywhere else.

4361. Then, in fact, you have public-houses in Manchester?—We have a public-house license in connection with a wholesale license, both together in the same place.

4362. But do you sell upon those premises nothing but liquors?—Nothing but liquors.

4363. No food?—No food.

4364. Then, in fact, you are carrying on business with a licensed victualler's license without supplying any other refreshment except drink?—Yes, certainly; no other refreshment but drink.

4365. And your opinion is, that you have sold just as much or more in the retail trade since you left off selling on Sunday?—I think, for instance, if we had carried on our retail trade upon the same plan on which it is carried on generally, admitting all sorts of people into the houses, keeping open at all hours, and gaining every penny that we possibly could, we should have done no more business than any other retail victualler in Manchester; but I believe that we have done three times the business, in a retail sense, in Manchester, in consequence of having the hours limited, shutting up at a respectable hour on the Saturday night, not later than 10 o'clock, and never opening upon the Sunday at all. But I believe that if we had differently carried on our business we should not have done the same class of business or have had the same class of customers.

4366. Although your customers do not get drunk on Sunday, they get just as drunk on the other six days, do they not?—That is their affair; I know nothing about that.

4367. You would only diminish the drunkenness on one particular day in the week; but there would be as many drunkards during the week, only that the drunkenness would take place on six days instead of seven?—That may be your view of the question, but I cannot hold your opinion of it. I say this, that if they wanted to get drunk on Sundays they could not do it at my places.

4368. You say that there would not be a greater consumption of liquor if the place was shut up on Sunday, and consequently, although men might not get drunk on Sunday, there would, perhaps, be as many people get drunk during the week, taking only six days to do it in?—Upon my principle they must drink only in a certain number of hours; they have fewer hours to do it in.

4369. They would be more drunken, would they not?—No, I think not; I think less so; according to the rule-of-three, if a man would get drunk in 10 hours, he would get doubly drunk in 15.

4370. I should think he might get doubly drunk in one; if a man drank the same quantity in one hour that he would take in 15, would not a man get more drunk in one hour if he drank the same quantity all at once?—I never tried the experiment, therefore I cannot answer that question.

4371. With regard to your licenses, although you have a licensed victualler's license, you do not perform the duties of a licensed victualler, which are to provide meat, drink and lodging, as well well as liquors to any customer who chooses to come, which customer has a right to compel you to do it; you have no accommodation whatever, as I understand, for furnishing any meat or drink?—That was a defect in the law; but it has now been remedied, so that we now have a license to enable us to supply our customers with a smaller quantity than two gallons.

4372. Is it not a fact that the effect of the magistrates' license is to enable you to have houses which must necessarily be gin-shops and nothing else, as you do not perform the duties which a licensed victualler is compelled to perform by his license as an innkeeper?—We never did so.

4373. That is the position in which you stand with regard to these things, and you think that as far as you are concerned, the closing on Sunday would do no injury whatever to your business, as you sell just as much liquor, and more than others who do keep open?—I believe that it would not do any injury to the licensed publican.

4374. Now a licensed publican is compelled, as probably you are aware, to furnish refreshment to any traveller, or to any person, in point of fact, who chooses to go into his house?—I suppose that is the law.

4375. Then from the mode in which you carry on your business, although you have a licensed victualler's business, you do not fulfil those duties?—No.

4376. Then probably you might not be quite so good a judge of the benefit, or otherwise, in this case, as the man who does supply other things besides drink?—No, I have no means of knowing that.

4377. You sell, as I understand you, a glass of gin?—Yes, in the retail place.

4378. You sell gin, bottled beer, and other liquors; you have got a bar, I presume, about which persons cluster, and you think there is not the slightest harm if 500 people cluster round the bar and drink gin on the week day, but it is a fearful crime on the Sunday?—I have no place for their sitting down at all.

4379. Not the least accommodation?—Not the slightest.

4380. Are you not aware that it is considered one of the most objectionable features in public-houses, that there should be no place for people to sit down, and that they go and stand, a great number of them, round the bar and drink gin?—That is an objection which is often raised.

4381. And yet you carry that out to an extent beyond any other individual, probably, in this kingdom?—I do not allow them to get drunk; they must walk away immediately, just the same as taking a railway ticket; they must just pass on, and they do not stop in the house at all.

4382. They are not to drink in comfort, but as long as they drink that is all you care?—I have no answer to give to that.

4383. Chairman.] You have spoken of the grand results of the Forbes Mackenzie Act in Scotland; I dare say you remember how much drinking there used to be in our counties before that Act was passed?—Yes; quite so.

4384. We come from the same part of the country, and you know very well how different, as regards drinking, are the habits of the working classes in Scotland and England?—Yes.

4385. In Scotland a respectable working man, as a rule, drinks nothing at all, ardent spirit or fermented liquors?—That is so; or at least very little.

4386. But in England beer is the common beverage of the working men, is it not?—That is so.

4387. So that a restrictive Act in England operates upon a very different class of persons from those who are affected by it in Scotland?—No doubt that is so.

4388. And therefore such a Bill as this, which would prevent working men in the daily habit of taking beer, from having any at their accustomed place on Sunday, would be a very great invasion of their habits, would it not?—I think that the great bulk of working men in Manchester go home to their own houses to drink, and have their beer there. All the people in Manchester who work in factories, do not go to the public-houses; not one even goes to the public-house, except for the purpose of drinking. For their meals they go to their own houses and get their beer there, and the wife partakes of the beer also; at least I suppose she does.

4389. From the habit of the people who enter the houses of which you are the proprietor, you have the respectable part of the custom?—Yes; to be sure I have. It is a different trade altogether.

4390. Have you not a great many decent people who come and get their glass of beer every day in some of your houses, as a rule?—Yes; but that is not with their meals. None of them ever take their meals in any of our houses.

4391. But they come and take their glass of beer at an odd time?—No doubt a great number of them do.

4392. Many of that class of people go to other houses in the same way, and they would do so on Sundays, like as other days?—There is no question of it.

4393. They go in, not for the sake of getting drunk, but to take a glass of what they want, and then go away?—Yes.

4394. Would not it make a violent change in the habits of such people, if they were debarred from having their glass in that way, unless they go and take it home?—I think not. I do not think it would make very much change, because those who take their glass of beer now and again in the course of the day must be confined to their workshop where they are working; they cannot go a great distance for it. They may work at a considerable distance from the place where their wives and children are; but they are with them on the Sunday, and there is no difficulty in getting their beer upon the Sunday, if they provide it on the Saturday night, the same as they provide their bread and their meat; they can take their beer home with them on Saturday night, if they so wish it.

4395. Do many working men, within your knowledge, buy their beer on Saturday night, and keep it for Sunday's dinner?—I know, of my own personal knowledge, that hundreds and thousands in Manchester do so.

4396. Do you bottle beer in your establishments with a view to the accommodation of those people?—Yes; I have always done it; those people take it home, perhaps, in bottle; at least the most respectable portion of them do; but a notorious drunkard will just get drunk every day, and he thinks there is no refreshment in drinking at all at home; he must always go to a public-house; therefore I say that closing on Sunday would would be a great benefit to the public, because if any man requires rest one day in seven it is the drunkard who drinks six days; and I think it would be the greatest benefit in the world to him for the houses to be shut up on Sunday.

4397. Though he would be able to draw his liquor on the Saturday night, and sot over it on the Sunday, still you make it more difficult for him, and he would have to lay his plans beforehand?—He must think beforehand, if he takes it home on Saturday night.

4398. Mr. Roebuck.] I gather from what you say, that you conclude that if this sort of legislation were adopted you would not be a money sufferer?—That is a question which has never once occurred to me.

4399. I did not say that it had; but is not it the fact?—I do not think so; I do not believe that we would, but it has never been a question at all with us.

4400. Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen.] You said that you recommended the publicans to close on Sunday?—Yes, I did at a meeting when I was in the chair addressing them, because I am an alderman, and as one of the licensed publicans at Manchester, and when I began to advise them in that way, they looked upon me rather as an enemy than a friend; I always used to quote my own case to show how well we had succeeded by not opening on Sunday; I am not quite so popular now as I used to be with the publicans.

4401. If without any such legislation the respectable publicans throughout the country were to adopt your advice, would not it have the effect of driving people to less respectable houses?—They could not get to the less respectable houses if all were to do it.

4402. If that advice were followed by the respectable houses throughout the country without legislation, do not you fear that as a natural result they would go to the worst class of houses?—Yes, unless they took it home with them upon the Saturday night.

4403. With reference to what you stated just now, you having upon high moral grounds always closed your own houses, you have no personal interest in this Legislation, of course; it would not affect you or your houses at all?—Not the slightest.

4404. And, probably, you have been so satisfied with the result which you have obtained, that you have not very carefully considered what the effect of such an Act as this might be upon persons less fortunately situated than yourself?—My idea is this, that it is not the public that wants this accommodation so much; it is those who deal in the article; they say that the public would be very much disappointed; it is their business, and they say, "We are so interested in supplying the wants of the public that we dare not shut up on Sunday." The public make no such demand upon them; in my opinion, they are only open for the purpose of the mere sale of drink.

4405. But you have not answered my question: "Have you very carefully considered the effect which such an enactment might have upon persons less fortunately situated than yourself?"—I answered it in the best possible way I can; I intend what I have said just now as an answer.

4406. The answer you gave was that the publicans are thinking of their own interest and not of the interest of the public?—Certainly that is what I think.

4407. You have told us that you have not felt yourself the effects of closing on Sunday; that you have done a better business since you closed?—A great deal better.

4408. And other people if they followed your own example, you think, would meet with the same desirable result?—I so advise them from time to time.

4409. You think that a legislation compelling everybody to follow your example, would lead to a larger consumption of spirits throughout the country?—I do not know whether it would be so or not.

4410. Is not that the logical conclusion from what you have just stated?—I think if you carry it out, it will apply to the sale of drink all over the country, if I understand your question; but I do not believe that that is so.

4411. You have stated that if the publicans all followed your example, they would do a better business?—They would do a more respectable business.

4412. We know that a better business means more returns; therefore does not the logical conclusion follow that more spirituous liquor would be sold and a greater consumption of spirits would take place?—No, I do not see the logic of that at all, I confess.

4413. Then you think that a man can increase his business in some other way, and make a better business in some other way than by getting greater returns?—I think a man would make a much better business than by merely getting greater returns. I think that a great deal depends upon the respectability of the class of people that you generally get the money from. I do not think that taking any amount of money makes a business respectable at all, but the manner of conducting the business.

4414. I want to know if publicans are to get a better business, which means in the common acceptance of the term, better returns, how it is that you can gainsay the statement that the logical conclusion of your remarks, is that there would be a larger consumption of spirits?—I think myself that the houses being open every day, and adding Sunday to the week, you must necessarily go lower in the scale of servants. For my part, I would never have served any employer who had opened upon the Sunday; and I think you get a more respectable class of servants by closing on Sunday; and the more respectable they are themselves, the more likely they are to be faithful servants.

4415. Now are we to understand, you think that the lower class of people would not drink so much, but the respectable people would drink more?—I think they would get more faithfully served by their servants.

4416. Is there much cheating, do you think, in the public-houses, now by servants?—I do not know anything at all about that.

4417. You lead me to the question, because you said that you think that their servants would serve them more faithfully?—My opinion is that they would get a higher and moral class of servants.

4418. You mean that because the houses are open on Sunday respectable servants will not serve in those houses?—Not the best of them; they would not take the situation if they opened on Sunday at all.

4419. Mr. John Abel Smith.] You have had an answer put into your mouth which I imagined was not your own; you do not keep what is called a gin-shop?—No.

4420. But your object is to sell small quantities wholesale?—Certainly.

4421. That was the object of your applying for a retail license; not to keep a gin shop?—Certainly not.

4422. But to be able to sell smaller quantities wholesale than the law allowed you?—Precisely so.

4423. And it is not a true picture of your houses to say that people do go in there to drink a few glasses of gin, and there get drunk?—No, they have no occasion to get drunk, there is no room for them; they must be drunk before they come in, if they are drunk, because generally speaking, they do not stay more than two or three minutes, and then pass on.

4424. Your general trade is in bottled liquors; it is not in glasses?—It is altogether a bottled trade.

4425. Mr. Locke.] I understood you to answer my question, that anybody who chose to go into one of your public-houses might have a glass of gin at the bar if he chose?—Yes, he can; that is to say if he is sober; not without. That is one of the rules with us.

4426. You treat him as an ordinary publican would treat any other person?—No, certainly not.

4427. The result at which I have got is this, that if a man came in drunk you are bound not to serve him, are you not?—Certainly.

4428. And you do that?—Yes.

4429. How does that differ from other respectable publicans?—As you have put that question to me, I do not know how publicans do; I do not know whether they serve drunken people or not; we do not, nor do we serve profligate women, or anything of that kind.

4430. A person coming into the bar of one of your houses would have precisely the same accommodation; that is to say he can have any quantity of liquors from a large quantity down to the smallest quantity, namely, a glass of gin if he pleases?—Yes, if he is sober.

Mr. JOHN THOMAS ENRIGHT, called in; and Examined.

Mr. J. T.
Enright.

4431. Chairman.] You were formerly Superintendent of Police at Southampton, were you not?—I was.

4432. Mr. John Abel Smith.] How long were you superintendent of police there?—Thirty-two years.

4433. When did you resign your place?—On the 20th February 1868.

4434. Are you cognisant of the state of Southampton during that period?—I am, I was never out of it.

4435. Was there a great alteration produced in Southampton by the passing of your local Act?—There was very great.

4436. Was there further a great alteration produced by the Act for closing at 1 o'clock in the morning?—There was a still greater reduction of drunkenness.

4437. Do you know the number at any recent period of the drunken cases at Southampton?—I have not any statistics with me, but Mr. Eldridge has them with him.

4438. Did you hear the evidence of Mr. Eldridge?—I did.

4439. Do you agree generally with the statements that he made?—I think there is nothing that I can disapprove of in anything that he said.

4440. As superintendent of police, do you believe that the restrictive laws at present prevailing with reference to Sunday drinking, have been attended with benefit to the social and moral condition of the people of Southampton?—I think they have very much.

4441. Do you think that Sunday drinking has a special evil effect upon the families and comforts of the working men?—I think all drinking has, if carried to any extent; but I would not say Sunday more than any other drinking.

4442. Do people drink more on Sunday at Southampton than on other days?—No, I do not know that they do more than they do on Saturday; I think it is on the Saturday night that they drink most.

4443. Saturday night and Sunday are the two great drinking days?—On Sunday all our houses are closed until 1 o'clock, until very recently an Act passed opening them at half-past 12.

4444. Do you believe that if there was a Bill passed to prevent drinking on the premises on Sunday, leaving four hours in the day for the purchase of beer across the counter, such an Act would produce any confusion, or violence, or public disorder, or resistance at Southampton?—I do not apprehend that there would be the least disorder; but I should say that opening at half-past 12 is almost too soon, it is just the time that people are coming out of the churches and chapels.

4445. What time should you suggest for opening?—One o'clock, or a quarter before 1, would make a great difference, because half-past 12 is just the time when people are coming out of the churches and chapels; therefore to see the public-house doors open just at that time is very objectionable.

4446. Do you believe that there would be much illicit drinking if there was further restriction on Sunday drinking?—No, I do not apprehend that there would be, they are pretty well looked after.

4447. Do you apprehend that the police would have any difficulty in stopping illicit drinking?—No; we fine every one that allows drinking at prohibited hours; we fine every one that we find in the place.

4448. Have you found any complaint or remonstrance with regard to invasion upon the domestic quiet of anybody by attempting to examine as to the fact of illicit drinking?—I have never heard a complaint.

4449. Generally speaking, then, you would express approval of the provisions of the Bill before the Committee?—I would.

4450. Do you wish to see it become law?—I should.

4451. Have you ever heard of what is called the Permissive Bill?—No, I have not.

4452. Mr. Hibbert.] Do you remember the time when Mr. Wilson Patten's Act was in operation in 1854?—No, I do not.

4453. Do you remember the time when public-houses were only allowed to be open between 1 and and 3 in the day and 6 and 10 in the evening?

—Yes, I do.

4454. Do you remember how that Act operated; whether it was advantageous to the quiet of the place or otherwise?—The place was very quiet; but I have heard many people, excursionists, complain of it because they could not get anything to drink when they got home.

4455. Do not you think that if this Bill, which is now before the Committee were to pass into a law similar complaints would arise?—I do not exactly understand at what hour you mean to open.

4456. Do not you know that the Bill before the Committee closes the houses for drinking on the premises altogether, and allows them to be open two hours in the middle of the day and two hours in the evening?—It depends upon what the hours would be. At that time, certainly, there were many complaints from excursionists when the houses were closed at 10 o'clock.

4457. Mr. John Abel Smith.] Do not excursionists come back generally until after 10?—The London excursionists used to complain that they could not get anything when they got back to London.

4458. Mr. Hibbert.] When they got back to London, you say you heard that they made complaints?—Yes, they said that when they got back to London they could not get anything.

4459. Do you think that the same inconvenience would arise in case this Bill were to become law?—We have had no excursion trains to Southampton for a long time.

4460. Have they ceased to come there?—Yes.

4461. Do you know whether any public-houses close at Southampton on Sunday altogether?—I think there are one or two, but not many.

4462. Do you know when the greatest amount of drunkenness occurs on the Sunday; on what part of the day?—Most likely in the evening.

4463. During what hours, the later or the earlier ones?—I should think from 5 o'clock till 11.

4464. At what time do you think the greatest portion of drunken cases occurs?—No doubt later in the evening.

4465. Do not you think that if the houses were closed at an earlier hour we would get rid of some objections?—That would get rid of a great many, but there are always a certain class of people who will bide till the very last moment.

4466. Do you think that if the public-houses were closed at nine in the evening there would be such a chance of people getting drunk as there now?—If you restrict it altogether, and they cannot go into a public-house to sit down, perhaps might; but I think nine o'clock would be rather too early; many people do not have their supper until between 9 and 10.

4467. Do you quite understand the operation of this Bill; should you prefer that the public-houses should be closed altogether for the consumption of liquor on the premises to a further restriction of the present hours?—I think if they were closed altogether for consumption on the premises, and open to out-door customers till a later hour for serving over the counter for people who chose to go for it, it would have a beneficial effect.

4468. You think that less inconvenience would arise from closing altogether for consumption on the premises, than closing them earlier for sale both on and off the premises?—Yes.

4469. Mr. Locke.] Do you not think that that would interfere with many of those living in Southampton who want to go to a public-house and take their supper?—That depends upon the time when they wanted to go to supper.

4470. Any time in the afternoon or evening, if this Bill were passed, no person could go into a public-house who lived in Southampton; he would not be a traveller and he would not be a lodger in the house, but an ordinary person living in Southampton; and if he wanted to go into a public-house and have his supper, do you not think it would be an inconvenience to him?—I do not think that that affects Southampton much.

4471. I suppose it does, to a certain extent? I think a very trifling extent.

4472. Do you think there are no persons who take their meals in public-houses?—Very few indeed, except it is on week days.

4473. At what time do they generally dine?—Somewhere about 12 to 1.

4474. That is the working classes; but are there no other persons but those who want to go to a public-house?—I cannot say.

4475. If there were such a person, of course it would be an inconvenience to him to close the house entirely for consumption on the premises during the whole of Sunday?—It might be inconvenient to those who wish to go there.

4476. You have not given this matter much consideration, have you?—I have not; I had no instructions whatever as to what I was coming for.

4477. You find things work pretty well as they are, do you not?—We are a remarkably quiet town.

4478. Do you see any particular necessity for this legislation?—I think the less you keep open public-houses the better.

4479. How much quieter do you want to make them, if they are quiet now; do not you think that if you come to put a stringent law upon them the result might be rather the contrary; do not you think it is a very good thing to let quiet alone?—I mean that they are very orderly and quiet now.

4480. If they are very orderly and quiet, what more do you want?—It is not I.

4481. You do not want it?—I have no objection against it.

4482. You have no objection, but you do not want it?—I do not say that.

4483. Mr. Roebuck.] You stated, did you not, that there was some illicit drinking in Southampton before you left office?—I am not aware that I said anything of the kind.

4484. Mr. John Abel Smith.] Do you know what is the meaning of illicit drinking?—Yes, I do, perfectly.

4485. Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen.] Did you say that you thought half-past 12 was too early?—It is just the time when people are coming out of the churches and chapels.

4486. What time do the churches and chapels generally begin?—Generally speaking from half-past 10 to 11.

4487. Are they not pretty well over by half-past 12?—No, that is just about the time of coming out of the churches and chapels.

4488. At what time do the workpeople dine?—From 12 to 1.

4489. If the houses were opened later than half-past 12 they could hardly get their beer in time for dinner, could they?—No.

Mr. J. T.
[Enright.]

18 May
1868.

Mr. J. T.
Enright.

18 May
1868.

4490. In fact, you would propose to have them open only at such an hour that they could only get their beer after their dinner?—From 1 till 2.

4491. You say that they dine from 12 till 1; would it not be rather hard to deprive those men of their beer for dinner?—As I said before, it is just the time when the people are coming out of the churches and chapels in the town, that those public-house doors are thrown wide open.

4492. At the time that those persons are coming home, perhaps somebody else who has not been to church or chapel is dining, say between 12 and 1 o'clock?—Either one or the other.

4493. Therefore, they might object if you do not open the public-houses until a later hour?—Yes.

4494. Mr. Yorke.] Are there a great many lodgers in Southampton who have their meals in public-houses?—Not a great many.

4495. Those lodgers, if there are any in Southampton would not be pleased with this Bill?—They would not be affected by it; I suppose all lodgers in public-houses would be allowed to have their meals.

4496. I mean those who lodge about the town, but in places where they cannot get beer with their meals?—If the law was passed, it would be an inconvenience to them, I admit.

4497. In your opinion, would that be an extreme inconvenience, or not?—It would be to them.

4498. But they are not an extreme class?—I do not say so.

4499. Can you give me any idea what sort of number would be affected?—It is impossible for me to give you the number.

4500. Do you think they bear a sensible proportion to the entire population?—I cannot say.

4501. Is there any large number of young men, for instance, who come into Southampton from the neighbourhood to get work, who have no settled homes, and who are obliged to go to public-houses for their meals?—There are a great many passing through the town at different times.

4502. I mean some who come there for some months when the work is plentiful; they perhaps come from the neighbourhood for a few months, and go away again, but they lodge in the town, and have no means of getting their meals or their beer except at a public-house?—If they have no other means than going to a public-house, of course it must affect them.

4503. You cannot tell me whether that class which I have described would or would not be an extensive one?—No, certainly not.

SIR JAMES FERGUSSON, BART., IN THE CHAIR.

The Rev. JOHN FLATHER, called in; and Examined.

4504. Mr. Horsfall.] I BELIEVE you are a Clergyman in Sheffield?—Yes; I am Chaplain of the Sheffield General Cemetery.

4505. Have you resided long in Sheffield?—Sixteen years.

4506. You probably are able to give some evidence to this Committee upon the subject of the Bill which has been referred to them?—I think so.

4507. Mr. John Abel Smith.] You are Secretary to the Town Mission, are you not?—Yes.

4508. Have you paid much attention to the question of the temperance of the people of Sheffield?—I have.

4509. Have you strong convictions upon the question of Sunday drinking?—Very strong convictions.

4510. Do you believe that the Sunday drinking is in excess of the drinking on other days in the week?—I think so.

4511. Do you recollect the passing of Mr. Wilson Patten's Act in 1854?—I do.

4512. That continued in existence, did it not, about 12 months?—Yes.

4513. Did you give your attention to the working of that Act?—Yes.

4514. And can you give the Committee any information as to the number of drunken cases in Sheffield in the six months previous to the passing of that Act, and the six months subsequent to the passing of that Act?—I had personal opportunities of seeing the working of the Act during the whole of the time; my duties led me to traverse the town in various directions, and from the time of its coming into operation, I noticed most beneficial results in the diminution of drunkenness in the town during the Lord's Day; there was also a return made by Mr. Raynor, the then chief constable of Sheffield (the immediate predecessor of the present chief constable of Sheffield), of the number of persons apprehended by the police, by which it appears that 90 males and 16 females were apprehended in the six months immediately preceding the operation of that Act.

4515. Will you state the times for which those arrests took place; were they for drunkenness between what periods?—On the Sunday; I cannot state the exact hours; the return is on each Sunday.

4516. Do you believe it to be from 12 o'clock 0.69.

on Saturday night to 12 o'clock on Sunday night?—Yes; and for the six months subsequent to the operation of the Act there were 25 males and seven females apprehended. This return applies only to the apprehensions on the Sunday. In the six months preceding the operation of this Act there was only one Sunday upon which there were no apprehensions for drunkenness; and during the six months to which this return relates, in which that Act was in operation, there were 16 Sundays in which there were no apprehensions; and during the last 18 weeks there were no apprehensions of females for drunkenness at all.

4517. Then you believe that Mr. Wilson Patten's Act had a very beneficial effect, both socially and morally?—A very beneficial effect; and at that time I was in the habit of visiting a respectable licensed victualler, who himself said that it not only was beneficial to the town, but was generally acceptable to the trade.

4518. Was there any riot, or public disorder, or resistance to the law, in Sheffield, when that Act came into operation?—I never heard of any.

4519. You do not believe that any could have existed without your knowing of it, do you?—I believe not.

4520. Are you capable of speaking as to the general feeling of Sheffield, and of the authorities there, in reference to Sunday drinking?—Yes.

4521. Has there been any movement of the town council, or anything of that kind?—There was a movement of the town council in the year 1852, when a committee was appointed by the town council to inquire into the apparent excess of drunkenness in the borough of Sheffield, and to consider the best means for ensuring its decrease; and the report of this committee was received and adopted by the town council at the monthly meeting on January the 12th, 1853.

4522. Then as far back as 1853, there was an opinion in the town council, in favour of the restriction of drinking on the Sunday?—Yes.

4523. Do you believe that that feeling has gone on?—I believe that it still continues.

4524. Has there been any other evidence of the feeling in Sheffield since that time?—There was a public canvass instituted in the year 1863, in favour of the total closing of public-houses; and this, which I hold in my hand, was the form of the schedule then issued to the houses, which were canvassed from house to house.

4525. Is it distinctly put to the householders of Sheffield to give an answer in the affirmative or negative, with reference to Sunday closing?—Yes. "If you wish public-houses and beer-houses to be closed the whole of Sunday, write Yes. If you wish them to be open as now, write No."

4526. Now, will you state the result of that canvass, if you have it?—In favour of Mr. Somes' Bill, 13,152 householders; against the Bill, 6,031. For closing, except for two hours, 613; neutral, 2,256. The total return 22,052.

4527. Do you know at all how many householders there are in Sheffield?—I cannot say. The population has increased immensely since then.

4528. Can you state to the Committee what it is now?—About 230,000. I think, that it was less at that time.

4529. There has been a great increase since then?—A very great increase, and it is still increasing.

4530. Do you believe that that is a fair expression, or was it at that time a fair expression of the mind of the working men of Sheffield?—Yes, I do think so.

4531. Do you know the provisions of the Bill referred to this Committee?—I do.

4532. Are you in favour of it?—Decidedly.

4533. Do you believe that the working men of Sheffield would be in favour of it?—Most decidedly.

4534. Have you any reason to give for that opinion?—I have.

4535. Will you state what reason you have?—It was thought by many, that opinions were attributed to the working classes which they did not hold, and that gentlemen who were not acquainted so well with the opinions of the working classes, supposed that they entertained opinions which they really did not hold. It was therefore deemed desirable that a canvass should be made of the working men of Sheffield, in order that they might themselves state their own opinions. There was a meeting held, and it was resolved that a canvass should be made of a large number of the workshops, such workshops as might be deemed really representative; accordingly, in every instance where any works were selected, a circular was sent out to the proprietor of the works, asking permission to canvass such works, with a view to laying the evidence so obtained before this Committee. The following circular was issued: "Sir,—The question of the Sunday closing of public-houses having been referred to a Select Committee of the House of Commons, it has become a national one, and reliable statistics are greatly needed. Our committee have therefore undertaken the canvass of such workshops of Sheffield as may justly be deemed to represent the respective trades of the town, in order to obtain the impartial opinions of the working men thereupon. Will you kindly grant us permission to prosecute this canvass in your works; Mr. Milne, or Mr. Hubbard, our agents, will visit the works to make arrangements for the canvass." Those agents did visit the various works, but they did not prosecute the canvass themselves: the canvass was left to be carried on by the employers, or in such manner as should be decided; and I am bound to say, that in only a very few instances did they, at the request of the employers, prosecute the canvass; and in the two or three cases in which they did so, the working men voted against them; for the Sheffield working men are remarkable both for their intelligence and also for their independence. In only one instance did the employers refuse, and in that one instance, we did not make the canvass.

4536. Have you got the results of that canvass?—I have the results here. This is the simple form in which it was sent:—"Sunday Closing of Public Houses. Sir,—This question is now referred to a Select Committee of the House of Commons. Will you kindly state your opinion on the matter by filling up this form. If you wish public-houses and beer-houses to be closed the whole of Sunday, write Yes. If you wish them to be open as now, write No. If you do not care how it is, write Neutral." Not a single word was used implying a bias, and no attempt was made to bias them. We issued only this one handbill to the working men themselves: "Working men of Sheffield! You are called upon to express your opinions respecting the Sunday closing of public-houses. The committee prosecuting the canvass ask your co-operation in order to obtain the impartial suffrage of the working men of this town." No printer's name was put to the bill, nor was the name of any one connected with the movement put to the bill. This was the return:—There were 130 workshops canvassed, representing all the principal trades of the town, those that are local and also the general trades of the country, painters, builders, gasfitters, contractors; in fact, every kind of trade carried on in the country. The totals from the total Sunday closing were—Yes, 4,769; no, 3,369; neutrals, 769. Those returns, when completed, were publicly advertised in the "Sheffield Independent" and in the "Sheffield Telegraph." I here put in the advertisement (handing in the same).

4537. That subject was also discussed in the newspapers, was it not?—Yes; it was also discussed in the newspapers, and very general attention was drawn to it. The editor of the "Independent" applied to me personally to obtain a list of the workshops and of the votes for, against, and neutral, which he inserted of his own accord. Those returns have been unchallenged to this hour.

4538. And you believe them to have been an honest and accurate expression of the opinion of the men working in those shops?—I do. The reason for selecting those works was that it was thought that if we took any given number of works, spreading it over a sufficiently wide surface, we should represent the whole town.

4539. Mr. Horsfall.] Especially the working classes?—This was a canvass exclusively of working men.

4540. Did the return state generally that the workshops were unanimous, or was there a majority and a minority in each workshop?—They varied exceedingly. In some workshops there was a large majority, saying yes, for total closing, and in some there was a large majority adverse to total closing.

4541. But, generally, the feeling of each individual workshop was, necessarily, one way or the other?—Generally. They varied very much; but still, we could trace, more or less, that there was a predominating influence.

4542. You stated just now that independence was a characteristic of the Sheffield workmen; that that would rather look as if they ran together, would it not?—Yes; but they influence each other.

4543. You mean not individual independence, but class independence?—A sort of class independence. In a very few instances did the agents canvass, and then only at the request of the employers themselves.

4544. Mr. Locke.] What agents do you speak of?—The two agents who were employed by this association, which instituted the canvass.

4545. Mr. John Abel Smith.] Do you believe that to be a fair picture of the feeling of the town?—I believe that it is a very accurate picture of the feeling of the working men of Sheffield, and so much so, that the editor of the "Sheffield Independent," five days after, called attention to the fact that those returns had been unchallenged, and that neither publicly nor privately had there been any exception taken to them.

4546. He had previously written an article against the canvass, had he not?—Not against the canvass, but he wished the canvass to be instituted with very great care.

4547. And he approved of the manner in which it had been done?—Yes, thoroughly.

4548. For the purpose of putting your views and statements on paper in the shortest form, just go back for a moment to this: I understood you to say that in 1853 there was a report from the town council in favour of Sunday temperance?—Yes, there was.

4549. And that in the year 1863 there was a canvass of the town on behalf of Mr. Somes' Bill?—Yes.

4550. With an indication of strong feeling in favour of that Bill?—Yes.

4551. And that in the year 1868 there was a canvass of 130 workshops, giving a very large number of persons in favour of Sunday closing?—Yes.

4552. And there was also a marked effect produced by Mr. Wilson Patten's Act in 1854?—Yes.

4553. It is almost unnecessary to ask you, but I presume that if the Bill which has been referred to this Committee were to pass into a law, you would not, in that state of things, apprehend disturbance or resistance to the law in Sheffield?—Certainly I should not. I believe that the predominant feeling in the town amongst professional men, manufacturers, and working men is in favour of restriction; and in further proof of that, I will read a letter addressed to me by the Rev. Canon Walshaw, of the Catholic Church, in reply to a circular which I sent to him wishing his attendance at the public meeting:—"Dear Sir,—I exceedingly regret that imperative duties this morning forbid my attendance at the meeting, the object of which has my warmest approbation. I most cordially concur in the belief that the restriction of the sale of intoxicating liquors on the Sunday will very much reduce the profanation of that day, and whatever may be done at the meeting with this object has my entire sympathy and support.—I am yours most sincerely, S. Walshaw."

4554. What meeting was that?—A public meeting called in the council hall in support of this Bill, on the 7th of December last.

4555. Who called the meeting?—The secretaries of this association.

4556. How many people attended it?—I 0.69.

should say about 100; but I should be speaking by guess at this distance of time.

4557. Was it a meeting of masters or what?—A general meeting.

4558. Was it only attended by 100 people?—It was called at noon, and that is a very busy time.

4559. Was it a committee meeting or a general meeting?—A general meeting, to carry out measures in support of this Bill.

4560. Mr. Locke.] How was it advertised?—In the first instance it was advertised, and there was also a circular issued.

4561. Mr. John Abel Smith.] Have you a copy of that report of the town council in 1853?—Yes, I have.

4562. Will you put it in?—Yes (delivering in the same).

4563. Before you went to Sheffield, you lived in Guernsey, did you not?—I did.

4564. Have you any opinion to express as to the state of public feeling on this question in Guernsey?—At that time the Sunday closing was then, as I suppose it is now, the law, and I never heard a single word adverse to Sunday closing from any person.

4565. You mean as to Sunday closing up to 1 o'clock?—No, it is there for the day, I believe; I understand so; but that I could not speak positively of now; it was so when I was there.

4566. You should consider it quite proved by the course of public events in Sheffield, that there is not any very strong general feeling in favour of resistance to a further amount of restriction?—I think not to a further amount of restriction; I think there would be to total closing, but not to further restriction. Since this canvass was completed, I have been spoken to indiscriminately by a large number of persons, both professional men, working men, and manufacturers, and their testimony has been uniform in favour of restriction. In this list of workshops, which I have put in, there is one return where they gave 21 "no;" that is adverse to total closing; one "yes," for total closing, and two "neutral;" and there we should have had 24 for restriction, where we had 21 against total closing. To simplify the question, we put it before the working men on the one issue of total closing alone. I do not think that the country, at least speaking from my knowledge of Sheffield, is yet prepared for total closing, though I hope the day will come when it will be so.

4567. What you mean to imply by that is, as I understand you, that the numbers given in the canvass, in reference to total closing, give no accurate idea of what the feelings of those people would be as to partial closing?—That is so.

4568. And that there would have been a much larger number in favour of partial closing than there is shown to be in favour of total closing?—Yes, that is the predominant feeling, I believe, in the town.

4569. Has there been any communication from the town to your member, Mr. Roebuck, upon the subject as to the present canvass, or to the past ones?—I believe there was a communication in reference to the canvass of 1863.

4570. That was communicated to him, was it?—Yes, I understand so.

4571. Has he ever expressed any doubt as to its fulness and accuracy?—I have not heard of any such expression.

4572. Have you had any petitions from Sheffield?—Yes, we have.

4573. Will you state what they have been?—As to petitions in favour, we have not recently had any very active petitioning on the subject, I believe, that is to say, in favour of total closing, or even of restriction.

4574. Has there not been a very large petition against the Bill now referred to this Committee?—Yes, there has been, I believe, a large petition.

4575. How do you account for that?—I would rather not express an opinion on that petition. I should be obliged to speak somewhat adversely to it, but I could not speak on sufficiently reliable data to give a decisive opinion.

4576. Are you able to go as far as this, that you would not take it yourself as indicating the feeling of the town?—Most certainly.

4577. Can you state the number who signed that petition?—I think it is about 23,000. This is my view, that a petition which is largely signed in the streets, by passers-by, is not very much to be depended upon in legislation. I saw this petition being signed in the streets, and I should not myself look upon it as anything very reliable.

4578. Dr. Sale, the vicar of Sheffield, whose name is universally known and respected, has given you, has he not, very active and willing aid in favour of the principle of further restriction?—Dr. Sale is our president, and has acted throughout most energetically and uniformly. This association is not a teetotal association. A large number of those who are active upon it, are not abstainers at all.

4579. I suppose that during the 16 years that you have been at Sheffield, Sheffield has been, like all other places in England, improving in the habits and tendencies of the working class?—I think so.

4580. And do you think that the people are more temperate than they were?—Yes, I think they are.

4581. And that the feeling in favour of restrictive laws, with reference to Sunday, has increased during that time?—I think so.

4582. Is there a very extensive practice and habit of Sunday excursions at Sheffield?—There is one peculiarity in Sheffield as to excursions, and that is the extent of pedestrianism. There are three classes; those who go by train now, and Sheffield is not remarkable for the number of excursion trains; there are those who go by conveyances to the neighbouring villages, and they may generally be assumed to be persons who have those beverages at home when they return; but there is a large number of persons, working men, who go out on Sunday morning after breakfast, and return to dinner; and if a stranger were to go to some of our principal thoroughfares leading out of the town, he would be struck at the immense number whom he would see returning perfectly sober for dinner. Those persons generally spend their Sunday afternoons at home, for that we find to be one of the best times for visiting, to find the man at home, to speak to him on religious questions, so that the alteration of the law in favour of further restriction would not act more against him than the existing law.

4583. You have got a very fine park at Sheffield, have you not?—Yes.

4584. Is that largely frequented by the working classes?—Not on the Sunday; they go to some distance on to the moors and to the woods, botanising and so on.

4585. You do not think that there is anything in this Bill to interfere with the real practical comfort and habit of the working men in Sheffield?—I think it might slightly inconvenience some, but I have always understood from the legislation of the country, that mere personal inconvenience was no objection in the removal of a great public evil.

4586. Do you believe that restriction has acted hitherto in the diminution of drunkenness?—I think so, and especially in Sheffield, where the working men are not restricted as they are in the textile districts, compelling them to be in the place of work on the Monday morning. A Sheffield artisan can go to work on Monday or Tuesday, or Wednesday, or Thursday as he pleases, and there can be nothing serious said against him.

4587. Have you at all thought over the effect of high wages upon drinking?—Yes, I have thought of it. I do not think that high wages cause drinking. I think they quite as much cause economy and investment on the part of working men.

4588. Is there a good deal of saving amongst the working men in Sheffield?—There is a large number who secure shares for themselves in various undertakings, and it is rather a commendable feature amongst them.

4589. It is very remarkable, is it not?—It is something remarkable; but I think, on the whole, that high wages operate quite as much in favour of economising as they would do in favour of expending money on those beverages.

4590. Some of the men get very considerable wages, do they not?—They do get very large wages.

4591. I will ask you to put in those papers which you have referred to?—I will do so (handing in the same); I will put in also two or three of the forms that were filled up, and I put in one for this reason: to show why some voted against total closing. It says, "Yes, if you close the clubs—not without." This we returned as "No;" but we found that it was regarded by some as class legislation, and, being so regarded, many voted against it.

4592. Mr. Locke.] Were those remarks numerous?—Not very numerous, and they varied sometimes; and I put that in expressly to show why the minority was so large as 3,369.

4593. On account of the clubs?—On account of its being thought to be something like class legislation.

4594. As to the persons who stated, "Yes, if you close the clubs—not without," how many do you suppose wrote that?—I could not say positively.

4595. Were they numerous?—Tolerably numerous, but we found it run in one works; this is from one works, and we had a similar remark from another works in a way that showed that the working men had influenced one another.

4596. They thought that everybody ought to be subjected to the same regulations, or else it was not fair; that was their view?—That seemed to be their view.

4597. Mr. Horsfall.] You stated, did you not, that the number of persons who were in favour of entire closing was 4,769?—Yes.

4598. That would give a majority of 1,400 over

Rev.
J. Flatier.

1868.

over those who were opposed, and those who were neutral?—Yes.

4599. You stated further that you thought there would be an opposition to the total closing of public-houses on Sunday?—Yes, I think so.

4600. But not to further restriction?—No, not to further restriction.

4601. To what extent do you think the people would be disposed to assent to further restriction?—I can merely, upon this point, state opinions.

4602. I ask you your own opinion?—My own opinion is, that we could fairly calculate on three-fourths in favour of further restriction; but that is just an opinion. A gentleman who was himself opposed to the total closing, told me that he thought that we could fairly calculate on nine out of ten.

4603. And you think that the number of workshops which you canvassed would be a fair average of the opinions of the working men of Sheffield?—On that I think there would be no question. We took all the leading works in all the departments, and in one instance we took one of the largest works in the town (it is not a local trade), where we did not expect to get a single vote in favour of total closing, but we deemed it an act of justice to let the working men give their opinion, and they returned 74 against total closing, and 5 for it. I believe that in the result of this canvass the Committee would have a fair representation of the opinions of the working men in the town, and up to this moment the returns are unchallenged.

4604. Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen.] With regard to the number of apprehensions on the Sunday for drunkenness, I did not quite understand you whether the apprehensions were upon the Sunday, or after 12 o'clock on Saturday night?—Apprehensions on the Sunday.

4605. Have you any power to distinguish apprehensions which might have occurred after 12 o'clock on Saturday night?—No; there is nothing to distinguish. It is a report from the late chief constable, Mr. Raynor, and there is nothing to distinguish. It is stated as the numbers on the Sunday, and I believe it means simply during the Sunday itself.

4606. But you stated to us that the hours were between 12 on Saturday night and 12 on Sunday night; therefore, in the absence of any proof to the contrary, it would seem that any apprehensions on the Saturday night of the persons turned out at 12 o'clock, would come in that return?—That I could not say; it is a return made by the late chief constable himself.

4607. What is the population of Sheffield?—I take it to be about 230,000.

4608. There are a large number of licensed victuallers, I suppose, in Sheffield?—Yes; a large number.

4609. And one of those has expressed an opinion in favour of further restriction?—He expressed himself to me in favour of the Act of 1854.

4610. Do you think that he represented a class of licensed victuallers?—I think he represented a large number of respectable licensed victuallers.

4611. Has he acted upon his opinion, and closed his house on Sunday?—No; he only closed during the prohibited hours.

4612. With regard to this canvass, you asked the permission of the masters of the workshops to canvass; did you meet with any refusal?—Only one refusal; generally speaking, there was a prompt concurrence. I received a letter from the celebrated firm of John Brown & Company, armour-plate manufacturers, that they would give us full permission.

4613. Had you some of the masters very earnest in your favour?—The masters generally declined to express any opinion either way, for this reason: they said "If we influence our men, they perhaps will want a favour at another time."

4614. Were there any remarks attached to the answers which came in "yes"?—Yes; but they were generally simply to intensify the "yes;" the opinions of the masters had nothing to do I believe with the return. I could point to more than one case in that return, where the masters were decidedly in our favour, and the men voted against us.

4615. With regard to that printed bill to the workmen at Sheffield, what is the reason you put no printer's name to it?—That no influence should be used in any way.

4616. It was not from any fear of the consequences to the printer, was it?—No; not the slightest.

4617. I want to know about this public meeting. You began by calling it a public meeting, and then you call it a general meeting, and you had 100 people present, you say; that was not a great proportion out of a population of 230,000?—No, it was not convened in any demonstrative form, it was convened as a working meeting; but that meeting was distinct from this meeting, in which the present canvass issued.

4618. Was it not a public meeting, then?—Yes, it was a public meeting.

4619. If it was a public meeting, any number might have been present?—Yes.

4620. But still you only got 100?—No.

4621. I ask you if the number of persons in Sheffield who took such a vivid interest in your side of the question as to attend that meeting was 100?—I suppose it would be about 100. It was a working meeting for concerting measures, and not for discussion.

4622. It was held at noon, was it not?—Yes.

4623. And noon is the hour at which the majority of the working classes in Sheffield go to dinner, is it not?—Yes, they certainly go to dinner at that hour; but it was not convened or intended, in fact, to awaken public attention in the form of a demonstration.

4624. It was a public meeting, but not intended to be attended by the public, was that it?—No, that was not it; it was not intended to be one of those exciting meetings which attract large numbers.

4625. How was it convened?—It was convened specially, by circular.

4626. By circulars sent to a certain number of individuals upon whom you could rely for the orderly support of your views?—Not for the orderly support of our views, but for active measures for conducting the canvass; that had to go into the workshops themselves.

4627. You told us that public opinion in Sheffield, you thought, was not against further restriction, but against total closing; do you think it is possible that some people who are in favour of total closing, might still be against partial closing, because they might think that an irritation would be produced by the one, without obtaining the full remedy for Sunday drunkenness which they think would result from the other?—I think there are some who are opposed to total closing, who would be opposed also to partial closing. If we had perfect unanimity, our way would be perfectly clear.

4628. But my question was, do you think there are some who are in favour of total closing, who would still be against partial closing, and would rather leave the law as it is until public opinion should be sufficiently indicated to obtain all they wanted?—Undoubtedly there are such, but I am not of that number, nor is the committee of our association generally of that opinion.

4629. A large number of the committee are not abstainers at all, you say?—A number of them are not abstainers.

4630. Still they are kind enough to wish that others should be?—They are kind enough to wish that other people should be kept from the public-houses on the Sunday evening. There is a great evil in Sheffield arising from the amount of psalm singing in the public-houses. I have passed many of those public-houses in which psalms and hymns have been sung, and time has been kept; and if you were simply outside, you might suppose that it was a place of worship, and that we find to be a most pernicious evil to our youths, and to persons whose principles are unsettled; and on that account, we wish to have those places closed, except for those who want to have those beverages for refreshment on the Sunday.

4631. And who would not sing psalms if they went there?—We think it is a desecration.

4632. You do not object to psalm singing in itself, but you object to its being carried on in public-houses?—Yes, being carried on in public-houses on a Sunday evening with the express intent of alluring those who otherwise would not go.

4633. Are not the doctrines inculcated in the psalms that would be sung, good doctrines, such as would rather lead the youth of Sheffield into good courses?—Undoubtedly; but that is not the place to inculcate the doctrines, and it is not with the view of inculcating doctrines, that they are sung, but with the view of inducing people to buy liquor, and get into the habit of drinking.

4634. That is to say, when they are hoarse with singing psalms, they would want to whet their whistle?—Yes.

4635. Mr. Evans.] Do you mean to say that you think this psalm singing is carried on for the purpose of inducing people to come there, or is it intended as a sort of insult to religion generally?—I do not think that it is intended as an insult to religion; but that it is intended as an inducement to bring persons there who otherwise would not go.

4636. Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen.] You would not have them attracted to the public-house by any influence, good or bad?—Certainly not; I would have a public-house, on Sunday especially, kept as a place of refreshment.

4637. Mr. Evans.] Does your experience tend to show that during the last 16 years, drunkenness has increased or diminished in Sheffield?—My own impression is, that it has diminished, and I think that the habits of the people, generally, are improving.

4638. Are there any considerable number of persons in Sheffield, who are in the habit of taking their meals, or any of their meals, at public-houses on week days or Sundays?—There is not a large number who take them on the Sundays. On the week-days, when they go to the public-houses, they go to get rest, and I suppose a little beer during dinner, but it is not general there for the people to take their meals at the public-houses.

4639. Are there many persons who live in lodgings in Sheffield?—Yes.

4640. Do those persons who live in lodgings generally speaking get their meals at their lodgings, or do they go elsewhere for them?—They very generally get them at their lodgings.

4641. Do the lodging-house keepers undertake to prepare their meals as well as finding the lodging?—Yes, as a general rule they do.

4642. I think I understood you to say that the greater part of the working people who went out on excursions from Sheffield on Sunday went out in the morning?—A very considerable part of them; it is my impression that it would be the greater part of the working men, for Sheffield is not remarkable for excursions by train.

4643. I understood you to say that they generally speaking go out on foot, and that those who go out on foot usually go out in the morning and come back to dinner?—A large number; so much so that with our various agents who visit for religious purposes they find the Sunday afternoon a good time for visiting those men, as they meet with the men themselves at home.

4644. Mr. John Abel Smith.] Do they not go by train a good deal to Worksop?—Worksop is one place to which there is a train, and there is another train to Grimsby, and I think there is a third also to Wharnccliffe, but those trains go only from one station; there are no trains running from the Midland Station.

4645. Mr. Yorke.] You say you have a very large number of people who live in lodgings in Sheffield; I suppose there are a good many of them young men who have only a bedroom or share of a bedroom?—Yes.

4646. How would you suppose those young men would pass their Sunday evenings if they had no opportunity of going to a public-house in winter; for instance, in bad weather, when they could not take a walk?—We hope they would go to a place of worship.

4647. Supposing they went, we will say in the morning and in the afternoon, there would still remain the evening; would you propose that they should go to a place of worship again in the evening; for instance, on a winter evening, take a young man who has a share of a bedroom, if the public-houses were closed on Sunday evening, how would he spend his Sunday evening?—He would spend it as he spends many other evenings, in the house where he lodges, or with some of his companions.

4648. But supposing, as I understand, there are many who have only a bedroom, or a share of a bedroom, in the house where they lodge, would you propose that he should pass his evening in that portion of the bedroom which belongs to him?—A place in the house is always included in his renting a bedroom.

4649. Do you mean that he has accommodation in the parlour of the house in which he lodges?—In the parlour, or in the house, whatever it be; he has a part of that which is considered sidered part of his lodgings; he is not confined to his bedroom.

4650. Is that universally the case?—Yes, universally the case in Sheffield.

4651. Mr. John Abel Smith.] When I asked you the question about Guernsey, I did not know that the public-houses were closed altogether on Sunday; but I understood you to say, that in Guernsey you never heard any complaint of the then existing law?—Not the slightest. I never heard any complaint, except now and then from an Englishman, who came over and stayed at his hotel, where he could get his wine, but he chose to have an English grumble about a habit which he did not understand.

4652. Chairman.] Are you aware that the chief constable of Sheffield has expressed an opposite opinion to yours upon the feeling of Sheffield in the matter?—He has expressed this opinion, I believe, that the opinions of the town are extremely divided, and that is shown by the return; but I may also state that the chief constable would feel, perhaps, much better qualified to enter into the question of the apprehensions than he would upon this particular point as to the opinion of the town. I do not think I should be going wrong to say that the chief constable himself called at my house and conversed with me on this very point, wishing to know the result of the present canvass; but the canvass was not then complete. I suppose he believed that I could give as much information on this point as any one, I having such a wide connection in the town with all classes.

4653. The particular opinion to which I wished to direct your attention was when he said that he did not think that the restrictions proposed by this Bill would be cheerfully submitted to in Sheffield?—I saw that he had expressed such an opinion; but my own opinion is, that in most instances it would be cheerfully accepted; in some instances it would be acquiesced in, and in a few it would be grumbled against, but it would be submitted to.

CHRISTOPHER BUSHELL, Esq., called in; and Examined,

4654. Mr. John Abel Smith.] You are a Magistrate of Cheshire of some standing, are you not?—Yes.

4655. Do you live in Cheshire?—Yes; in the large and populous parish of Neston, 10 miles from Birkenhead.

4656. You know, do you not, a good deal about the feeling in that part of the country, both with regard to Birkenhead and Chester?—I would rather express an opinion of my own neighbourhood. I think that the evidence which I chiefly have to give is in relation to the feeling of publicans and beer-shop keepers themselves as to their desire that their houses should be closed on Sunday.

4657. Do you believe that the existing state of things acts injuriously to the social and moral good of the people in the district?—Unmistakeably so. In fact, I myself have wondered how a law so inconsistent with other laws for the promotion of religion and morality could have existed so long, being persuaded that the permission that public-houses and beer-shops should be open on Sunday is greatly detrimental to the progress of religion and morality.

4658. Do you recollect the working of Mr. Wilson Patten's Act?—No; I have only been a resident in that parish about 11 or 12 years, and I prefer to speak rather of the present than of the past.

4659. Do you believe that the feeling of the respectable working men in that part of England is in favour of increased restriction?—I am persuaded that the feeling of all the wives, at all events, is very largely in that direction; I have not so much questioned the working men, because I have felt that there would be some inconsistency in putting that question to them. A working man who is disposed to be temperate need not enter a public-house at all on Sunday, and a drunkard is scarcely likely to confess that he wished to have his vice suddenly stopped; therefore I have not thought it wise to put a question which was not likely to lead to a very truthful answer.

4660. Do you take a close and active interest in the discharge of your magisterial duties?—I do, and know the district as well personally as most men know it.

4661. Do you believe that the beer-house keepers and the public-house keepers would be in favour of restriction if it was general?—I can answer that question by a document which I happen to have in my possession, which arose in this way. Of course the discussion of Mr. John Abel Smith's Bill has been general throughout the country, and no doubt this measure has been discussed in the beer-shops and public-houses, and the publicans in my neighbourhood have heard that in Liverpool an immense number of public-houses have been voluntarily closed upon the Sunday. A poor man, a shoemaker, who has always been distinguished for being useful in the parish, came to me and said, "There is a strong and very general feeling that the provisions of Mr. Abel Smith's Bill should be adopted; and if I could only get a paper drawn up embodying the principles of that Bill and the details of it, I am sure that all the publicans and the beer-shop keepers would sign it;" and he asked me whether I would draw up such a document; I hesitated a little, but I thought to myself that there would be no harm in trying the experiment, and I said, "Very well, I will draw up a document which shall embody the principles of Mr. Abel Smith's Bill, and you may do with it as you like, and we will see what the effect is." I hold that document in my hand, and perhaps the Committee would like that I should read it, as it is very short. "We, the undersigned publicans and beer-shop keepers of the parish of Neston, being convinced that great advantage would result to ourselves, our families, and the whole community, by greatly diminishing the number of hours during which our houses are now kept open for business on the Sabbath day, hereby jointly and severally agree that, hereafter, we will close our houses during the whole of Sunday, excepting only between the hours of half-past twelve o'clock and half-past two o'clock in the afternoon, and between the hours of eight o'clock and ten o'clock in the evening, it being agreed that even between these hours, at which our houses will be opened for the convenience of the neighbourhood, we will not permit anything sold by us during these hours of the Sabbath to be drunk upon our premises." That was signed by some 14 publicans and beer-shops shops keepers; and I believe only one publican and one beer-shop keeper refused to sign it. I may say that I used no influence at all in the matter myself. The document was afterwards brought to me, and of course the Committee will see that I naturally watched very carefully what was the effect of this arrangement. I may tell the Committee that this was only signed on the 11th of April, and it has almost altogether broken down. In the beginning all kept it, and then one by one broke it. For instance, there were two publicans—I do not want to be personal to any of them, as my evidence, perhaps, may appear in public—but there were two publicans who lived next door to each other, one of them was the first to infringe this regulation, and the man who lived next door was very sorely tried, and he said, “What am I to do?” He nevertheless persevered for a short time, but then his customers brought this threat to bear upon him—they said, “Very well, if you will not let us drink in your house on Sunday, we will not drink at your house on Monday.” And I found that this argument had been brought to bear upon the publicans throughout the whole district, and the consequence has been that the whole thing has broken down. Not having interfered previously, I then went and personally called upon those publicans, and I said, “I am sorry that you voluntarily signed a document by which you bound yourselves jointly and severally to close your houses for a portion of the Sabbath day, and to permit no drinking on the premises at all, but you have not kept your engagement.” And then they explained, one and all, that it was impossible for any one to do so. One or two of them said to me, “We are poor people; we have our licences to pay for, and we have all expenses just the same as our neighbours, and we cannot possibly make ourselves exceptional; because we would not mind what we lose on Sunday, that would be bad enough, but still we should lose our business on Monday and during the week.” So I tell the Committee that the thing has fairly broken down; but the publicans say, one and all, it would be to them the greatest possible benefit and happiness, if, by legislation, these provisions could be made compulsory.

4662. Do you know anything of Birkenhead?—I attend very irregularly the bench at Birkenhead; it is a long way from me, and I would rather not speak of Birkenhead, because I could not do it with sufficient authority.

4663. Have you any apprehension, as a magistrate, that, if such a Bill as that which has been referred to this Committee were carried into law, there would be any disturbance?—Not the slightest. I believe that the people generally would regard it as the greatest possible privilege and blessing.

4664. Do you feel confident that you are speaking the general feeling of the bench of magistrates in petty sessions?—Yes, I am sure that I speak the feelings of the bench of magistrates.

4665. Have you no statistics with you with regard to the amount of drinking on Sunday?—No, I have no statistics, but I have a general knowledge of the drinking on Sunday, which, especially in the summer months, it is very great. In fact, the vicar of the parish told me, within the last two or three days, that in his opinion the drinking on Sunday evening is greater perhaps, or as great, as the drinking of all the week put together.

4666. Is not Saturday night very bad?—Saturday night is also very bad. I myself regret that early closing on Saturday night was not a part of the provisions of this Bill. I think that if the Saturday night closing were earlier it would be a great advantage.

4667. Do you think that the drinking would be less?—I am sure it would. I do not see why they should not close at 10 on Saturday night. You asked me whether I thought there was any ill-effect produced by the existing state of the law. Perhaps I may be permitted to tell the Committee why I think that there is great evil. I look at it from two points of view. First as regards the publicans themselves; I am persuaded there is great moral declension on their part arising from this Sunday trading. I am persuaded that they feel it too. I do not say that none of them attend places of worship; I should be very sorry to say so; but, at all events, they are not known to be regular attendants upon places of worship; and I think the reason is obvious, because these people feel there is inconsistency while violating a Divine law on the Sunday in attending a place of worship; and I believe that if they had this privilege of closing their houses, the religious and moral influences which would be brought to bear upon them, would influence their conduct during the week; and that publicans, instead of being as too many now are, promoters of drunkenness for their own interest, would check drunkenness in their houses during the week-day upon principle, and from the highest motives. I think they are not sufficiently under religious and moral influences, in consequence of the state of the law, which does not give them a day of rest.

4668. Have you watched at all the effects of that feeling upon the character of persons employed by publicans?—Yes; the declension in right feeling on the part of the publicans and their families is, I am persuaded, very great, and they feel that, and are most anxious for this day of rest. I believe that in my neighbourhood the very general feeling is that they would much prefer that their houses should be closed on the whole of the Sabbath, in order that they may have the day entirely to themselves.

4669. Do you believe that the restriction carried to the point at which it now exists, has been productive of a diminution of intemperance?—I do think it has. I think that the promoters of this Bill have been wise, in limiting it to its present provisions, because, to use a term with which we are now well acquainted, I think, first of all, the House of Commons itself, and then the people and the publicans, require to be educated in this matter. I do not think that it would be desirable to attempt an extreme law all at once; but I believe the more you go in this direction, the more the advantages will be felt, so that in the end there would be no difficulty whatever in closing public-houses and beer-houses on Sunday. Indeed, I never could see myself, why public houses should, although I can see a great many reasons why they should not be open on Sunday any more than a butcher's, or a baker's shop.

4670. Mr. Hibbert.] Do you know whether, in carrying out the present law, there is much drinking during the prohibited hours in your neighbourhood?—I am afraid there is a good deal

C. Bushell,
Esq.

1868.

deal of drinking which the police cannot grapple with.

4671. Does that take place principally in the morning, or during the time of closing in the afternoon?—A good deal of it at each time, particularly with regard to one or two houses, where there is drinking early in the morning on Sunday, and I have spoken to the police about it. Only the day before yesterday I spoke to the sergeant of police, and said, "Why cannot it be stopped; you have the power to enter the public-houses whenever you like?" He said: "The point is, the house is so situated, and they are such knowing people there, that no one can come in the direction of the house without being seen, and there is such a watch kept that we have no chance of detecting them."

4672. Do you think that if this Bill were adopted, the great difficulties that would occur would not be likely to create more drinking during the prohibited hours?—No; I think that my answer which I gave to a previous question would answer that. I rely very much upon a better feeling being induced among publicans, if ministers of religion, and district visitors, and Scripture readers, and all those who are so anxious to promote religious and moral progress, had a chance with the publicans, which the present law does not give them fairly and fully. I believe that you would have a better tone in time. I do not mean to say this Bill is to work a miracle, far from it; but that you would have a better tone of feeling amongst the publicans; and in that way you would promote very much the prevention of this great evil.

4673. You are not afraid of carrying out such a great change in the law as to cause a reaction in public feeling?—I think, myself, that any violent change in the law would be productive of evil, but I do not think that this Bill goes one step further than is judicious and wise.

4674. I gather from your evidence that you would prefer the provisions of this Bill for closing on Sunday for the sale of liquors on the premises, rather than the restriction of the present hours, allowing liquors to be consumed both on and off the premises for a shorter number of hours than at present?—I think that the prohibition of drinking upon the premises at all on Sunday is the very best feature in this Bill.

4675. In your opinion it would not be sufficient merely to close during a greater number of hours on Sunday?—No; I think that when once a man enters a public-house the temptation begins, and then I think the limitation of the hours would not at all stop the evil; but if you prevent him from drinking at all on the premises, and you give him the power to drink what he chooses to drink in his own house, you would thereby give him all that he really requires; you would not put upon him any greater restriction than is put upon ourselves and upon our own class, and you would, I think, take from him a very great temptation. I heard a question put here the other day, I think, by the Honourable Member for Sheffield, as to persons going into the country; whether it would not be a very serious thing, and a very severe restriction upon a man if he were not permitted to get his glass of beer after his walk into the country; my experience is, that the keeping open of public-houses and beer-shops on Sunday is preventive of the walk on Sunday; this is what one woman publican in my parish told me the day before yesterday. She said, "I dread the summer coming, because of the amount of drinking which always takes place on summer evenings;" and she spoke of it with a great deal of feeling; therefore, I am of opinion, that the public-houses being kept open prevents the very thing which the Honourable Member for Sheffield desires to promote, namely, the walk into the country, for the people pour into the beer-houses in the towns and villages, and they do not walk into the country with their wives and children as they otherwise might do.

4676. You referred to an agreement which had been come to in your neighbourhood by the publicans and beer-sellers; do you think that if the law were altered so as to allow a license to be taken out to sell during six days and to close entirely on Sunday, that license being at a lower rate than the seven days' license, it is likely that the publicans would take advantage of it?—No, I do not believe they would; I think that the argument which has been brought to bear in the way I mentioned before, would be brought to bear upon the publican by his customer saying, "If you do not take out this license, and allow me to drink on Sunday, I will not come and drink on Monday;" I do not think that that plan would succeed.

4677. You think that unless you compel all to act alike you would not attain the object?—That is the feeling of the publicans in my parish, as this document indicates, and I have personally ascertained from seeing them that there is no mistake about it. It may be urged here that a gentleman who is a magistrate in the neighbourhood, and who goes to the people with that influence which appertains to his position, may get any opinion that he likes, but that was not so. I do not come here to beguile the Committee, but to tell the Committee what I believe sincerely to be the truth. From my experience and knowledge, I am persuaded that these people are sincerely desirous, almost without exception, to have their houses closed, and that they are not happy and comfortable in relation to the existing state of things; that is, as far as regards the publicans. Then as regards those who drink in the public-houses, the same argument applies to them. A working man goes to the public-house on the Sunday evening to drink instead of staying at home, or walking out with his wife and children. The effect of that of course is that he has not the same influence in his home; his children hardly ever see him; and the day of all others when he ought to be to them a father, and when he ought to be in the home with them, he is separated from them; because everybody who knows anything of a rural district knows that people who are hard-worked during the whole week are very naturally disposed to lie in bed and to indulge on Sunday morning. In some parishes there is a service on the Sunday afternoon, and very often the Sunday service is in the evening; therefore, the public-house bids against the church and the Scripture reader, so to speak, on the Sunday evening. The difficulty which the district visitor has is to find the working man at home; you find the wife, but do not find the man; and you do not want the wife as much as you want the man.

4678. What class of people make use of public-houses in your neighbourhood; is it the people living in the district, or strangers who come from Liverpool?—Chiefly the people who live in the district, which is divided into two parts:

C. Bushell,
Esq.

parts: one is Neston proper, which is called a village, but it was formerly a small market town, and it has a population of about some 1,500. In connection with it is a small watering-place, called Park Gate; and, in relation to Park Gate, I should say that the people who frequent the public-houses there, are many of them people who come from a distance. With regard to Neston itself, the public-houses are frequented chiefly by the working class of the village.

4679. Do you not know what were the difficulties which arose with respect to the publicans who first broke through the agreement at the watering-place?—The difficulties arose where they ought not to have arisen, and that was in Neston, where there were no temptations of that kind.

4680. Colonel Fane.] You stated that the police have great difficulty in finding out cases of drinking going on in prohibited houses, inasmuch as they are very much watched; do you not think that if this Bill were carried out, and the public-houses were closed altogether, except for drinking off the premises, there would be an increase of that evil; that there would be a great deal of illicit drinking, and that the people would carry the liquor away to their own houses, and collect in groups, and that there would be great difficulty experienced in putting a stop to it?—I think it is quite possible that you would have drinking. Those who are determined to drink will drink, and it is quite possible that you would have drinking in private houses, which could not by any legislation be prevented; but that, at all events, would save the publican from his portion of the evil. But then, the Honourable Member will know that those who give themselves up to drinking in houses in that way are inveterate drinkers, who do it very much for the mere love of drinking. People say that the public-house is the poor man's club and place of resort, to which he goes very naturally for his society; but, while I feel all that, I say again that he has six days in the week for that indulgence. I know that the working men in my neighbourhood have far more leisure than I have; have far more their evenings to themselves; and I dare say that that applies to every Honourable Member who is here present.

4681. But as it is, the public-houses being closed during the hours of Divine service, the publicans, if they choose, can go to church?—I think I answered that before, by stating that there is an inconsistency, which a man who is violating a Divine law feels, in going to a place of worship; supposing he went to church in the afternoon, or in the morning, he knows that the moment he comes from the church where he hears it declared that the Sabbath is to be kept as a day of rest, and kept holy, he has to go and open his shop and sell beer.

4682. Beer is a necessary of life to a certain extent, is it not?—Yes; it may be a necessary of life, and so are bread and meat necessities of life; but it may be provided in a poor man's home on the Saturday as well as in a rich man's; not to the same extent, I admit, because he would not have your cellar or mine, but his cupboard may contain all he wants on Sunday, as well as yours or mine; I think there is a great deal of false sentiment put forth about working men; the rich are under many prohibitions with regard to Sunday. If we were disposed to eat hot bread on Sunday morning, the baker would not be permitted to bake it for us; or if we were disposed to go to the opera, or the theatre in the evening, we are not permitted to do so. In London, we are not permitted to get our letters on Sunday morning. There are many restrictions put upon the rich with regard to the Sabbath, which practically are not restrictions upon the poor, and I think that the law should be the same for both; at present, if what is often called favouring the poor, be to let them get drunk on Sunday, they are favoured; but I do not think that it does favour them.

4683. Mr. Locke.] You spoke of the public-house being the poor man's club, and you propose to shut it up on Sunday; do you propose to shut up the rich man's club also?—But in the country we have no clubs.

4684. In large towns like this, where there are clubs, where rich people can go and have what they please on Sunday, do you propose to shut up those clubs?—A poor man, if he saw fit, could establish his club too; they have reading-rooms and clubs for all sorts of objects.

4685. Then you have no objection to a poor man establishing his club, and doing in that club what he now does in the public-house?—I do not say that.

4686. But a rich man does in his club if he pleases, what the poor man does in the public-house?—But I observe that most rich men who have families, spend their Sundays in their own homes; we may look at a question of this kind from different points of view.

4687. Are you a member of a London club?—Yes, I am.

4688. Do you ever go there on Sundays?—It happens that I have a bed at my club, and I sleep there when I am in town.

4689. I mean do you ever go into the body of the club on Sunday?—I say that it happens that I have a bed at my club, and I live there when I am in town. I have no experience of any other club.

4690. I presume you take your meals at your club on Sundays?—Yes, it is my home on Sundays.

4691. Even if during the hours of Divine service, you wanted a glass of sherry and a biscuit, you would have it, I suppose?—I dare say I could.

4692. Then that is not one of the restrictions upon the rich man which there is not upon the poor; on the contrary, the restriction is upon the poor man, and the license is in favour of the rich?—I believe that if the poor man's best interests were considered, rather than have that inconsistency, if it be an inconsistency, which I do not say it is, it would be better to close the club altogether; at all events I would be most willing to close mine.

4693. Do you think that the bulk of the members of clubs would be in favour of that?—I am speaking merely for myself.

4694. To make things at all equal upon that point, the clubs ought to be closed as well as the public-houses; if both classes are to be put on a fair equality, both ought to be closed?—I pointed out that there are many restrictions put upon the rich in relation to Sunday.

4695. The rich man's club being open on Sunday, where he can have what he pleases, you would hardly call that one of the restrictions upon him?—No, it is not, certainly.

4696. In fact, it is a liberty which he has that the he other man has not. I want to know what other restrictions are put upon the rich man which are not put upon the poor man. When you talk about the Post Office, the poor man has letters sometimes, although he may not have so many, perhaps, as the rich man, but is there not a restriction placed upon him in the same way with regard to Sunday?—They are treated like with regard to that; but the deprivation is scarcely felt by the poor.

4697. Then that is not one of the restrictions which is upon the rich man and not upon the poor man?—I say that that is one of the things which the rich submit to, of prohibition of that which he might desire.

4698. Then they both submit?—Yes, they both submit.

4699. I should like you to point out any restriction that there is upon the rich man which is not likewise upon the poor man?—I should say that these questions seem to me to be scarcely relevant. I say there are people in London who consider it a deprivation that they cannot go to the opera on Sunday evening. I do not suppose that a poor man would indulge in that, if the opera-houses were open.

4700. The poor man might like to go to the theatre, the price at the theatres is very little in London, and he might have the same inclination to go there as the rich man has to go to the opera?—My impression is, that a law ought not to be inconsistent; and I conceive this law, which opens the public-houses on Sunday, to be adverse to the progress of religion and morality.

4701. That is not an answer to my question. I am asking about theatres, and I ask whether the same restriction is not upon the poor man with regard to places of public amusement on the Sunday precisely in the same way as it is upon the rich man, is there any difference?—Certainly it is so, the theatre is closed against him.

4702. You have stated broadly that there are many privileges that poor men have which rich men have not, and that the rich man was restrained while the poor man was not?—Excuse me; I said there were many amusements which the rich might have been disposed to indulge in, from which they were prohibited by the existing law.

4703. What do you mean by the rich man giving up privileges; is there one law for the rich and another for the poor; are not the laws which are passed intended to press equally upon all; is not that the first principle of our law; I should like to know what you mean by the rich man giving up privileges?—I decline to answer questions which are put in that spirit. I wish to state my opinion here fully and fairly; but the questions which you put to me are such as I can scarcely answer; they seem to me to answer themselves.

4704. So it seems; but it arose entirely from your saying this: that there were restrictions upon the rich man which he chose to submit to which were not upon the poor; I ask you to mention any, but you mention none?—Allow me, then, to change the form of my answer, and to say that what I intended to convey was simply that there are, also, restrictions upon the rich; and I instanced the opera and the theatre, that they could not be indulged in, because the law closed them on Sunday, although some might desire that they should be open.

4705. However, they are not open to anybody, whether rich or poor?—They are not.

4706. And therefore they are all entirely upon the same footing with regard to that; I should like you to mention any one single thing that is a privilege that the poor enjoy and the rich do not?—The rich as a rule certainly do not frequent public-houses.

4707. They might if they liked; might they not?—Yes; but they are not likely to do so.

4708. Because they have got clubs instead, which they do frequent to a very great extent on Sunday, is not that so?—Yes; but I never heard of drunkenness there on Sunday.

4709. They have not the same necessity to go to a public-house, that a poor man has; they have got good cellars at home, probably, and they would rather drink their own wine, which they select themselves, than leave it to the publican to do it for them?—I should think those members of clubs who have their families in London, indulge in the use of their clubs to a very small extent; hard-worked as many of them are, during the week, either by business or pleasure, I should think the entire rest of home on Sunday, would be largely availed of.

4710. You conceive it very hard work, do you, for a man to go into a club and sit in an easy chair; that is no violent thing to do; and are you not aware that an immense number of men do it, and take any refreshment they please?—Certainly, men may frequent their clubs on Sunday.

4711. Are you aware whether they do it to a great extent?—I reside in the country, and have very little experience of London clubs.

4712. There are no clubs, I presume, in Neston?—There are none.

4713. Are there any in the watering place, Park Gate?—None.

4714. Then that does not give you any experience?—None.

4715. You stated that the population of the one place is 1,500; what is the population of the other?—About 500. The population of the whole parish is nearly 5,000, it is a large parish.

4716. Are they scattered about?—Yes, a good deal. There are different villages scattered throughout the parish.

4717. Therefore, what would be necessary in a large town for the convenience of the people, would be very different from that which is necessary in a place consisting of 5,000 inhabitants altogether, a great portion of whom, I presume, are scattered over the country?—Yes; of course living in their own homes.

4718. There would be hardly any analogy between the two, I presume?—I only came to give evidence as to what I know of the rural districts.

4719. I think your evidence tends to this: that you think that the public-houses ought to be shut up on the Sunday, for the sake of the publicans, more than anybody else?—I think that it would be a great boon to the publicans, and a very great advantage to the public generally.

4720. But more with a view to reforming the publicans?—To give the publican that opportunity which other traders have of enjoying the rest and privileges of Sunday.

4721. I understood you to say this: that although the public-houses are closed during the hours of Divine service, you think that because at the other hours the publican supplies persons with articles which they require, he cannot very consistently go to church?—I think that most publicans see a great deal of drunkenness in their houses on Sunday; and to tolerate that, and sometimes to promote it for their interests, is not likely to be very consistent with any religious observance.

4722. Are you aware whether they do go to church or not?—I would rather not answer that question. I do not see why I should pass condemnation upon a whole class.

4723. Have you any special knowledge upon that subject, whether they do go to church, or whether they do not?—I answer in this way, that many of them have, to me, deeply regretted their inability to attend public worship.

4724. Have they given a reason why?—Because their houses are opened on Sunday.

4725. During church time?—Yes, in the evening during church time.

4726. Although they cannot go in the evening they can go in the morning and afternoon; but you say that there is no service generally in the afternoon?—In some parishes there is, but it varies very much; my impression is, that any occupation carried on upon the Sunday is at variance with the fulfilment of religious duties.

4727. In answer to a question, I think you stated that, supposing this Bill were passed, there would not be any dissatisfaction with it?—My conviction is that generally there would be none.

4728. How do you account for this, that when one of those two publicans who you say had a public-house side by side, opened his house, the other said he must open his likewise, because the people threatened him if he did not, never to buy any liquor of him on a week-day?—That their customers would go on week-days where they went on Sunday.

4729. Then they must have had a strong inclination, must they not, that the house should be open on the Sunday, or else they would not have threatened him in that manner?—I would not give such people or their opinions the slightest consideration in a matter of this kind.

4730. I am not saying you would; I am merely asking you this simple question: whether from that circumstance you would not naturally infer that a great many of those people would be extremely dissatisfied if this Bill were passed?—I think men who habitually frequent the public-house on Sunday would be dissatisfied if they found the house closed against them.

4731. Do you suppose that the only persons who say this are persons who habitually frequent the public-house on Sunday; do you know who those people were who said that to the publican?—I do not know who they were; but I am persuaded that a man who habitually frequents a public-house on Sunday is almost always what we call a drinker, and a man who abstains from a public-house is not. The public-houses are supported on Sunday by drinkers, as we understand that term, not by men who go in and drink a glass of beer occasionally.

4732. If they were only supported by habitual drinkers, they would come badly off, would they not?—I am afraid it is the habitual drinkers who are the great profit to the publican.

4733. There are others, likewise, who are not habitual drinkers, but who still want drink, are there not?—They have the power of conveying it to their own homes on Saturday, without the slightest difficulty.

4734. But they would not have the power of conveying draught beer to their homes on Saturday?—But they may take it in bottle, and that is no great hardship one day in the week. Some people prefer to drink bottled beer.

4735. Supposing they do not prefer it?—If the legislation of this country is to be governed by the liking of a man, or his preference between bottled and draught beer, and all moral and religious considerations are to be set at nought for his sake, I have nothing to say. I should decline so to legislate if I were a legislator.

4736. Would it not be very much better if you did decline to legislate; things are going on, as you have stated, very well now, and many people would think that it would be very much better if you did not attempt to legislate, because it is likely that you would legislate wrong?—I have no doubt that you, Sir, are as sincere in your view of this question as I am. I give you full credit for that, and I trust you do the same in my case. I have come here to promote no unworthy object or purpose; but perhaps you will permit me to state that, from my point of view, there are higher interests involved than those which belong to the mere temporal consideration of this matter.

4737. But you see it is a question with the people in this way: whether you are by Act of Parliament, to force persons into a certain line of conduct, or whether you are to leave it to their reason, their common sense, and their moral feeling?—I accept that proposition; and answer it by saying I have no faith whatever in legislation alone; but I say that the law ought not to be as at present, antagonistic to religious and moral progress. I think the Government standing in loco parentis, has no right to impede those efforts which are now, happily, so generally made for teaching the people in religion and morals.

4738. Does the law force anybody to drink?—No, but it offers temptations.

4739. But the law does not offer temptations to drinking?—The existing law offers strong temptations.

4740. How does the existing law offer strong temptations?—By throwing open public-houses on Sunday when every other place of business in the country is closed.

4741. But it does not throw them open?—It permits.

4742. That is another thing; the law permits a great many things where a person exercises his own judgment, so long as he does not hurt other people?—I entirely agree with you, that people cannot be made religious or moral by Act of Parliament; but I say that the law should be such as will permit of the full play and operation of those laws which tend to the religious, moral, and social improvement of the people.

4743. But where the law leaves everything open to a person, it does not force him to do anything that is wrong; it is his own concern?—But does it not strike the Honourable Member as a very strange anomaly, that that privilege should be conceded to only one class of persons, and that a class who deal in articles, the abuse of which is surrounded by so much danger?

4744. But you assume a state of facts which does not exist; are not tobacconists' shops open on Sunday, and are not pastrycooks open on Sunday, and all places open on Sunday by law, under under the statute of Charles the Second, for the purpose of selling necessary things; is not that the law now?—I should hope if this law should come into operation, other laws would prohibit all needless Sunday trading, and set people free to avail themselves of those privileges which belong to their highest interests.

4745. You would restrain people by that means, and would call it setting them free?—I see no hardship in making a man buy his tobacco on Saturday instead of Sunday.

4746. But you said that public-houses were the only places that were open, is that correct?—In the country, so far as I know, tobaccoists' shops are not open on Sunday.

4747. But in London they are?—I am come here to give evidence in relation to a rural district, and we have no tobaccoists' shops open on Sunday.

4748. Have you any pastry-cooks there?—I am not aware of any open on Sunday.

4749. Not for all those 5,000 people?—I am not aware of any.

4750. Mr. Horsfall.] The Honourable Member has asked you with reference to clubs; there is this distinction is there not, that the clubs are open to gentlemen who have their lodgings and sleeping apartments elsewhere, and who go to those clubs to take their meals, whereas the public-house is open to everybody to go for the purpose of drinking?—The club of which I am myself a member, is closed on Sunday, and I can only speak of that of my own knowledge; living in the country, I have no personal knowledge of the working of clubs. I believe that is so with other clubs.

4751. You would have no objection to a person sleeping and living at a public-house, taking his meals, and taking moderate refreshment on the Sunday?—Most assuredly not; that would be his home.

4752. So far clubs and public-houses are, as regards the public, on an equal footing?—That is so.

4753. The clubs generally are not open to the public, they are only open to certain individuals who are members or subscribers?—I thought that the doors of the clubs were closed on Sunday. I cannot speak about clubs generally; I have no personal knowledge of their working, and I had better only speak of that which I thoroughly understand.

4754. I think you stated, that though you approve of this Bill of Mr. Abel Smith's, your own individual opinion was in favour of entire closing, though it should be gradually introduced?—I believe that the effect of Mr. Abel Smith's Bill will be to lead people gradually to that opinion. That is what I desire to express, and I think Mr. Abel Smith has been wise in limiting it for the present to the provisions of his Bill, in order that there may be no sudden change which might be regarded with disfavour.

4755. Although you have given that opinion as respects Neston only, you probably have reason to believe that the same opinion prevails at Birkenhead and Liverpool?—I have a great deal of knowledge of Liverpool, and I, of course, have a knowledge of Birkenhead. I believe that is the general opinion, and that that opinion has grown largely of late years.

4756. Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen.] Your evidence has been given so very fairly that I have hardly any question to ask you; but I would say this: in your locality the arrangements with the publicans which the shoemaker commenced, broke down?—It broke down.

4757. That was through the customers putting the screw on?—Yes; or by some of those people who, perhaps acting under the impulse of the moment, signed the paper, afterwards found that their interests were too deeply involved.

4758. The wishes of their customers were so strong that they could not, consistently with a due regard to their own interests, persevere in carrying out their own convictions?—I think that was so.

4759. If we have been told that the opposition to restriction comes from an organised society of publicans, and not from the public, in your own neighbourhood, that is not true?—In my neighbourhood that is not true.

4760. In fact, in your neighbourhood the publicans were willing to advance the interests of sobriety by this particular restriction, but the pressure of public opinion prevented their doing it?—I would use a stronger word than "willing;" they were most anxious. I do not know to what extent this pressure may have been put upon them, whether it may have been by few or by many; but that has been the argument which has been used to me; and I have no doubt whatever that that pressure has been put upon them; but they say, "If we could tell our customers that we had no option in the matter, we should become free from all responsibility."

4761. Are you not apprehensive that the public opinion, which showed itself in such a very strong manner in your own neighbourhood, might possibly show itself in the same manner in other localities?—It is very difficult to encroach upon any privilege or custom which people have had for many years without exciting a good deal of antagonism, and I think that that would be found; but I think, also, that it would come from a class which, as I ventured to say before, is not worthy of consideration.

4762. Still, there being that public opinion expressed in some localities, it is advisable to approach such a subject as this with very great caution, is it not?—I quite think that, and I feel that Mr. Abel Smith has approached it with caution by the provisions of this Bill.

4763. You used one expression which I should like to give you an opportunity of correcting; you mentioned that the publicans are the promoters of drunkenness for their own interests; is not that rather a sweeping condemnation of a very large class?—What I mean is, that the more a man sells of the commodity in which he deals, the more profit he obtains from the sale of it; and we do know that there are comparatively few publicans who have the courage to refuse to sell a man drink when they see that he has already had too much. I think if you could once impress upon a man that he was doing a great wrong to supply a man with drink who has already had too much, you would gain a great deal in the direction of temperance.

4764. My question referred more particularly to the interests of the publican; in your locality, do not the magistrates, in renewing the licenses, take cognizance of the character of the house?—Always; but if the Honourable Member is in the commission of the peace, he knows how extremely difficult it is to remove a license from a house.

4765. I have been in the commission of the peace for a good many years; but I want to know whether you do not think that, whereas, complaints of drunkenness occurring in a house militate, or should militate, against the renewal of the license, it is the interest of the publican to maintain his house so respectably as to ensure that the magistrates should look upon him with a favourable eye?—It is astonishing, as the Honourable Member knows, how very little hold you have upon a publican's license. A great deal of drunkenness may take place in a house, the police may know it, and the magistrates may know it, but still you may not have sufficient evidence to take away the license. No doubt a man knows that he would lose his license if he permitted drinking to excess, and there were a number of convictions against him.

4766. You would not deny that there are a great many respectable publicans who would like to keep their houses respectable?—I see no reason why the business of a publican should not be as respectable as any other business, and I believe when respectably conducted it is so. As the Honourable Member opposite said, these are necessities of life, and I so regard them; I am not one of those who would restrict the working man from drinking his beer; I believe that it is a necessary of life to the working man; I take my own glass of wine, and enjoy it, and I have no desire that the working man should give up his glass of beer, if he likes it.

4767. But do you not think that the interests of a respectable publican are really not concerned in promoting drunkenness?—I find it very difficult to answer that question. There are some most respectable men who do habitually prevent drunkenness in their houses; but I cannot but think that a man who profits by the sale of his commodity naturally thinks that he profits more by the sale of more of it than of less.

4768. Mr. Evans.] When you stated to the Committee that publicans were interested in promoting drunkenness, I understood you to mean that they were interested in promoting the sale of liquor, like any other man would be in promoting the sale of what he deals in?—Precisely.

4769. I understood you to say that if public-houses were closed as this Bill provides, and that the sale of drink was only to be allowed within certain hours across the counter, there would probably be some drinking at home?—Yes, I think so; where there is a disposition to drink, there is nothing to prevent a working man taking home all that he requires to drink on Sunday.

4770. Should you be of opinion that, as a matter of fact, it is very much greater deprivation to a man to prevent his sitting to drink in a public-house, if he is able to have the drink in his own house?—I would say most decidedly that there is much greater temptation to a man to drink in a public-house, led on by the society which he meets there.

4771. I suppose you mean this: that a man who drank to excess in his own house would probably be a man who loved drink for the sake of it?—Yes.

4772. On the other hand, a man who would go to a public-house is influenced by other people to drink, and very often is led on to excessive drinking?—He intends only to take a glass of beer, and it ends perhaps in his getting drunk, to his great regret, as I know, in many cases.

4773. Mr. Yorke.] Is drunkenness increasing in your neighbourhood?—No; I am happy to say that I think it very much diminished; and I can answer that question by further telling the Honourable Member that, whereas some years ago the Bench sat every Monday, and we had a great number of cases of drunkenness and assault, now we only meet once a month. I do not speak from statistics, but merely from my general impression, which is, that now we have not so many such cases in the whole month as we had seven or eight years ago within one week.

4774. Do you attribute that decrease to any special cause?—I think to the generally better feeling amongst the people, and to influences which have been at work amongst them inculcating higher and better principles.

4775. It has not been the result of any special legislation, in your opinion?—I had no experience of the neighbourhood before the provision of the Bill passed in 1854; therefore, I cannot institute any comparison upon that ground. But as to the fact of the district being improved in relation to drunkenness, I can state that I decidedly think so.

4776. Do you see any connection between the rate of wages and the increase or decrease of drunkenness?—I can answer that question for this reason: that in my neighbourhood we have a population composed in part of a rural population; that is to say, labourers who work in the fields and upon farms; and another class, who make large sums of money by gathering cockles upon the shores of the Dee. Those people who so gather cockles, at certain seasons of the year, make very large sums of money; and I am sorry to say that some of them having the means, have been distinguished for drunkenness; and I am persuaded, further, that high wages tend to lessen the producing power of the country. I mean that a man who can in three or four days in the week earn sufficient for himself and the wants of his family, is too often disposed to drink and to play the other two or three days. I have known instances of that.

4777. Have you not noticed, on the other hand, that where there is distress it leads people to intemperance?—I believe statistics show that when there is great poverty and suffering, there is often no diminution in the consumption of alcoholic drinks.

4778. Have any means been tried in your neighbourhood to draw people away from the public-houses on Sunday other than legislation; such as by promoting games of cricket, or by reading-rooms, or things of that kind?—No; but by personal visiting amongst the poor in their dwellings something has been done, and with advantage.

4779. But they have no special attractions to draw them from the public-house?—No, they have not; and I have very often felt the difficulty with regard to that. You go into the cottage of a poor man, who is there with his wife; they cannot read; they cannot write, and they have no resources whatever. Those who are disposed to do them good, may read to them; but beyond that you can do nothing. You can leave nothing behind you which they can read, and, therefore, it is only the influence of the moment which can act upon them at all; therefore, it is not to be wondered at if that man makes his way to the public-house, as very often he does.

4780. Would you not prefer, before resorting to to coercive legislation, to try some of those expedients, such as the establishment of a village choir concerts, reading-rooms, or games of cricket, or attractions of that kind?—No, I would not; I would rather take away the temptations to drinking, which are the consequence of the present law, and prosecute, by all means the inculcation of religion and morals among the people; but my strong feeling is that the law ought not to be as I think it now is, antagonistic to such work, and to such movements on the part of the clergy and the laity.

4781. Mr. John Abel Smith.] I only want to ask you whether you know anything of the (perhaps it is too strong an expression) contemptuous indifference with which the working classes treat this argument with reference to clubs?—Of course, I do not wish to use an offensive word at all; I was going to say, that I regard it as clap-trap; but lest I should offend anybody, I will not use that word, but that is the word which comes nearest to the opinion which I desire to express.

4782. Have you ever heard them say that if the public-houses were their clubs, they would have them very differently managed from what they are now?—No; I have not heard that. I am not in a district where such a question is likely to be discussed; but I am persuaded that the effect of the present law is to throw an impediment in the way of religious and moral, and social training.

4783. Generally speaking, your opinion is that past restrictions have done good, and that they may be carried further without any disturbance or injury to the interests of the public?—I am persuaded of it; and I believe that some of those gentlemen who are just as much in earnest in their desire that right should be done as I am, but who now think differently, will by-and-by come to the conclusion that we were right, and they were wrong, and that we may go further still in the direction of restrictive legislation.

JAMES HOWARD, Esq., called in; and Examined.

4786. Mr. John Abel Smith.] You are a Manufacturer of Agricultural Implements at Bedford, are you not?—Yes.

4787. Is yours one of the largest establishments of the kind in the midland counties?—It is.

4788. Do you employ a great number of men?—Yes.

4789. How many?—About 600, and about 50 in agriculture as well; I have a large farm.

4790. You have given a good deal of attention, have you not, to the state of the working people in your district?—I have, for many years past.

4791. Do you know the provisions of the Bill which has been referred to this Committee?—I believe I do; it is to close public-houses on Sunday in London, except from one till half-past two, and from eight to ten, and in the country from half-past twelve to half-past two, and to allow no drinking upon the premises.

4792. Are you in favour generally of the provisions of this Bill?—I am.

4793. You wish to see it carried into a law?—I do.

0.69.

4784. Mr. Locke.] You were present when the last witness was examined?—Only a part of the time.

4785. Do you recollect his statement with regard to the answer to the paper which was sent out at Sheffield; that a great number of working men made answer that they were in favour of closing public-houses on Sunday if clubs were closed on Sunday?—I have heard very little of the evidence given here; but, perhaps, in conclusion, the Committee will allow me to say that there is a very judicious movement going on for the improvement of the dwellings of the poor, and it would be impossible to over-rate the importance of it as a means of social and moral improvement; but if you could do anything which should secure that the working men's wages found their way in their entirety to the wife, and were devoted to the objects and need of the family, you would thereby do much for the improvement of the dwellings of the poor. I have always tried to inculcate that whenever I have talked to the wives of working men. Take care, above all things, to have a good and comfortable house. In that direction there is one economical change which, perhaps, may seem a trifling thing, but it is not so; formerly the poor had their dwellings miserably lighted, they now use petroleum oil; and the bright light which they now get, at even a less cost than they formerly paid for their miserable rushlight, is in itself an element of improvement and comfort in the poor man's dwelling; if you can only influence the working men, as I believe may be done, by removing, so far as possible, temptation out of his way, so that he shall take his wages home in their entirety, however small they may be, the dwellings of the poor will show a marked improvement. Immediately that a dwelling is improved, immediately you have the best evidence that the family has become happier and more comfortable in every respect; promote that, and you promote in every way the advantage of that family, and of society at large.

C. Bushell,
Esq.

20 May
1868.

4794. Do you believe that Sunday drinking is carried to an excess which interferes with the comfort and well-being of the families of the working men in many places?—I do.

4795. Has that been the failing at Bedford as well as elsewhere?—There is a very great deal of drinking there on Sunday.

4796. Does that interfere with the steady working and application of the men to their labour?—We have more absentees on Monday than on any other day.

4797. When do you pay your wages?—On Saturday, at two o'clock; we have a Saturday half-holiday, and we pay as soon as the men have finished work.

4798. Do you find that there is a great deal of drinking on Saturday?—On Saturday night there is.

4799. Should you think it would be a great improvement in the law if the public-houses were closed at 10 o'clock on Saturday night?—I do think so; and in my conversations with our chief constable he thinks so too.

4800. If there was no Sunday drinking, do you think that the wages which you pay to those men, men, would be sufficient to keep their wives and families in comfort?—Yes.

J. Howard,

4801. But a certain amount is spent every Sunday in drink?—I have no doubt about it.

4802. Do the bulk of those people drink?—No; I do not think the bulk of them do. I have a very superior set of men, and upon the whole a very steady set of men.

4803. You have probably taken great personal pains with those men?—Yes; myself and my brother, we always take very great interest in them.

4804. You believe, do you not, that the past existing restrictions on Sunday drinking have been beneficial?—I do.

4805. Do you believe that restriction may be carried further, with benefit?—I do; I think that if the public-houses in the country were shut up, as they are in London, it would be a great boon to the working classes.

4806. How do you mean, shut up as they are in London?—They are shut up until one o'clock in London. I often spend Sunday in London, and I have noticed, with very great pleasure, great sobriety among the working classes on Sunday morning.

4807. But the same law exists in the country, up to half-past 12 o'clock, does it not?—No, they only shut during church hours. They can get drink at six o'clock on Sunday morning, in the country.

4808. But it is against the law, is it not?—Generally they are only shut during church hours.

4809. Do you think that the time has come when the existing restrictions might be safely and properly extended?—I do; it is simply an extension of the principle.

4810. Do you believe that the effect of past restriction has been to diminish drunkenness?—I do.

4811. Do you go as far as this, that the diminution of drunkenness is in proportion to the restriction?—I would not go so far as that. We are simply dealing with the Sunday, and I think that if men have indulged on Saturday night too freely, the longer the time which intervenes between their being able to resort to drinking again, the more likely they are to continue sober during the rest of the day, and probably the following day.

4812. Can you tell me what you think the public feeling of Bedford is with reference to such a Bill as this which is before the Committee?—I can tell you what the feeling of my own workmen is; for when the debate took place upon your Bill in the House of Commons, finding that there was very great diversity of opinion among the Members as to the opinion or feeling of the working classes upon the Bill, I called a meeting of my own workmen to consider the subject. Some 300 of them met. I took no part in the meeting, but simply presided; and I asked them to express an opinion upon it, and I think 99 out of 100 were in favour of the principle of your Bill; in fact, resolutions in favour of it were passed unanimously. I may say, further, that the fathers of families felt very strongly upon the question, and said that the opening of public-houses on Sunday was a great temptation to the junior members of their families; that they could manage them during the week, when they were at work, but on Sunday they had very great difficulty in controlling them.

4813. I need hardly ask you if the men were in favour of the Bill, whether you think the women would be in favour of the Bill?—Doubtless.

4814. You think that they would be pretty unanimously in favour of the Bill?—Yes; I have been twice Mayor of Bedford, and I have been in the commission of the peace for the county for some time; and, therefore, the feelings of the women, not only in my official capacity, but in my capacity as a manufacturer, are often brought home to me; and I know that the great grief of the wives of the working men is that nearly all their troubles are brought upon them by drink.

4815. It is practically the truth, is it not, that one main cause of the sufferings and distress of the families of working men is Sunday drinking?—I do not say Sunday drinking; I cannot go to that extent. I say drinking generally; and I can almost always tell the habits of my workmen by the manner in which they turn out to a place of worship on a Sunday. The wives and families of my steadiest men turn out as respectable and well dressed almost as my own family; whereas the wives and families of those whom I know to be dissolute are in a very different condition. That I can speak to most positively.

4816. Is there much illicit drinking in Bedford?—I think there is a great deal of drinking during the prohibited hours; I know there is. In fact, from the statements of our police, and the cases that have been brought before me, I know that it is very difficult to check it, because the publicans lock their houses, and the police have to rap at the door, and before he obtains admission, of course they can take two minutes, or five minutes before they open the door, and although men are assembled there, I believe that the law is not sufficiently clear to reach a case where men are assembled, except unless they are found in the act of drinking.

4817. Do you believe that if such a Bill as is now before this Committee became law, there would be any great increase of illicit drinking?—I think not.

4818. You do not think that there would be any difficulty in enforcing the law?—I think not. I apprehend that if a working man were once to invite some of his fellows to drink with him on Sunday at his own house, he would not do it again, he would not be proud of his company; I do not think he would do it again, unless he was a hopelessly lost character.

4819. Do you think that the publicans and beer-shop keepers in Bedford are in favour of having the day to themselves, or not?—I really could not answer that question; I know but little of their views upon the subject. If they are like me, they would be glad of a day of rest.

4820. You do not think that, supposing such a Bill as this before the Committee became law, its enforcement would create any confusion or public resistance in Bedford?—None; I think the bulk of the people in Bedford would be glad of it. I believe that the bulk of my acquaintances among manufacturers, and other members of the middle class, entertain the same view as I do, that it would be a very great boon to shorten the hours of the public-houses being open.

4821. With regard to young girls, is the opening of the public-house a great evil with respect to

J. Howard,
Esq.

1868.

to them?—I really cannot speak from my own knowledge upon that question. I know that my brother has sent several girls to reformatories in London who attributed their downfall to attending public-houses late at night.

4822. Is there any music or dancing in those public-houses?—Not on Sunday.

4823. Is there any sacred or other music?—None that I am aware of.

4824. Do you know generally the feeling of the various classes, professional and other classes, in Bedford upon this subject?—I cannot say that I have any very intimate knowledge; but it has often been discussed when I have been in society, and people generally are in favour of it. Of course there is a difference of opinion; many maintain that you cannot make people sober by Act of Parliament, nor do I suppose we can.

4825. But you believe that legislation might be carried further in the way of restriction with benefit to social and moral order?—I do. Some of my own men objected to your Bill on the ground that the club-houses were open on Sunday; but I pointed out to them that they were quite as free to establish clubs, and I believe that they were quite as able to establish clubs as the upper classes; and, therefore, there was no class legislation upon the subject.

4826. And they quite recognised that argument?—Yes, on that principle they did; in fact, we have a club in Bedford, a working men's institute, which I was instrumental in establishing.

4826. Chairman.] A club where they can obtain refreshments?—Coffee, and light refreshments.

4828. But it is quite open to the members of that club to be served with beer?—Yes, if they thought proper. I am a member of it; that is to say, I am on the committee of that club, and we could have a license if we thought proper, but it has never been proposed.

4829. Mr. John Abel Smith.] Being a very large employer of labour, and both as a manufacturer and as a magistrate, intimately acquainted with the habits, wishes, and feelings of the working classes in Bedfordshire, you give your opinion that further restriction on the sale of beer and spirits on Sunday night might be beneficial to themselves, without producing any interruption of public order?—I do most emphatically.

4830. Mr. Hibbert.] Do you know whether any publicans or beersellers close their houses on the Sunday at Bedford?—I think very few, if any.

4831. What has given rise to your idea that publicans are allowed to sell upon the Sunday morning, except during Divine service?—I know that they do. I think the only law we have to reach them is with regard to their selling during Church hours.

4832. Perhaps you are not aware that they must be closed at all hours from 12 o'clock on Saturday night up to half-past 12 on Sunday morning; that is the general law; but you are not aware what instructions your police have?—No, I am not.

4833. Have you many cases arising from selling during prohibited hours?—A very great many; but we have a great many more cases brought before the magistrates than can be proved, owing to the difficulties I have alluded to.

4834. You mentioned that most of those cases were for selling during the hours of Divine service?—Yes, all.

4835. No doubt there would be cases of opening during the whole time of the prohibited hours for sale?—I never had any other cases brought before me.

4836. You say that there is a great deal of drinking amongst the people in your neighbourhood, but that their habits, as far as drunkenness is concerned, are improved?—Very much; there is not nearly so much drunkenness as when I was a boy; I think that there is a very great improvement in that respect.

4837. Do you remember when the Act called Mr. Wilson Patten's Act was passed in the year 1854, restricting the hours of the sale of liquor?—I do not remember it.

4838. Mr. Yorke.] I suppose that your men, being a very superior class, most of them have good houses of their own?—I do not mean to say that the whole of my men are of a superior class, because we employ highly skilled mechanics down to the commonest labourer, and of course the lowest are very indifferently lodged.

4839. What proportion should you say do not get wages above the average of the labouring class?—I should think about one-fifth; not more than one-fifth.

4840. You think, altogether, that they are a higher class?—We have gradations from 3*l.* a week down to 14*s.*, perhaps.

4841. With regard to their habits, do you know whether they have beer at their own homes?—I think many of them have; in fact, I know they have, from their own statement. I believe that it is becoming a much more general practice than formerly; in fact, I know it is.

4842. Then I suppose they would not be, as a class, the people who would be much affected, one way or the other, by this proposed Bill; they would be considerably less affected by it than the average farm labourer in your neighbourhood?—Yes; of course they occupy a very different position to farm labourers.

4843. So that if dissatisfaction were to arise from the passing of this Bill, probably it would proceed from a lower class than that of your workmen?—I do not think that agricultural labourers would complain, because they have no difficulty in spending their 10*s.* a week in six days.

4844. I understand that if they are paid this 10*s.* on the Saturday, probably the greater portion of it would be spent on the Sunday?—I think that it would have been mortgaged during the previous five or six days, but I really do not think that there would be any dissatisfaction.

4845. If there was any dissatisfaction it would not be among your men, but it would be from another class?—No, I do not think that there would be any dissatisfaction from the residuum even.

4846. When you say that there is a great deal of illicit drinking, we are to understand by that, drinking in public-houses out of hours?—Yes.

4847. And that has been found to be unchecked?—Yes, from the causes which I have stated.

4848. Do not you think that if the restriction were extended, as proposed by this Bill, the difficulty would become much greater than it is at present?—It might, possibly.

4849. How would you propose to meet that difficulty of enforcing increased restriction?—

J. Howard,
Esq.

20 May
1868.

I do not apprehend that it will arise; when it arises it will be time enough to think about what measures you will adopt.

4850. In proposing legislation, would you not feel bound to consider the possible difficulties which might arise, and the method of meeting them?—Certainly.

4851. Then, in giving advice to the legislator, you would feel bound, would you not, to consider how you would meet the possible evils which would arise from the measures which you advocate?—I think that your point was this: you said, "Supposing you carry the restrictive principle further, would it not give rise to more illicit drinking?"

4852. Or rather that it would increase the difficulty of repressing illicit drinking?—I do not admit that it would increase the difficulty; I put it, I think, rather less strongly; I expressed a doubt as to which way it would act.

4853. Do you think that the danger of its increasing is so remote, that it is not worth while to consider beforehand what measures should be taken to meet it in case it should arise?—I think it is remote.

4854. You used the expression, I think, that only a hopelessly lost character would ask his companions to drink with him on Sunday?—I did not say that; I said that none but such would ask them a second time.

4855. Why should a man be a hopelessly lost character who twice asked his companions to drink with him on Sunday?—I think that a man who would have a drinking party on Sunday, would in all probability carry the thing to such an extreme, that he would make his house such an intolerable nuisance, that he would not repeat the experiment a second time.

4856. Do you mean to say that a person of the respectable class of people which your workmen are supposed to be, would not be able to have a party of friends in with him on the Sunday evening, and give them something to drink without its resulting in drunkenness and disorder?—I think that that is quite another matter; you are putting an altogether different phase upon the question that you first asked. I think that a social party on a Sunday night, should not be debarred to working men any more than to the working classes; I am totally against class legislation, but I consider that your question was directed to drinking during illegal hours; on Sunday morning, for instance.

4857. There are no illegal hours in a man's own house, are there?—No; certainly not.

4858. I understood you to say, that a man who in his own house twice asked his companions to drink with him on Sunday, was a hopelessly lost character?—Perhaps you will allow me to explain what I really did mean. I conceived that the question was directed to this point, whether in the event of this restrictive legislation being carried much further, it would not lead to illicit drinking in private houses.

4859. I am now upon a different point. I ask you to explain the answer which you made in your first examination, that you thought that a man who asked his companions to drink with him a second time on Sunday in his own house would be a hopelessly lost character?—I meant during the day-time. I meant that in the case of those who could not resort to the public-house, to indulge in their propensities, during perhaps, morning service, or afternoon service; if a respectable working man were to ask them once to his own house, I do not think that he would be likely to renew the experiment. It is of course a mere matter of opinion.

4860. Then you add to your remark, excessive drinking?—Yes I do. I mean a drinking party; not a man who would ask another to have a pint of beer with him, or a glass of wine with him; but if men who could not indulge in their propensity at a public-house, resorted to each other's houses, I think that what I stated, would be the result. And indeed, I may say, that it is not merely a matter of opinion, because I asked my own men that very question, and they concurred in my view.

4861. Chairman.] Supposing that a man's propensity is to consume a pint of malt liquor once a day, and to do that in company; and supposing he knows a number of his friends who have a similar propensity, and they convey that number of pints of malt liquor to a private house, and sit over it for an hour after their dinner on Sunday, what should you say to that?—I think they would be quite justified in doing so.

4862. I do not understand where you draw the distinction?—I think I drew the distinction when I gave the explanation that I referred to excessive drinking.

4863. Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen.] I will ask you, as a large employer of labour, do you prefer this species of legislation to the permissive principle?—I think that the Permissive Bill would lead to a very great deal of heart-burning and disunion amongst the people of a place.

4864. You think it inadvisable to throw this question upon the decision of local communities?—I do; I do not believe in permissive legislation; if a thing is good I would make it compulsory. I may say that I am not a teetotaler, and that I try to take a dispassionate view of this question.

4865. Mr. Yorke.] Supposing you had the choice, would you prefer to legislate for Saturday or for Sunday?—I do not quite understand your question.

4866. Would you prefer to place restrictions on Saturday drinking, or to increase them on Sunday?—On Sunday; I am decidedly in favour of that.

4867. Do you say that because you believe that there is more drinking on Sunday than on Saturday, or on any other ground?—I do it upon the higher ground that Sunday is a day of rest; it is the Sabbath, to begin with. I take it upon religious grounds; and I do think that when men are away from work the temptations to indulge are far more numerous than when they are constantly occupied throughout the day.

4868. You say that you have got a working man's institute at Bedford; is it open on Sunday?—Yes.

4869. What attractions does it provide?—There are various publications, and one of the clergymen of the town used to meet the men on Sunday night, and give lectures to them.

4870. Mr. John Abel Smith.] Can they have coffee at the institute?—Yes.

4871. Mr. Locke.] What refreshments do they admit?—I do not think they are very substantial. I think that they are light refreshments generally;

lly; as I said, we are quite free to apply for a nse if the members of the club think proper, t we have not done so.

4872. Remembering what the working men at Bedford were 30 years ago, do not you think that they will go on improving?—I hope so.

4873. Without being legislated for?—I think that legislation will promote their improvement.

J. Howard,
 Esq.

20 May
 1868.

Mr. GEORGE FRESHWATER, called in; and Examined.

4874. Mr. John Abel Smith.] YOU a workman the employ of Messrs. Howard, at Bedford, e you not?—I am.

4875. Early in life you were a publican, were e not?—Yes, I was.

4876. You know, therefore, a good deal about e drinking habits of working men, both per-ally and practically, by your communication
 th your fellow-workmen?—I do.

4877. Do you think that drinking on Sun-ys is carried on to a considerable extent?—I nk that in the town of Bedford it is carried a very great extent. I have had various oprtunities of seeing it. In former years I was xed up with it, and of late I have seen a very eat deal of it, and I believe that it is demoral-ing generally to working men, and great mptations are held out to them. The public-uses being open on Sunday at dinner-time, in e middle of the day, many working men who e in the habit of going to take a glass of ale, it till the houses are opened, and then they go in, d in many instances many of them stop there a od while past the hour of dinner, and I know om what I have seen personally, that the wives
 d families often have to wait; the dinner at home spoiled; and when they come home, frequently mething occurs at home which is not at all asant. I have known that happen, and I think ould not happen if houses were closed so as t to be allowed to drink on the premises.

4878. Do you consider that the drinking on ndays is carried to an extent which exercises a ticeable effect upon the comfort and well-being families, and of the men themselves?—I do; I nk that if the public-houses were closed sooner the Saturday night, there would not perhaps e that great anxiety for them to resort to the ublic-houses on the Sunday, that there is now; ecause the public-houses being open to a late ur on the Saturday night, many of the men t a good lot of drink in them, and as soon as e Sabbath appears they are very anxious to t some more, and therefore they resort to the aces where they can get it.

4879. You think that the drinking on the Satury night induces a desire to drink on the Suny?—Yes, I do; I think if houses were closed 10 o'clock on Saturday night, it would preent a great deal of Sunday drinking.

4880. Do many of the men lose time on the nday, from the Sunday drinking?—Yes, I nk that the Sunday drinking operates very ach in interfering with the Monday work. Not ly working men, but others besides working en, people of a higher station in life, make a actice of attending public-houses, and there of urse they have conversation on different sub-ts, which entices, perhaps, many people to go d listen to all sorts of things, and they stay ere, and many are induced to get too far advanced in drink for them to be fit to attend to eir work on the following Monday, and consequently the Monday's labour, perhaps, is lost.

4881. Probably you can speak confidently as 0.69.

to the general feeling of the working men at Bedford in reference to further restriction?—I can. I have had, of course, very great opportunities from being mixed up with working men, and being a working man all my days; and I have generally been mixed up where there has been a great many men at work. There are between 500 and 600 men where I work now; and before that I worked at another factory where there were a great number of men, and I have conversations with a great many men now with whom I am connected. Although they are drinkers, and although, at the present time, they make use of public-houses from the Sunday drinking custom, yet they have invariably told me that they would very much approve of public-houses being closed on the Sunday, to prevent any one going to sit down in the public-houses to drink.

4882. Do you mean that they are against consumption on the premises?—Yes; I think the majority of thoughtful, intelligent working men would accept it as a great boon.

4883. Do you know what is proposed to be effected by the Bill which is referred to this Committee?—Yes, I do.

4884. It is to stop all drinking on the premises on Sunday, and to open the houses for the purchase of drink for four hours during the day?—
 Yes, it is. Even when the Bill was first introduced, I very well remember seeing it in the daily papers; and, as soon as I saw it, I thought that it was one of the best things that could be adopted for the good and welfare of working men generally, although sometimes it is a difficult matter for working men, when a thing of that sort is brought forward before them, to see that it would be beneficial to them. It is a custom in which they have long been in the habit of indulging, and it seems hard sometimes to them, because they think that you are going to take away something from them which belongs to them as a right; but, after due consideration, and talking to them on the question, many of them have said to me, that they think that it is one of the best things that could be adopted.

4885. Is there much drinking during prohibited hours at Bedford?—There is a very great deal.

4886. How is it that it is not prevented by the police?—I cannot say how it is that the police do not happen to be on the spot when it is done, but there is a very great deal of it that is done I know from experience. Perhaps there may be a great many publicans, I will not say all, but there are some, of course, who do not open their houses on Sunday, and there is one or more in Bedford that do not open at all, when the hour for their being closed should prevent them from doing so; but there are others who do. If an old customer calls and says to the landlord that he feels rather thirsty on Sunday morning, the door is opened, and he is admitted, and has what he wants. To a very great extent, I have seen that.

4887. Do you think that the publicans encourage or rebuke drunkenness?—I do not think that

Mr. G.
 Freshwater.

Mr. G.
Freshwater.

that any publican would encourage drunkenness. A publican at any time would not encourage to have a drunken man in his house; because, as soon as a man becomes in a drunken state the sooner he leaves the publican's premises the better he would like it; the publican does not want him there when he is drunk.

4888. What inconvenience do you think would result to the public if the further restrictions proposed by this Bill were carried into law?—I do not think that any inconvenience would result to the public. I think that it would be a very great benefit generally, both morally and socially, to all classes of people.

4889. Supposing that the working men were encouraged by the provisions of this Bill to take their beer to their own homes, and enjoy it with their families, would not you consider that a benefit?—Yes, a very great benefit. In many instances, where they go to the public-house now, the beer that is consumed by themselves, and the family has no part or lot in the matter, and when they go home there is none for the family.

4890. They would not take it home with them?—No.

4891. It is a purely selfish enjoyment?—A purely selfish enjoyment.

4892. Have you any means of speaking as to the comparative attendance at the public-house on the Sunday, and on the other days of the week?—Upon the Sunday, and especially upon the Sunday evening, there is a very great attendance at the public-houses. You can scarcely go into a public-house in the town on Sunday after six o'clock, but what you will find most of them full in one room or other; not working men alone.

4893. Are there girls and young men there?—Yes, young men; in the heart of the town you will not find so many young women, but in the little places in the outskirts of the town where young men and young women resort for a walk, they stop and spend their time there.

4894. Is that carried to such an extent as to produce results that are palpable and clear as regards the morality of those people?—I do think so.

4895. How do you think that working men receive further restriction; would they receive it in a spirit of willing obedience to the law, or do you think there would be any resistance?—I do not think that there would be any resistance. When I say I do not think that there would be any, of course it would be almost a moral impossibility but what you would find some, who have been very strong lovers of drink, who would begin to make some complaint at the time; but in a general way the great majority, especially of the intelligent working men, would hail it as a very great blessing.

4896. Do you believe that the advantages would greatly exceed the disadvantages and inconveniences?—I do, for it would induce them to become better fathers and better members of society.

4897. There has been a great improvement amongst the working men since you began to take notice of them, has there not?—A very great improvement.

4898. To what do you attribute that; to their better education, or what?—Some think that it is their better education; I cannot attribute it to anything else.

4899. Are there not very great efforts made to improve them?—I think that very great efforts are made on every hand.

4900. Mr. Howard has done a great deal, has he not?—Yes, he has.

4901. And others too in the town?—Yes, and others too in the town.

4902. With regard to the question of clubs, do you think that the people feel that the clubs being open in London on Sunday, this is a sort of unfair and class legislation of which they have a right to complain?—There are a few working men who take that as one leading point in their objections to the Sunday Closing Bill, or to the prevention of selling beer on the premises, on account of the club-houses in London being set apart for the rich, and taking away the privileges of the poor; but amongst a great many of them and I may say the majority of the working men in Bedford, if they felt so disposed, as there is a working men's institute established in Bedford they might club themselves together, and they would see it in this light, that they could have a club-house of their own, and that that objection has nothing at all to do with the question of closing the public-houses for the sale of beer on the premises.

4903. They know that there is nothing to prevent them having a club of their own, if they think fit?—They know it.

4904. Do you not believe that if a man wishes to be temperate and sober he may, with a little care, have his beer from the public-house in as good a state as it was at the public-house itself?—I think that he can if he takes proper care of it; I think that beer taken from the public-house even on the Saturday night would not lose much if he were to take it home and keep it in a cool place, and altogether, it would be equally as good as if he went to the tap to fetch it; but he would not need to do that, because there would be four hours in the day, during which they would fetch it home, and have it for their own convenience in their own homes, and by so doing it would be the means of making their homes the brightest spot on earth, which I contend a working man's home should be.

4905. I consider that the sum total of your evidence is this: that you believe that the working men of Bedford generally have improved largely since you have known them?—Yes, they have.

4906. But you believe that the existing restrictions on Sunday drinking have contributed to that improvement?—Yes.

4907. And that those restrictions might be carried further, as contained in the Bill before the Committee, with benefit to the men and advantage to their families?—I do.

4908. And further, that such legislation would be approved of, and not resisted, by working men; is that a fair statement of your opinion?—That is so.

4909. Mr. Locke.] By all working men?—I do not mean to say by all working men, but by the majority.

4910. A large majority?—I should say by a large majority, and those that would oppose it would be of the lowest order, with a very few exceptions.

4911. And you think that all the respectable working men in Bedford would be in favour of it?—I do.

4912. I think you say that at Bedford there

Mr. G.
Freshwater.
20 May
1868.

is a club of working men?—There is a working man's institute.

4913. That is the same thing as a club, is it not?—No, it is not exactly the same thing as a club, and yet you may call it a club.

4914. How was it formed; by subscription?—It was formed by subscription through the gentlemen of the county and the Duchess of Bedford at the first onset, and now the members pay 1½ d. a week.

4915. Who makes the rules for the institute?—They are made by the members; there are 11 which we call beneficiary members, working men on the committee, and there are five on the committee who are honorary members.

4916. Who are the honorary members; are those working men?—No, they are gentlemen connected with the town, elected by the members.

4917. Who regulates the institute; do those five along with the others?—All the committee; the five and the eleven are all together.

4918. Have those people, the five, who you say are gentlemen, and 11 others, an equal voice, each of them, in making the regulations?—They have all the same voice.

4919. With regard to the subscriptions, what are they?—We have no settled subscription for our honorary members; they make a donation once a year, which certainly does not happen to be very large; it is not quite self-supporting I believe.

4920. You stated that you thought if public-houses were closed earlier on Saturday it would be better?—I do think so.

4921. Do I understand you to say that you attribute drunkenness on Sunday in a great measure to men getting drunk first of all on Saturday night?—I believe that that is a great stepping-stone to it. It may be, as I said, a great stepping-stone to it on Sunday morning, and then the houses being open on Sunday evening, they have the privilege again of resorting to the same place, and renewing their system of drinking.

4922. Do you think that if the men were sober on Saturday night, there would be anything like the drinking on Sunday that there is now?—I do not think there would.

4923. Therefore the most beneficial thing, in your view, would be an earlier closing on Saturday night?—No, I do not think that would be the most beneficial.

4924. Not if it prevented drinking on Sunday?—No. When men have got an appetite for drinking, so long as they have a house open where men can get into to have beer, no matter when you open it, there they will go; but if there is no place open for them to go in, and sit down to drink, you prevent a great amount of drunkenness; and that, with closing earlier on Saturday night, would be the most beneficial.

4925. Still you would not prevent it altogether?—There might be some means of evading the law in some way or other in getting beer; that I cannot answer for.

4926. Do not you think that the people would be induced to drink in other places?—They might, by some means or other, get hold of it; I do not know by what way. It has been said that working men would associate together at each other's houses to drink; I do not believe it. I believe the working men generally have more love for their own honour than to take a lot of people to drink in their own homes, amongst their wives and families. I mean the really respectable working men.

4927. There might be other houses kept by people, not the working man's own house, where they would go to drink other than the public-house, supposing the public-house was closed?—I do not think that would be so; if they were to commence such a thing it would be only at the worst houses, and they would soon get sick and tired of it?

4928. Are there many lodgers in Bedford?—Not a great many; most of them are house-dwellers.

4929. Where do those lodgers get their meals?—Mostly where they lodge; the party provides their meals for them.

4930. Do no men take their meals at public-houses in Bedford?—Very few; I should think it was very rare indeed.

4931. I presume there are some?—There may be some, but very few, who lodge at a public-house. When they first come into the town to get employment, they may for the first week take a lodging at a public-house, but they soon get tired of a public-house, and would rather retire to a private house where they could lodge.

4932. When they lodge in a private house, is there always accommodation for them in that private house to have their meals and their drink and so forth?—Yes, always.

4933. You stated that during the prohibited hours at Bedford there is a great deal of drinking?—Yes, there is a great deal.

4934. If there is a great deal of drinking now, when a small number of hours are prohibited, do not you think there would be more illicit drinking if all the hours were prohibited hours?—I do not think there would be more drinking than there is now, nor can I think there would be so much, because the men get drinking in any hole or corner wherever they can until the house is open, and as soon as they can they flock into it; but when they know that there is no house for them to get into, to a great extent drinking would be done away with, and thinking men would turn their attention to something better.

4935. You do not think they would not continue in the hole and corner drinking?—They would not be seen about anywhere; I think it would be the means of preventing a very great deal of it.

4936. However, you are not quite sure about it, you only think so?—I am not quite sure, but I should not think they would.

4937. You have spoken about the outskirts of the town, where young ladies go; is that to take a walk, or what?—It is done in this way: you say servant girls, mostly, on Sunday evening, are allowed to go out, and they go for a walk, and being connected with young men, they take a walk out together to a certain distance, to a village, perhaps a mile and a half or two miles from the town, where the public-house is open, and if you go into the parlour you will see 20, 30, or 40, young men and young women, sitting and taking their glass together. After sitting for some time it comes on perhaps, dark in the evening, and there is no doubt that many instances occur of many young girls having been ruined by such a system of going out on the Sabbath in the evening.

4938. Young women are ruined from a great many reasons besides that, are they not?—Yes, there are other reasons besides that.

4939. But

Mr. G.
Freshwater.
1868.

4939. But are you aware, that according to the view of the promoters of this Bill, if those persons walked out to a distance of two miles from the town of Bedford, on Sunday, in the country, they would be travellers, and would not be included in this Bill?—They could not go into a public-house, by the Bill, and sit down.

4940. The promoters of the Bill say that they could, that the traveller is not interfered with?—I do not see how they could come under the definition of travellers.

4941. The judges say that they could, if they go away from the place where they reside, whether for business or for pleasure, they are considered to be travellers, and a publican is bound to receive them into his house and give them refreshment; and therefore, I am afraid that this Bill would not protect those young ladies, because it would not apply to them. What sort of houses are those that you speak of, is there any amusement at them?—No, there is no amusement at the public-houses.

4942. Is there any amusement for anybody at Bedford?—There is no amusement at Bedford at the public-houses on the Sunday night; the only amusement which many associate together for is, perhaps there will be some one to read the papers when there is anything very particular going on, and conversations on all kinds of subjects.

4943. Of course, at Bedford, there is no park or anything of that sort, is there?—No.

4944. The people can go out into the open country, and that answers the same purpose, as it is only a small town?—It is a small town.

4945. How many inhabitants are there in Bedford?—I cannot call to mind how many inhabitants there are in Bedford; I do not remember.

4946. Rules which would be beneficial in Bedford, might not be beneficial in large places, might they?—I cannot say as to that; but I think they would be beneficial to the country at large.

4947. You say for instance, that there are no lodgers in Bedford, whereas in London, you know there is an immense number of lodgers?—Yes, I know what London is; I lived in London 12 years.

4948-9. Did you lodge when you were in London?—I was in lodgings when I was in London.

4950. Did you take your meals at home?—I did not.

4951. Where did you take them?—At a cook-shop generally, or a public-house.

4952. If you were still living in London under similar circumstances to those when you lived in London formerly, it would be an inconvenience to you if this Bill should be passed, would it not?—I do not know that it would; because when I used to go to a cook-shop to get my dinner on Sunday, I asked them to send for a glass of ale, or a pint of ale for me, and I could always get it; I gave them the money, and they used to fetch it for me, so that it would not inconvenience me at all.

4953. Except in the morning up to one o'clock, and during the afternoon service, when you could not have it, you could procure it at any other time of the day?—Yes; but of course, a working man does not want to be drinking all day.

4954. But he wants to take it with his meals, and he does not always take them at the same hour?—Working men generally do, unless it is done this way, as I have done myself many times: On the Sunday, when I was in lodgings, we used a few of us to meet together, and have a bit of a walk sometimes in the morning for a little conversation, and we used to wait till the public-house was open, and then go to the public-house and sit there perhaps for an hour, or an hour and a half drinking at the bar or somewhere else, and then after that, we would go to a cook-shop to get our dinner; and many of us after that would go home to our lodgings and lie down on the bed and have a sleep, and go out again in the evening.

4955. If you did that, there was no harm in it was there?—No; and certainly not any good.

4956. They would not be able to do that except by going home to their lodgings, and lying on the bed, that would be the only place that they could go; it would be an inconvenience to those people would it not?—No, I do not think it would.

4957. However, whatever laws are passed, you think people must accommodate themselves to them?—Yes, I do.

4958. Whether they like it or not?—I think they would accommodate themselves to it.

4959. You are not quite sure about it?—No, I could not be quite sure about it.

4960. Chairman.] What situation do you hold in Mr. Howard's works; are you a leading man?—Yes.

4961. Not a foreman?—No, not a foreman exactly; but leading man in the pattern-makers' shop.

4962. You think that you know the general feelings of the workmen?—Yes; I know the general feelings of the whole of them, I dare say. I have been very much mixed up with working men, and I am always having conversations with them on something or other.

4963. I quite understand from you that the working men with whom you are acquainted, are quite willing to have restraints put upon them, to assist them in keeping clear of bad habits?—They are quite willing.

4964. I understand you, that those who feel that they cannot restrain themselves, are willing to submit to restraint; but you do not think that they are unwilling to put restraint upon others who do not wish to be so restrained?—No, I do not think they would be unwilling to do so.

4965. Do you yourself think that it is fair to force anybody to do that which he does not wish to do?—I hardly know how to answer a question of that description. If I think that I see my neighbour running into a ditch, or doing that which I know from experience to be detrimental to him in every shape and form, and likewise to his family, if he was not cognisant, or did not know sufficiently what was best for his own good, and I could do anything to benefit him, I should be very proud and happy to do so; and I should think I was doing my duty.

4966. Do you not think that there must be always a certain amount of freedom of choice; of course you are taking an extreme case, when you say that you would like to restrain a man whom you saw going to the dogs; but, supposing a steady-going man, who could trust himself, has certain habits, for instance, likes to go and take a glass of beer at a public-house on Sunday afternoon, do you see any difficulty in the way of saying to that man, you shall not do so?—I do not feel prepared to answer that question just now

4967. Because

4967. Because, you see, it is the whole question; the question is, whether it is right to put it out of a man's power to do what at present he has a right to do. Of course, you must not always look at extreme cases, such as that of a man who wanted to get and to drink to excess; but take what I believe to be the majority of the people, those who use their opportunities fairly, are you quite sure that all of your friends think that it is right to put it out of the power of a man to go and drink moderately?—But I am quite sure of this, that no great good could be brought into action without a corresponding amount of evil or unpleasantness to some parties. As to those who wish to take their glass of ale on Sunday afternoon, I do not think that the cases would be a great many, because they would have the privilege of taking it at home if they thought proper.

4968. Do you think that some good would be done if public-houses were open for four hours in the day only, and to let men go and drink there, or take drink away, as they like; do you think that would be a step in the right direction?—To take it away from the public-house; not to be allowed to sit down on the premises.

4969. That is what the Bill proposes; but do you think it would be a step in the right direction if they were only to be open for four hours; and that those who went there might either drink what they bought there, or take it away as they liked best?—That would be something like what it is at the present time; there should be no drinking on the premises.

4970. No, they are opened eight hours; the Bill proposes to have them only open for four hours for the sale of drink not to be consumed upon the premises; but supposing that you were to keep them open for four hours for all purposes, and allow drinking on the premises for four hours as well as to take it off, would that be an improvement?—I do not think it would be so good as not letting them drink on the premises at all.

4971. You think it would be so little change that it would not be worth making?—I do not think it would.

4972. Mr. Horsfall.] Do you think that the opinions which you have given to this Committee as being the opinions of the working men with whom you associate, represent the opinions of the working men generally of Bedford?—Generally, they do, I think.

4973. You further stated, did you not, that there was sufficient accommodation for lodgers to have meat and moderate drink in their lodgings?—Yes, the public-houses are so close on the spot that they can have no difficulty whatever; they have a very few yards to go to almost any house in Bedford at which they can get what they want.

4974. And do you consider that the dwellings of the working classes in Bedford afford sufficient accommodation for moderate drinking?—I do.

4975. You were asked by the Honourable Member for Southwark whether you would not find it inconvenient if you were again in London to find the public-houses closed; you said it might be inconvenient, but I presume you would be willing to submit to that inconvenience for the public good?—I would be very glad to do so, for no one can have any idea of the evils but those who are continually seeing it.

4976. Have you seen anything of the evils resulting from working men drinking on Sundays?—I have.

0.69.

4977. Both to themselves and their wives and families?—Yes, I have.

4978. Is there much drinking amongst the younger members of the family, from 16 to 18 years of age?—There is a great deal of drinking amongst young people at Bedford, as long as a place is open; perhaps, there may be only one young person in a public-house, but he sees another go by, and seeing him go by, he calls him in at the window, and that induces another, and that another; and many by that means who started out, to go to other places, have been stopped on the road, and they have stopped at the public-house and spent the whole time there, as long as the houses were open. I know that to be a fact.

4979. Is the law at present pretty well observed by the publicans themselves at Bedford?—I know that it might be better observed.

4980. Is there any secret drinking in the prohibited hours do you think?—There is.

4981. Is there an increase of that do you think?—I do not know that there is any increase; there has not been any increase for some years. It is the same as the general thing. On Sunday morning, people are always on the look out for where they can get something to drink, and they get it by some means.

4982. I collect from your evidence that you are very decidedly in favour of the Bill now under the consideration of the Committee?—I am.

4983. Would you prefer that Bill going further, and having public-houses entirely closed on Sunday?—I should, for my own part, as far as my own individual self goes. I should like to have public-houses closed altogether, on Sundays, but I should be quite willing to accept the bill as it is.

4984. You would be very glad to accept this as an instalment?—Very glad indeed.

4985. Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen.] Did I understand you to say that you have been a publican yourself?—Yes.

4986. Did you close on Sunday then?—No, I did not.

4987. You came to that conclusion after you ceased to be a publican?—At that time the other publicans kept open; as long as my neighbour was open and took a shilling, I was also ready to do the same thing.

4988. Subsequent reflection strengthened your conviction that it would be better to close on Sunday?—Yes.

4989. You stated that men were in the habit of delaying at the public-house, and coming home and finding the dinner spoiled, and that something unpleasant was apt to occur?—Yes.

4990. I suppose, whenever they were delayed in coming home, and kept their wives waiting for dinner, something not very pleasant might possibly occur?—I have known instances of what I speak of. A man has been at a public-house as soon as the house was open, and he has stopped there, perhaps, until the house closes again in the afternoon at three o'clock; and when he went home he might be the worse for what he had had; perhaps a word has come from the wife, and one thing has followed another, and both wife and family have suffered for it to a very great extent.

4991. But the unpleasantness occurred owing to his keeping his wife waiting for dinner, and not, necessarily, on account of his having indulged in any great excess?—Not only that, but it has come to illtreatment from the very thing, by the man being the worse for drink; because, when a man is the worse for drink, he will do what he would not do when he was sober, but would be ashamed of.

4992. But the inference which I draw from that is, that it is desirable that men should be punctual at their dinners?—Yes.

4993. A public-house is one among other things which may attract a man, and by causing him to delay, may interfere with the daily arrangements of his household, and naturally create some unpleasantness therein?—Yes, that is so.

4994. You told us that there is a very great attendance on Sunday afternoons in public-houses in Bedford?—Not Sunday afternoons; Sunday evenings, I meant, because they close in the afternoon at three o'clock.

4995. If there is a very great attendance on Sunday evenings in the public-houses in Bedford, any legislation which prevented that course of people would be a considerable interruption to their habits, would it not?—But by the young people assembling in the public-houses on the Sunday evening, it prevents them from going to other places, whereby they might gain more good perhaps; and it also is calculated to induce them to get too much to drink, whereby they are not prepared for their labour on the following day.

4996. If people are prevented by legislation from doing that which they are constantly in the habit of doing, that is an interruption to their ordinary habits, is it not?—Yes, it is.

4997. You spoke about preventing your neighbour from going to a public-house as you would prevent him from running into a ditch; let me ask you, supposing you yourself were disposed to run into a ditch, which should you attend to most, the man who came to you and said, "My good fellow, that ditch is a very bad place for you to go into; let me persuade you not to go into it;" or the man who stood before you, and violently attempted to control your going, and threatened to give you into custody if you went into the ditch?—Perhaps if a man were to come to me, and try to persuade me from a certain thing, I would not be able perhaps to take care of myself, and I might go so far that I might get into the ditch. It is a difficult matter sometimes to persuade a person to do a thing, whereas sometimes main force prevents him from getting into very great danger.

4998. Main force exercised in that manner might control his actions for the moment, but would it not be likely to create within him a spirit of resistance, and make him more likely to go into the ditch when he could go when you were not there to stop him?—If I could get hold of the man when he was in his proper state of mind and was himself again, and talked to him in a quiet manner, I might be able to persuade him, perhaps, although he might for the moment think that I was taking undue steps to prevent him from doing what he approved of himself.

4999. On the whole you prefer legislative coercion to moral persuasion?—Yes.

5000. You told us that people are always on the look out for where they can get something to drink?—Yes; those who indulge in drinking to excess. There are plenty of moderate people who take a glass of ale, who of course do not look out for this sort of thing, they can have it at home; there are plenty of facilities for working men in Bedford to have small barrels of ale at home on their own premises. There are lots of little brewers where the people can have a small barrel of ale, and save them sending to the public house at all.

5001. Do you think it is wise, for the sake of of those who I am sure are comparatively few in Bedford, who are immoderate, to put a check upon all those moderate people?—I think drunkenness should be checked in every shape and form, where we can.

5002. But you do not check drunkenness, if you prevent a moderate man from taking his glass of beer?—I do not prevent a moderate man from doing so, because a moderate man can always get it.

5003. Unfortunately you cannot legislate for the immoderate man, without touching the moderate one?—The moderate man can always have a glass of ale, because he can always have it in his own house, without any difficulty or any danger of drinking to excess.

5004. Mr. Evans.] Have you spoken to the keepers of public-houses in Bedford upon this subject at all?—Some few; I have not spoken to a great many.

5005. Have you ascertained at all what are the feelings of those whom you have spoken to?—I said, what objection should you have to their being closed, so that liquors should not be drunk on the premises; and they said they would rather see them closed altogether, a great deal.

5006. In fact they would like to have their holiday on the Sunday?—Yes; a great many publicans would like to have their one day for rest the same as any other person would.

5007. You say you have lived in London a great many years?—Yes, 12 years.

5008. Did you keep a public-house in London?—No, I was employed in the building trade in London.

5009. Are you able to form an opinion as to what the working men of London would think upon this subject?—I should say, generally speaking, perhaps the working men in London would feel that it was taking some of their privileges away; and I should, myself, at that time; but I have altered my views on that subject; I think it is very desirable, because if persons can be led not to frequent public-houses so much as they do, and to study their own interests and the welfare of their families, and those connected with them, it would be one means of the working classes generally being a far superior class to what they are now; I believe that the working classes have been falsely characterised by many.

5010. I think I understood you to say that you believe that, on the whole, there has been a great improvement amongst them, at all events, at Bedford?—There has been a great improvement since the last restrictions were made as regards the hours of public-houses being open on Sundays.

5011. There has been a great improvement as far as drunkenness is concerned, as well as other things?—Yes.

5012. Which you attribute to educational and other influence of that sort?—Yes.

The Reverend THOMAS DE VINE, called in; and Examined.

5013. Chairman.] Of what church are you the clergyman?—Of St. George's, Newcastle-under-Lyme.

5014. Mr. John Abel Smith.] Have you taken an active interest in the well-being of the people around you?—Yes; especially of the poor people here.

5015. Have you brought with you the results of a canvass at Newcastle?—Yes, I have.

5016. Was it carried on under your own eye, very much?—Yes, it was.

5017. And you took every possible means in your power to secure its being honestly and faithfully done?—It was so.

5018. Do you know what the population of Newcastle is?—The population is now about 4,000; it was 12,700 at the last census.

5019. They are generally employed in the pottery trade, are they not?—Many of the inhabitants there are employed at the potteries; they go out either to Burslem, or to Stoke. I ought to have said here, "Etruria" as well, or Longton.

5020. Will you state the results of the canvass, and anything which you would wish to give evidence upon, with respect to the pains taken to secure an honest return?—The number of houses in Newcastle is 3,200, and bills were left at every house, except a few which were empty.

5021. Were they voluntary or paid agents?—Voluntary agents. After a lapse of three days the bills were gathered in, on each bill there were three columns stating, "In favour of total closing," "Not in favour of total closing," and "Neutral," and the paper was to be signed by the householder, signifying in either column what his view was respecting this subject.

5022. What was the result?—1,863 in favour of total closing; opposed to closing, 131; neutral, 36; refused to fill the paper, 262. Many of the other bills were unable to be gathered, owing to the parties being out, or some of the papers had been lost, or the children had torn them, and some could not sign their names, and it was not done at the time of the agent calling for the bills, because he had to do nothing but gather them.

5023. Generally speaking, do you believe that to give a fair picture of the feeling of Newcastle?—I do, most decidedly.

5024. Is that shared by all the professional and magisterial people there?—The feeling of the magisterial bench, is in favour of further restriction; not total closing.

5025. Are you personally in favour of total closing, or of the Bill before the Committee?—I am in favour of total closing, but I would be glad to accept this as an instalment towards it.

5026. Do you know anything of the general feeling of working men in favour of restriction?—They are more in favour of total closing, as far as Newcastle is concerned. In order to make sure of the working men on this point, a workshop canvass was made, and its results were—238 for total closing; opposed, 8; neutral, 6; refused to take part in it, 8. I may also observe, that 42 keepers of public-houses took part as follows—15 for, 22 against, and 5 neutral.

7027. Mr. Locke.] Who were the persons that signed?—The householders.

5028. Mr. John Abel Smith.] Are there many lodgers in Newcastle?—Yes, there are a great many.

5029. Were any addressed to them?—No.

Mr. GEORGE POTTER, called in; and Examined.

Mr.
G. Potter.
—
25 May
1868.

5030. Chairman.] You are Secretary to the Trades Union League, are you not?—No; I am President of the London Working Men's Association.

5031. Mr. John Abel Smith.] I suppose there are few men who have had a wider intercourse with the working class than you have had?—I have had a very large connection with them.

5032. And you take the deepest interest in their well-being and good?—Yes; I take the deepest interest in their well-being.

5033. Are you strongly in favour of temperance amongst that class?—I am very much in favour of temperance.

5034. Are you acquainted with the details of the Bill introduced by me into Parliament and referred by Parliament to this Committee?—Yes; I understand that you wish to limit the opening of the public-houses on Sunday by several hours.

5035. In order to prevent any possible misunderstanding, you are aware that the provisions of that Bill restrict all drinking on the premises on the Sunday out of London, and further, that it opens the public-house for two hours in the middle of the day from half-past 12 till half-past two, and again in the evening from eight to ten, for the purpose of buying beer across the counter?—So I understand them.

5036. Do you view this Bill with disapprobation or not?—I view it with approbation.

5037. Do you believe that it will generally be received with favour amongst the more respectable class of working men?—I believe that amongst the respectable and intelligent and thoughtful artisans of the country, it will be received with much favour.

5038. Do you believe that Saturday night and Sunday drinking have been a very great drawback to the improvement of the working men?—I believe that to a great extent they have, although during the last 10 years there has been a very great decrease of drinking amongst the most advanced and intelligent artisans; but I am afraid that that decrease has not yet reached the unskilled labourers of the country.

5039. You believe, therefore, that restriction in that respect might be carried further with benefit to the labouring men?—Yes, I believe that it could be carried further with benefit not only to them, but to other classes of society also.

5040. If such a Bill, as I have described, were passed into a law, should you have any apprehension of public violence or disorder or resistance to it on the part of the working classes in London?—It is very probable that some of the unskilled labourers and the lower classes would endeavour to create dissension and dissatisfaction, led by those who oppose the Bill; but I think that that would be very much outweighed by the large number of the intelligent and thoughtful working men who would be in favour of the Bill.

5041. And who would set themselves against any public resistance to it?—Who would do all they could to discourage any such resistance, and endeavour to show by argument that it would be for the welfare ultimately of those who would show the resistance.

5042. As you have watched the working classes carefully, can you speak as to the fact that a great improvement has taken place within these last 20 years?—A very great improvement in many directions. The artisans with whom I have had to do, have been spending a good deal of time in endeavouring to reduce their hours of labour, and by that means, they have become very much more provident and temperate, and they have advanced their social condition and their moral position greatly during the last 10 years.

5043. Do you believe that shortened hours of labour are very much in favour of the improvement of the working men?—Very much; because it leads them not only to improve themselves by the rest which they have from less work, but it gives them a sympathetic feeling with other classes who have still very numerous hours to work; and for that reason I believe that the respectable, intelligent, and thoughtful artisans would like to see the waiters and servants in public-houses have a day of rest, not merely for religious, but for moral considerations.

5044. Do you believe that improved education has had a great effect in elevating the character of the working men?—Undoubtedly the extension of knowledge amongst them has been of great advantage; and I believe that since they have had the enjoyment of shorter hours of labour they have given much of their time to reading; but there is a large class yet who have not had this is privilege and benefit, and I believe that this class of unskilled labourers may consider this an innovation to some individual rights; but ultimately they would see that it would be for their advantage, and that it would give them an opportunity and a desire to become more intelligent, that their position would rise in the same ratio as the artisans above them.

5045. You are the editor, I believe, of a newspaper that is very largely read amongst them?—I am the manager of the "Bee Hive" newspaper.

5046. Do you find that subjects having reference to moral and social improvement interest a class of men in the workshops; that is to say, the those articles which are published in your newspaper read with interest by workmen?—They are read with great interest. Our paper is circulated amongst the most intelligent and thoughtful class of artisans, and they very much approve of all those moral and social questions that are tending to elevate the class to which they belong.

5047. Certain restrictive laws now exist with reference to drinking, particularly on Sunday; you believe that those restrictive laws, as far as they have gone, have been beneficial in their operation?—I believe they have been greatly beneficial.

5048. Do you believe that they may be carried further with benefit to the working men, and to that class in whom you take so much interest?—I believe that they could. Although the Bill suggests that the public-houses should close at 10 o'clock on Sunday evening, if I had any influence with the promoters of the Bill, I should suggest that they might extend the hour from 10 till 11, and I think that would do away with a great deal of opposition.

5049. Do you think that 10 is too early?—Yes, for this reason: that some of our artisans who go on excursions on Sunday do not get to town, perhaps, until 10 o'clock; and it would then give them another hour, which would enable them to obtain refreshment when they arrived in town, and would do away with a great deal of the opposition which they now have to the Bill in losing from five till eight.

5050. But, generally speaking, knowing the working class in London, as, I presume, no other man does, you give your general approval to the principles and the details of the Bill?—Yes, for this reason, that I believe it would be useful to labour which I represent to a great extent, and to the class to which I am attached, and which for many years of my life I have endeavoured to improve and to advance; and I believe that in favour of that class and in favour of labour, it would be most advantageous.

5051. Mr. Baines.] You are aware that persons going on excursions have an opportunity as travellers of obtaining refreshment up to any hour at which they may be out on Sunday evening; do you think therefore, that that being the case, it is necessary for them to have the hour after 10 o'clock for the public-houses being open in London?—Yes, I am aware that they could take advantage of that; but I suppose generally excursionists think that they being so numerous a body, they would find it difficult to get a house opened after it has once closed to give them the refreshment which they desire and think they ought to have. It is only to disharm some opposition to the Bill, which I think is more imaginary than real, that I made this suggestion.

5052. It is not then your own opinion that it would be positively for the benefit of those who thus return from excursions to go into public-houses instead of going into their own homes?—Not my opinion, because I think that most of those who go on excursions on Sunday have some kind of refreshment in their own homes. The Honourable Member is, no doubt, aware that now many of them keep a small cask of ale, or bottled beer, and other kind of refreshments, which they could have in their own homes; but I suppose it is from the desire not to leave the company that they are with immediately and directly that they wish to stop at some of those houses instead of going direct to their own home.

5053. Is not that company, and are not those public-houses just what tempt and seduce them into excess, and do them the greatest possible injury?—I have no doubt but what it does.

5054. Do not you think that they would be better qualified to go to their labour in good time on Monday morning, if they had gone to their own homes at 10 o'clock rather than to the public-house?—Decidedly, I am of that opinion; because when I used to go on excursions on Sunday, which I formerly used to do, I know that I used to get to my work on Monday morning very much more weary and exhausted than when I left it on Saturday night; and I believe that the generality of those persons do so; and, therefore, I think that it would be immensely to their advantage, both physically and morally, to go home, instead of calling at a public-house after they have returned.

5055. Do you think that the quiet and the repose of the Sabbath-day for a working man, among his own family, would be more beneficial to his health than taking those long excursions and going to the public-house?—Yes, I am decidedly of opinion that it would be very much more beneficial.

5056. Have you been a Sunday-school teacher?—Yes, and I am one now.

5057. And you have been so for many years, have you not?—Fourteen years.

5058. Have you known that the Sunday opening of public-houses has been the means of doing serious injury to many Sunday scholars?—There has been no particular example come under my notice, in the case of any that I have been acquainted with; but I know, from observation, that it is undoubtedly injurious to the morals of young men, and has been very detrimental to their future career.

5059. But in your own class you have not had any instance?—Not any individual instance.

5060. But you know, from your own observation and that of other persons, that it has been so?—Yes.

5061. Mr. Locke.] You state, I think, that a great decrease in drinking has taken place of late years?—Yes, amongst respectable, intelligent, and thoughtful artisans.

5062. But amongst others too, has there not, amongst the labouring classes?—I am afraid that it has not reached to a great extent amongst the unskilled labourers, and the masses of the people.

5063. But has it reached to any extent; are they not less addicted to drinking than they used to be?—I think I should be just in stating that there might be some small improvement.

5064. But you do not see so many drunken people people as you used, do you?—No, we do not see so many drunken people. I believe that getting drunk on the premises has decreased even amongst that class.

5065. Since when have you observed that that decrease has taken place?—During the last 10 years.

5066. That has been without any coercive measure, has it not?—The public-houses, of course, have been closed on Sunday. I do not, from memory, know what year it was that the Act came into operation; but whether it was previous to 10 years or subsequent, does not alter my opinion that during the last 10 years there has been less drunkenness.

5067. Do not you anticipate that that will go on?—I anticipate that it would go on if the hours of closing were further restricted and education extended. I believe that it would go on very much more rapidly by closing public-houses more on the Sunday than it would do if they had the same access to them that they have now.

5068. Are you aware that the drinking on the premises, that is to say, in public-houses, is interdicted altogether on the Sunday, by this Bill, in the country?—Yes, I am aware of that.

5069. Do not you consider that that would be an inconvenience to persons?—I do not think that it would be a real inconvenience; if it is a question of a matter of drinking, we believe that tea, and other things, would be as useful as beer.

5070. Then you would not stop it?—I believe that drinking in their own homes would be much more advantageous to them than drinking in the public-house on Sunday; and I do not think that it would be a real disadvantage, at least not to the class of labourers. I think it would be an advantage.

5071. However, you state that those who came home at 11 o'clock would think that a much more convenient hour than 10 for the public-houses to shut?—I suggest that it should be extended to that hour, because I think that it would be taking away an imaginary ground of opposition from a large class of persons, who, probably, would not oppose their being closed from five to eight.

5072. You have been asked whether those men are not very much more tired on the Monday, in consequence of going out on excursions on the Sunday, and I think that you stated that you always felt yourself more tired on Monday in consequence?—I consider that excursionists do the hardest work that can possibly be imagined, whether it is seeing pictures, or whether it is seeing fields, or whether it is going through galleries; no matter what it may be, I believe that it is the hardest work a man can possibly do.

5073. Do you not think it is very good for their lungs?—Probably it may be.

5074. Whatever opinion you may have with regard to beer and spirits, do you not think that fresh air is a most excellent thing for a man?—Undoubtedly it is.

5075. Do you think that he can get it in his own house on Sunday, or any other day?—Not in his own house. I do not think he can do that, because the homes of our working-men, in London, are miserable dwellings. I do not think that much fresh air is got in them; but we have great advantages in our parks, and in many other places where a man can walk and take his family to, where he can get fresh air; it may be sceptical, on my part, but where he would get as fresh as he would in many country districts.

5076. To a good many of our parks he would have a good long way to walk?—Yes.

5077. And he would be almost as much tired merely walking all day in the park as if he were taken into the country by the railway?—It depends entirely upon how he adopted the means. He might walk himself till he dropped down; he might walk leisurely and quietly, so that he might return home really refreshed from his walk. It all depends upon how he uses it.

5078. That he might do if he is taken out on a railway into the fresh air of the country?—Yes.

5079. But supposing he gets so tired that he is determined to take it out on the Sunday, walk to a tremendous extent?—Then certainly he overdoes it.

5080. If he did it in a moderate way, do you think that it would be a very great advantage that he should have an opportunity of taking those excursions on Sunday?—As to myself, I do not approve of them. I am not so great a Puritan about these things; and I should be very sorry to do or to say anything that I thought would restrict the advantages or liberties of fellow-workmen; but I speak from practical experience, and I believe that he can get quite much good in London as he can get out on Sunday during the hours of Sunday.

5081. Do not you think that change is necessary for persons?—Yes, and I should like all working men to have this change, by having labour on the week-days, and by having national holidays, whereby they might take advantage of this change of air; and that would do more credit to us than the Sunday excursion, and more advantage to the people.

5082. I believe that until very recently there were a certain number of persons in London who had never seen the sea?—Yes; and I have doubt that there are many still who have never seen it.

5083. But they are nothing like so many they were. And do not you think that it might enlarge a man's mind, when he goes down to the sea-side, and is amongst scenery that he has never had an opportunity of seeing before?—Undoubtedly. I do not think that any person, if he got anything like a thoughtful disposition, or kind of intelligence, can see any of those great works of nature, without being benefited by them. But there are times for all things, and all things should come in their times and seasons.

5084. Then your proposition would be that during the week there should be holidays aside for those recreations?—Yes.

5085. Then what would you propose that a working man should do on Sunday?—Rest himself, and read those books and works which would improve his mind; I think that Sunday naturally should be entirely a day of rest. I do not advocate this Bill on a religious principle at all, but on a moral and social principle; and I believe that Sunday is a day for rest, and that our recreation should come on other days.

5086. Still on Sunday he must eat and drink?—Decidedly.

5087. I suppose that rest would not do him much good if he had nothing to eat or drink?—Certainly not.

5088. Have you given your attention to the hours (taking the metropolis) during which the public-houses public-houses would be closed; that is to say, there would be three hours and a-half in the day during which a man might obtain liquor from the public-house and take it to his own home, and it is limited to that?—Yes.

5089. You are no doubt aware that besides the skilled artisans, there is another very numerous class in London, namely, lodgers who take all their meals out of their own lodgings?—Yes.

5090. Do you think that it would not be inconvenient to them?—It depends upon the hours in which they wanted to drink, because this Bill proposes that the public-houses shall open at half-past 12 and close at half-past two.

5091. At present they open at one in London and close at three?—Yes.

5092. That would remain precisely the same?—Yes.

5093. Then they are closed again by this Bill till eight?—Yes.

5094. At present they are closed till five?—Yes.

5095. A great many of those people would be wanting something, would they not, between those hours, say half-past two o'clock and eight o'clock, with their meals, and would not it be an inconvenience to them?—I should think that it ought not to be; it would not be the least to me or to many more working men that I know; if we drink as much as we want between one and half past two, that is an hour and a-half, and I think we could do very well without any stimulant drink till eight o'clock.

5096. Then you are presuming that that is the time that all take their dinner?—Yes, all working men.

5097. There is a certain class of persons, is there not, who do not dine at that hour?—Then of course they could have it in their own homes as they do now by bottle; there is bottled ale to be got almost as cheap as draught ale. There are many of them who get bottled ale, and prefer it, especially in the summer, because it keeps better, and I think on the whole bottled ale is more economical and cheaper at 3 d. a pint, which they would have to give if they got it draught.

5098. They could get a quart of draught beer for 4 d., could they not?—Yes.

5099. Then that reputed pint, which has a very bad reputation, would not certainly approach in quantity an Imperial quart of beer which you say would cost 5 d., and the other would cost 4 d., so that a man would be obliged by this Bill to pay the difference?—Yes, or he could buy it in his own bottle on the previous night. There are many ways of doing it, and which are resorted to by a large class.

5100. A man having to do all these things which probably he may not wish to do, causes an inconvenience to him?—Yes; but then the consideration is whether the individual inconvenience is not a great public good.

5101. That is the question, whether it is so or not; you say that without all these inconveniences being imposed upon people, the great bulk of the artisan class have left off drinking to a great extent?—I do not know that they have done it without that altogether; it is probable that those who were induced to leave off drinking on Sunday, or to drink less on Sunday, were induced to do so by the Act which is now in existence for closing the public-houses, and I have no doubt that very many would be induced to leave off to a great extent if there were further restriction.

5102. If all drink was abolished nobody could drink, but that is a thing which you would not advocate, would you?—No; you are quite aware that people say that we should never have any good measure without some people having their individual rights touched, and without, perhaps, some little inconveniences occurring to some few or other; but if we are to wait before any good measure is done, till no inconvenience is suffered by any one, we should have to wait a long time.

5103. Would you go to the extent of total closing?—At present I would not.

5104. Are you in favour of it eventually?—I should be in favour of the total closing of the public-houses on Sunday by and by.

5105. On all days in the week?—No not on all days in the week.

5106. Are you in favour of the Main Liquor Law?—No, I am not.

5107. Then you merely say that Sunday should be a day of rest, and therefore you would close the public-houses altogether on Sunday?—Not at present; but by the progress of intelligence and sobriety ultimately, I believe, they will be closed all day on Sunday.

5108. And you would desire that?—Yes.

5109. Have you really contemplated the inconvenience to which a vast number of people would be put if that were carried out; persons who do not commit excess; who can command themselves; who you know by their habits, do not get drunk or anything of the sort; do you think it would be a fair thing to all that class of men who really are reasonable men, that an Act of Parliament should be passed coercing them, and saying you shall not drink any liquor on Sunday?—It is not proposed to do that.

5110. If you carry out this you will close the public-houses altogether?—I am now giving my opinion upon the proposed Bill, not upon a Bill which might come seven years hence.

5111. But in a degree, although not to so great a degree, this Bill would act?—I believe this Bill will give to all who desire to drink as much time as they would require to drink on the Sunday.

5112. But they would not be able to drink on the premises at all on the Sunday under this Bill?—Just so.

5113. You do not think it necessary that they should?—No.

5114. Are there not a great many men in your association who do not entertain the same views that you do?—I have no doubt that there are some.

5115. I have heard that your secretary does not?—Very likely he does not. I think that he is rather in favour of drinking on Sunday. You will quite understand me that I admit that there are many men who are against the Bill, but I believe that the class to which I belong are in the majority in favour of the Bill. That is my decided opinion.

5116. Have you read the Bill?—I have read the Bill through.

5117. You have not given your consideration to the effect of the Bill in the country, I suppose?—I have given my consideration a good deal to that. I have been to see the people of nearly every large town in the country, and I have had large connections with the working men, and with the publicans in those towns.

Mr.
G. Potter.25 May

Mr.
G. Potter.

5118. Do you think that the publicans would wish it?—I believe that there are many publicans who wish it. I believe that there are many publicans who would be in favour of closing their houses of business all the Sunday, and I think it is possible that they will get up a movement in that direction. I have gathered that from Liverpool, Manchester, Bristol, Leeds, and many other places where I stay. I generally stop at a public-house when I go. I am not a total abstainer, I am a moderate drinker, and I stop generally at club-houses where our associations meet, and I have frequent intercourse with those publicans and licensed victuallers. Some of them, of course, are not in favour of the Bill, but there are very many who have come across my path who are in favour of the Bill.

5119. You do not think that you want this Bill yourself, as far as you are concerned?—I do not want it: decidedly not; because if all the public-houses in England were open all day on Sunday, I should never go in one.

5120. That is the case with a great many; you are not singular, I believe?—No, I am not; I am very pleased to say that there are thousands and tens of thousands of my own class who are of the same opinion.

5121. Do you think that you have sufficiently considered the case of those persons who really, not for the purpose of getting drunk, but for objects of necessity, require those places to be opened?—I believe those who would give their opinion in favour of the Bill, and who would not use the public-houses if they were opened, do it with the feeling that it would be beneficial to those who would use them. I think it is a good example which they would set and do set, and I believe that the restrictions which might be imposed upon them, perhaps against their will at first, would gradually grow to be liked by them, and would be admitted subsequently to have been advantageous to them.

5122. Is it not your experience that all men prefer being led to being driven?—Undoubtedly.

5123. Do not you think that this is rather a driving Bill?—To some extent it may be looked upon as such. All innovations are looked upon as driving matters.

5124. All innovations which interfere with a man's right to do as he pleases are driving Bills, are they not?—Yes. When you come to a distinct individual right, you come to a question which many of us would disagree about.

5125. You are aware that the first axiom of law is that a man is to use his own as he pleases, provided he does not hurt anybody else?—Just so; but the men who spend a great portion of their earnings in drink on Sundays hurt their families and injure society.

5126. And that is a good principle, is it not?—No doubt of it.

5127. This is not exactly the principle of this Bill, is it?—I believe it is a debatable point when we come to abstract right, what is good or injurious to others. I believe that there are many of those debatable points which will have to be settled by the example of those who wish to do away with them. I have no doubt at all but that in time it would have a great effect, and that we never should accomplish otherwise the good that this Bill would do.

5128. You think it is absolutely necessary that there should be this restriction?—I think that it would be decidedly advantageous and necessary for the good and prosperity of the community that it should be so.

5129. You are aware, are you not, how they treat these things in America?—Yes.

5130. They have not succeeded very well, have they?—They have not.

5131. You stated that this Bill was good for other classes besides the artisan class and labourers; to what class did you refer?—I referred to the class of publicans themselves and to their employées. I believe that it would be morally advantageous to them, and in the end I do not think that it would be pecuniarily disadvantageous to the publicans. I think it is the duty of us working men who desire to have our time of labour reduced, that we should have a sympathetic feeling with other employées, and that we should try and get them a day of rest or some hours of cessation from labour, and I believe that thousands and tens of thousands employed in public-houses would have that if this Bill were adopted, whereas now they have not.

5132. Do not you think that a Bill enabling them to close their public-houses on Sunday would be sufficient; you know that now a publican is bound to open his public-house, and to give refreshment, food or drink to any persons who choose to apply within the hours which are not prohibited?—I do not quite understand your question.

5133. A publican now cannot close his house; he is bound to keep it open; but if a publican were enabled, if he chose, to close his house on Sunday, do not you think that that would be sufficient to meet the views of the publicans at any rate?—I do not know whether it would meet them; I dare say it would; I cannot say how far it would meet the views of the trade.

5134. It would meet the views of any man who wished to shut up?—As to the publicans themselves, it might meet the views of some of them; but you know that it is a saying in business, no matter what business it may be, "That if we do not keep open, the others will take away our trade." I dare say that that is a feeling which has very great power with those publicans who would otherwise desire to have their houses closed on Sunday.

5135. We had a witness here the other day, who said that he always closed on Sunday, and that he sold more liquor in consequence during the week; therefore it would appear from that, that by closing at a particular time, the same quantity of liquor, or more, would be consumed?—Yes, it would seem so from that evidence, but I do not think so.

5136. Chairman.] But other publicans might not think so; although one man has found that by experience, you would not probably get the majority to believe that?—No, probably not.

5137. I suppose you would be sorry if the Legislature took a step too far in advance, and led to a revolution of opinion upon this subject?—I should be sorry to see any enactment, even for the suppression of the sale of liquor, that would be met by a revolution, or a movement of opposition which would be to a certain extent a revolution, against it. I would rather wait for a year or two than I would incur that; but I do not think that this Bill would be the means of provoking such a movement against it as that.

5138. Do you know that in the year 1854 there was a Bill passed which did not go so far as this Bill, but which led to so great an agitation that Parliament repealed it the next year?—I remember it quite well.

5139. Seeing that it is proposed in this Bill to go still further than Mr. Wilson Patten's Act, would not it perhaps be safer not to go quite so far yet?—I believe that we are very much improved in our estimation of the value of those measures now than what we were then. I think that the spread of intelligence and education has converted very many now in favour of measures who were then against them; so that I do not think it would have the same effect; but if it were to have the same effect, I decidedly prefer that it should be stopped for another year or two, till another Parliament, representing the people, would do what this Parliament probably is unwilling to do.

5140. Do you anticipate that a Parliament elected by a greater proportion of the working classes would be more ready to pass restrictive measures?—I believe that they would be more in favour of adopting those measures for the general good of the labouring classes than this Parliament is.

5141. Supposing that, instead of passing a Bill to prevent all drinking on the premises on Sunday, as this Bill virtually does, you were to pass one to limit the drinking on or off the premises to the hours named in this Bill, should you think that so small a step as that was worth having?—I believe that it would be a very great step in advance.

5142. You would think that well worth having?—Yes, decidedly. I should give my opinion in favour of that, rather than none at all.

5143. The hours during which the public-houses may be open being so long as they are now, enables a man to come in and remain, and drink more than he is inclined; whereas, if the time were shorter, and he had only time to get a glass or two, he would not be so likely to drink to excess; that is so, is it not?—Yes, I think so. You understand that I should not be inclined to have the Bill thrown up, if the promoters thought best to add that people should drink on the premises during the four hours which the public-houses should be open. I would rather accept that myself than lose the Bill.

5144. We quite understand that you are for thorough measures?—Yes, I am for thorough measures.

5145. When you speak about national holidays, I presume that you do not mean that they are to be holidays during which the masters should be compelled to pay their men, although they do not do any work?—Decidedly not.

5146. Do you mean that there should be days on which no work should be done?—Yes, and that a man should lose his time. But then I should anticipate that before those things are adopted a man will have more money for his labour, in order that he may be able to afford to lose his time. It would not do under our present system.

5147. Mr. Locke.] You consider that the wages must be raised to such an extent on other days as would meet the doing nothing on the holiday?—Yes; or a better reward for labour should be given so that the time could be deducted.

5148. And that a man could afford more holidays?—Yes, without impoverishing his home, I mean.

5149. Mr. Roebuck.] I suppose you have a very high opinion, have you not, of the intelligence of the working classes?—I have of some portions of them, I am very pleased to say, and I admire their intelligence.

5150. And the other class are without intelligence?—As regards the other class I admire the intelligence which they display; I never advance my own class to the detriment of other classes of society.

5151. I am talking of the working classes; you say that there are a certain class of the working people who are intelligent; but I want to know now whether you think that the whole of that body are intelligent?—I believe that intelligence has lately advanced among the whole body of them.

5152. Are they a very intelligent class?—No, not altogether; I do not believe that they are an intelligent class as a whole.

5153. Do you believe that there is a large body, or a body of the working classes, who cannot take care of themselves, and that the law ought to step in and take care of them?—I believe that there are large masses of working men who cannot, in respect to drink, be left to take care of themselves.

5154. But are those the persons that you would allow to take care of other people as legislators, they being those who elect the legislators?—No, I would not.

5155. am very glad to hear you say so; you know that some time ago there were riots in Hyde Park?—Yes.

5156. Were those riots effected by this intelligent class?—I do not believe they were.

5157. The riots were effected by the non-intelligent class?—I should like to understand what riots you refer to.

5158. The riots that last took place when they pulled down the palings in Hyde Park?—I do not look upon that as a riot; I look upon it as a blunder committed by the Government, which encouraged, or at least caused anger to a large class of people in this metropolis, and this blunder, on the part of the Government, was the cause of the railings being pushed down.

5159. Never mind who was the cause of it; but the Government did not pull down the railings, did they?—No; nor was it the intelligent portion who pulled down the railings.

5160. You say that it was not the intelligent portion who pulled down the railings; are those the portion that you think ought to be coerced into good behaviour by this Bill?—I do not think they are.

5161. I want to ask you another question: you say that you have read the Bill, and I have no doubt you have very carefully; do you approve of the distinction made between London and the country in that Bill?—I think it is a necessary distinction, because London is a peculiar place, a place of itself, and of course it is difficult to class it with other large towns, because other large towns are comeatable by what I call general measures, but London is a special place, and probably requires, with regard to drinking and eating, special arrangements.

5162. Will you be kind enough to explain why that is; because to say that it is a special place, and requires special laws is one thing, but to say why it is or not is another; and I want you to say why?—I do not know that I have thought particularly about the special reasons; but one reason why is, that the multitude of the people living in a place like London cannot find the same conveniences niences as they can who live in small towns, for instance. Perhaps in London there might be seven or eight families in a house, but in provincial towns there might not be more than one or two.

5163. Are there not large masses of houses in other towns in which families crowd into the same house?—Yes, in Liverpool and Manchester, and other towns.

5164. Would not the same inconvenience occur in those places as you conceive would occur in London?—Inconveniences no doubt arise, but only, in my opinion, to a smaller extent.

5165. Would not those people be inconvenienced by a Bill like this?—I dare say some of them would, but if any good is worth having it is worth encountering some little inconvenience to attain.

5166. You recollect that in this instance the inconvenience is not felt by your class, because you say you are an intelligent class, and do not go to public-houses; but the inconvenience is felt by somebody else, whom you say you represent?—All this inconvenience might last for some little time, but they would make arrangements whereby it could be avoided; and I feel sure that they would see ultimately that it was advantageous to them, although it might be at first inconvenient.

5167. With your great knowledge of the working classes, will you tell me how it is that so many hundreds and thousands of them pretty nearly, I may say, have petitioned against this Bill?—I cannot tell you why, unless it is from the reason that they do not appreciate what it would do for them, and that the evils which they think it will do are more imaginary than real; or it may be that they are encouraged by the licensed victuallers to oppose the Bill.

5168. Do you not think, in your very wide observation, that it will lead to many other consequences than you now look at; would not it lead to coercing them a great deal more than you would like to coerce them?—They might think so; of course I am not in favour of coercion of any kind, but still I think that sometimes we are under obligations when we should take a stand upon certain questions, and neutrality on questions of such a kind I think would be both wrong and imprudent; I believe that the coercion which people would have to submit to would only be of small duration, and that they would find arrangements and conveniences which would, some few years hence, amply repay them for all the inconveniences that they might suffer.

5169. That being your opinion, you would take a step in advance in spite of hundreds of thousands of your fellow countrymen being opposed to that system of legislation?—My system of legislation is to try to adopt that which would be most beneficial to the majority.

5170. Without considering the opinions of the minority?—No; what I consider we ought to do is, in the most reasonable manner possible, to meet their wishes and their opposition.

5171. Do you believe enforcing your own opinion is the way to meet their wishes?—No, not my own opinion; but I should study the inconveniences which they have to endure; and I should consider how they could be obviated and lessened, and then, if I could show to them that in future it would be to their benefit and to their advantage, and to the advantage of the whole class to which they belonged, to do this,

I think I would be justified in saying that it should be done.

5172. But supposing they fancied that you did not show them this, though you believed in it, and that their opinion was contrary to yours at the end, what would you say then?—Then I would say, let us try it for a period.

5173. Then they might say, we do not want you to try it; therefore, you would have to act contrary to the opinion of the large body called the minority?—I do not know how you would get over that. Supposing a man were to rob your house, and when you were giving him in charge to a policeman he were to say, "I do not like to be given in charge to the policeman, I would rather not;" would you allow him to rob your house, and not give him in charge?

5174. Do you think that there is an appreciable minority in this country who wish to rob a house?—No; but I am merely taking an example of the limits of coercion, or of what men do not like.

5175. I studiously used the language a large minority, and you have now given me an instance of a very small minority of the people of England who want to rob houses; they are not analogous cases; how can you compare the condition of a burglar with the condition of a working man who wants to have a pot of beer in a public-house on Sunday?—I am not comparing the two at all. I have not drawn the comparison between the two with regard to the Act. I drew a comparison with regard to what you like to call coercion in reference to effecting a certain thing; but I say, that a man who says, "I will not be made sober, but will ruin my family; I will not be compelled to abstain from going to a public-house, but will persist in injuring society," if we shut the public-house he will be compelled to submit to it; and as to the man who robs a house, or any number of people who would rob, might say, "We do not want to be given in charge to a policeman;" but we say it is necessary for the protection of society that you should be checked in injuring others. I am not comparing the two with regard to the Act, but only comparing the two with respect to what possibly they would like to be done to them.

5176. I put to you the case of a large body of your fellow-countrymen, the minority, as you call them, who think that that species of legislation would be bad; but you say that nevertheless you would adopt it, because you think it right; to that proposition I brought you, and there I leave you?—I would adopt it, not simply because I think it right, but because I think that they would subsequently think it right, and that they would merely suffer a temporary inconvenience which would soon be replaced by a permanent good.

5177. Mr. Evans.] I think your experience has been very general over the country, but it has been principally with regard to London, has it not?—No, not principally with regard to London, but to the country also.

5178. Have you resided a great deal in London?—I reside in London, but I make frequently provincial tours to the large towns.

5179. Do you think that there are a very large number of persons in London who are in the habit of taking their meals, or some of their meals, at public-houses?—They do at coffee-shops. I do not think they take their meals at public-houses so much on Sunday. I think it is not not usual, as far as my experience and observation go; it is generally eating-houses, or coffee-shops, where they dine on Sunday.

5180. You mentioned that in your opinion the number of persons who went out on excursions on Sunday came back excessively tired; I suppose that arises from what is the case, perhaps, with a good many of us, that when we get a holiday we like to make the utmost possible of it, and therefore we sometimes overdo ourselves?—There is no doubt that there is a great deal of zest given to it, and that it is overdone.

5181. Speaking of myself, when I am particularly busy, if I get a day's holiday, I sometimes find that I tire myself a good deal in trying to avail myself of the whole of it, and I suppose other people do the same?—Then in order to obviate that, I would have more general holidays on week days and let them have a regularly good day's holiday, and carry all that zest into it which they possess, and then they might keep Sunday for a day of rest; that is what I desire to see.

5182. You think that the best plan would be that the Sunday should be used generally as a day of rest, and that other holidays should be used as days on which people might amuse themselves mentally and bodily?—Yes; for instance, all the museums should be thrown open in the evening.

5183. Mr. Locke.] Would you be in favour of having museums thrown open upon Sunday?—I would be in favour of having museums thrown open upon week day evenings or Saturday afternoons, but not on Sunday, because I think it would tend physically to depress the working-men. I desire that they should have Sunday as a day of rest and recreation, as far as they can do it, without physically prostrating their poor bodies, which have been previously exhausted by hard work, and I would like to see all our national museums and other places open on week-day evenings and Saturday afternoons; and I should like more week-day holidays, in order that Sunday might be enjoyed as a day of rest.

5184. A man would not be very comfortable, would he, if he were merely sitting still in a chair on Sunday; would not that be very irksome to them?—It is not necessary that he should do so. He could have rest without sitting in a chair all day.

5185. Mr. Hibbert.] Would there not be less Sunday drinking if wages were paid earlier than they are now in London?—Wages, you are aware, are paid now much earlier than they were formerly.

5186. Are they not paid in London to a great extent on Saturday evening?—In some trades; but in the trade to which I belong, the building trade, wages are paid at one o'clock on Saturday afternoon, but there are many other trades which still pay late, and I believe that to be very detrimental to the working men.

5187. Would not it be even still more desirable if the wages were paid on Friday night?—I should like to see wages paid on Friday evening.

5188. I suppose you are aware that that is done in some parts of Lancashire?—Yes, and I believe with great benefit to those who adopt that plan.

5189. Would not it also be a great advantage to the working classes and conduce to their having the Sunday as a day of rest, if the Saturday half holiday were carried out further?—Yes, I should like very much to see it. I believe it would be very advantageous to the country at large.

5190. Do you remember the time when Mr. Wilson Patten's Act was in operation, in the year 1854?—Yes.

5191. Can you call to mind in connection with it, that there was great opposition raised to it in London?—Yes, I remember there was a great deal of opposition and some disturbances.

5192. Is it not the fact that those disturbances were principally against Lord Ebury's Bill?—I believe they were.

5193. And more so than against Mr. Wilson Patten's Act?—Yes.

5194. It has often been stated that the excitement in Hyde Park was against Mr. Wilson Patten's Bill, but was it not the fact that it was got up against the Sunday Trading Bill?—Yes, the two coming together, the opponents of any Bill that might now be suggested might use that disturbance that took place at that time as being against Mr. Wilson Patten's Act, but I think it was mostly against Lord Ebury's Bill. I believe the great opposition was to that measure.

5195. Do you remember what the feeling of the working classes was at that time with respect to Mr. Wilson Patten's Act?—I do not exactly remember; not to call to memory what were the general opinions of working men upon that Act. I did not take, at that time, so active a part in working-class questions as I have done since 1858.

5196. You think now that people would not act in the same way with respect to restrictions as they did at that time?—I think not. I think that with their intelligence, and their thoughtfulness, and their providential habits, and the progress in all directions which they have made, they would bring less opposition to the measure than formerly. I do not think that such an opposition could now be got up.

5197. Are you aware what the hours were, under Mr. Wilson Patten's Act, during which the public-houses were open?—I do not remember.

5198. They were open in the middle of the day for two hours and a-half, and in the evening from six to ten, both for consumption of liquor on the premises and for sale off the premises; do you think that a similar proposal would be satisfactory at the present time, taking into view all the difficulties in carrying out such a Bill as that before the Committee?—No doubt it would meet with approbation by very many, but it would not be so satisfactory.

5199. From what you said about the difficulties in London, that we must deal with London differently from the provinces on account, for one thing, of the house accommodation being so limited, and the large number of families who are compelled to live in one house, would not it be rather a hardship to close public-houses entirely for the consumption of liquor on the premises in London?—It may be to some extent a hardship to a large class of persons.

5200. Perhaps more so in London than in the country?—I dare say it would be more in London than in the provinces.

5201. Having that in view, and knowing the great discomforts of the houses of many of the poor, do not you think that it would be better, instead of going quite so far as this Bill, to allow the houses to be open for a certain number of hours for consumption on the premises?—I have already expressed my opinion that I should rather have that than no Bill at all; and if the promoters were to adopt that, it would still have my great appreciation, and if the Bill you suggest could be done more satisfactorily than the other, I would rather wait for the adoption of the present Bill another few years, but it must entirely depend upon the opinions and experience of others who can speak more definitely; but I would rather have the Bill which you suggest than that the present Act should remain in force, because I think it would be an advance in the right direction, and would be a great good.
have

ROBERT STIRLING NEWALL, Esq., called in; and Examined.

R. S. Newall,
Esq.

5202. Mr. John Abel Smith.] You are Mayor of Gateshead, are you not?—I am.

5203. Which is one of the largest and most important commercial towns in the north of England?—Yes, in the county of Durham.

5204. Do you know what the population is now?—It is about 45,000, and it is increasing very rapidly.

5205. Are you, as Mayor of Gateshead, able to speak at all as to the effect of Sunday drinking in Gateshead?—As mayor, and sitting on the Bench at the police-court, I have cases constantly brought before me, and since the 9th of November, when I was elected, we have had altogether 495 cases before the court. The court is held twice a-week, on Tuesdays and Fridays, and of those, 237 cases had arisen entirely from drunkenness, 22 have been cases of drunkenness and assault, 7 of felony through drunkenness, 135 cases of assault only, and 94 cases of felony. I cannot state, because I have not had an opportunity of dividing the cases arising from Sunday drinking from those on the other days in the week; but my opinion is that a great number arise from Sunday drinking.

5206. Have you a considerably greater number before you on the Tuesday morning than on the Friday morning?—We have.

5207. There has been no public meeting, has there, on the subject of Sunday drinking?—There has been no public meeting held in Gateshead or Newcastle, I think.

5208. But you are cognizant, are you not, of the feeling of your brother magistrates and the people of Gateshead generally?—I am. I think the opinion is in favour of restricting the hours rather than of total closing at present, certainly the feeling is very much in favour of restricting the hours.

5209. Are you talking now of the magistrates or the working men, or both?—Of both the magistrates and the working men, those with whom I come in contact.

5210. You know the existing state of the law, and you have probably read the Bill which has been referred to this Committee?—Yes, I have.

5211. Are you in favour of the increased restriction contained in that Bill?—I am.

5212. Do you think that the principle of restriction has been useful hitherto?—Yes, I think it has; I think that there is less drinking now than there was some 10 or 15 years ago.

5213. And you think that it might be carried further now, beneficially, to the moral and social condition of the working men?—I do think so.

5214. As head of the local magistracy of Gateshead, should you apprehend any public disorder, or confusion or resistance to the law, if such a Bill as this were to be made law?—I do not anticipate any resistance at all; I think the cases that are brought before us of drunkenness arise, generally, amongst the very lowest class of working men, men who are habitual drunkards; they are not what I would call the skilled labourers or mechanics; not such as I would employ in my own works, but they are amongst the lowest class.

5215. Did you, as mayor of Gateshead, sign the address to Lord Derby, asking for the Government support to this Bill?—I did; and that was done after consulting those who sit on the bench of the police court with me.

5216. Therefore, you occupying an important position in the eye of your fellow-citizens, have given your testimony in favour of the provisions of the Bill, and express your conviction that it would be accepted, if not with approbation, with contentment and quiet by the population?—I do.

5217. Colonel Fane.] You have stated that you have rather a preference for further restriction than total closing?—Yes.

5218. How far are you prepared to go in that way?—I think two hours in the middle of the day are quite sufficient, and in the evening two hours also are quite sufficient.

5219. You have also said that there has been a great deal less drinking than there used to be during the last 10 or 15 years?—Yes; I think that arises from the improved education of the working people.

5220. You do not attribute it altogether to the partial restriction which has hitherto been carried out; you put it down, to a very considerable extent, to the better education and the better feeling, generally, of the working classes?—Yes, but I think that restriction also has had a good effect; I cannot see the advantage of allowing a public-house to be open longer than a few hours in the day.

5221. But you are not for closing it altogether?—I think not immediately, but I hope it will come very soon.

5222. Mr. John Abel Smith.] Do you know any principle upon which a public-house is left open, while almost every other trade is closed?—No, it appears very unjust that I should be restricted from carrying on my business on Sunday and am liable to be fined if I do so, and those who sell tea and coffee are also prohibited from selling tea and coffee, and I think it is an injustice to them that publicans and beer-house keepers are allowed to carry on their trade; I think that they have got an advantage which they ought not to possess over other traders.

5223. What especial trade do you carry on there yourself?—I am a submarine cable and wire-rope manufacturer.

5224. Do you employ a great many men?—About 150 men.

5225. Are they very highly-skilled men?—There was not a single man of those I employ who knew anything of the business when they began; I selected those who were sober men and handy workmen, and I have taught them the business.

5226. Do you find much drunkenness amongst them?

them?—Very few cases indeed; we pay our wages on Friday afternoon for the week ending on the Thursday. Our men work 60 hours a-week, and they close on Saturday at two o'clock, therefore if they were inclined to go to the public-houses, one would suppose that having a fortnight's wages in hand they would indulge in it; but they do not; we find our workmen very steady indeed, and I am very seldom troubled with the case of one of my men being drunk.

5227. Upon what principle do you think that those men would be in favour of such a Bill as is now before the Committee?—I think almost without exception, every man would be in favour of restricting the opening of public-houses on the principle that there is no necessity for it.

5228. Mr. Hibbert.] You stated that you would prefer the restriction to total closing; do you mean closing altogether for sale, both on and off the premises, or according to this Bill?—I mean total closing.

5229. Mr. Locke.] You say that there is no necessity for it; if there were no necessity for it, nobody would go to the public-house, I suppose?—No, none of my workmen would go there, I think.

5230. You do not want to close it for those people?—No, not for them.

5231. Then who is it you wish to close it for?—Those who habitually frequent the public-house on Sunday.

5232. Besides those who habitually go to the public-house on Sunday, there are other persons who only go there for what they really want, are there not?—Yes, that may be so.

5233. It would be an inconvenience to them, would it not, if they could not do so?—It would.

5234. You say that you ought to be allowed to carry on your own business just as much as licensed victuallers on Sunday?—I think so.

5235. Do you think that there is the slightest analogy between marine cables and victuals and drink?—I think there is in one respect; at least, I hope there is, that we both make a profit.

5236. But a man does not want to get a marine cable on a Sunday, whereas he does want to get some beer, and he does want to get something to eat?—I was asked, only two days ago, to work on Sunday, to make a cable, and I declined; and the person who wanted that, probably, would be inconvenienced by my refusing just as the frequenter of a public-house would be inconvenienced if he was refused a pot of beer.

5237. It is absolutely necessary to a man to eat and drink, because if he did not he would die?—It is not necessary for him to drink beer on Sunday.

5238. Why not?—Because he can live without it.

5239. He can live without it; but do you live without either beer or wine on Sunday?—I do not; but I buy mine on Saturday; at least, I do not buy it on Sunday.

5240. But you drink it on Sunday?—Yes, I drink it on Sunday.

5241. Of course, you have got a house, and keep your wine and beer, and so forth, and it is no inconvenience to you. You never, I dare say, go into a public-house at all?—I cannot conceive any difficulty in a workman doing the same, and buying what they want on Saturday. They buy their beef and their fish on Saturday; and I do not see why they should not buy their beer as well as their tea and coffee. R.S. Newall, Esq.

5242. Tea and coffee are quite different, because tea and coffee you make when you want it, but you do not make beer when you want it?—No, but you can buy it in bottle.

5243. You can do a great many things, but do you think it is a good thing to pass a law to compel people to do all those things, to buy their beer in bottle, and so on; and if so, where would you stop; would you go on and legislate for everything; would you legislate as to what sort of shoes they should make?—No, I would not.

5244. What is to prevent you?—I do not think that that is at all likely.

5245. Do you think it a good thing to be legislating upon all those trumpery things?—If you cannot prevent Sunday drinking otherwise, I think it a good thing to impose restriction.

5246. Do you think it would prevent Sunday drinking?—Yes, I think it would.

5247. You do not mean to prevent a man drinking if he has it in bottle at home?—I could not; even that slight difficulty, if it be a difficulty, of a workman having to keep his beer in bottle in his house, would be preferable to his going to a public-house.

5248. But it would not prevent him getting drunk at home if he liked?—I think it probably would.

5249. Have you never heard of a man getting drunk at home?—Yes, I have heard of such cases.

5250. When people sit at home in their houses and get drunk, is not that the very worst class of drunkenness?—I do not know; I have seen very bad cases from a public-house.

5251. Such a man becomes a sort of unenlivened mass by drinking?—Yes.

5252. There are a great many of those sort of people, and you could not prevent their drinking unless you have a Maine Liquor Law; and then you would not prevent it, because it has not succeeded where it has been tried?—We find that there are means of evading the law; we have had one or two cases in Gateshead that you would not probably have thought of. There was a barber's shop, which on Sunday morning kept open throughout the hours of divine service, and it was very much frequented, and we could not account for it. We found people going there, and in addition to being shaved they had their glass of beer.

5253. And yet the public-houses were closed?—Yes; but we have stopped that now by closing the barber's shop.

5254. You have closed pretty well everything, have you not?—Yes, we have done our best in Gateshead to do that; I am glad to say that I have received the thanks of a great many of the inhabitants for doing it.

5255. Yours is not merely an early closing place; you close early and late; what else have you closed besides the barber's shop?—We have closed anything else that infringes the law.

5256. Gateshead is a strict place, then?—In some points it is.

5257. Are there many drunken people there?—There were about 237 cases in about six months.

5258. What description of cases were they?—People pulled up for drunkenness.

5259. And fined 5 s.?—Yes.

5260. Mr. John Abel Smith.] Some were cases

R.S. Newall, Esq.
25 May
1868.

R. S. Newall, of drunkenness with violence?—Yes; there were
Esq. 22 cases of drunkenness and assault.

1868.

5261. Mr. Locke.] What is the population of Gateshead?—About 45,000, and many of those cases have been brought before us several times.

5262. Those were habitual drunkards?—Yes.

5263. You would have those cases under any circumstances, would you not, whether you made any laws or not?—I think not, if they could not get to the public-house.

5264. Those were all persons who were convicted?—Yes, they were convicted.

5265. And they were punished for it?—Yes.

5266. You stated, did you not, that you would have public-houses open four hours on Sunday?—That is the proposal in this present Bill.

5267. Would you have them open for consumption both on and off the premises?—I think it would be better if they were closed against consumption on the premises; that is my experience.

5268. If you close them you must have the door open for persons to go in and get beer to take it off the premises?—Yes.

5269. In the case of people going in, and getting those articles to be taken off the premises, do not you think it might be an inducement for them to drink on the premises?—They would be tempted, certainly, and therefore that is an argument in favour of total closing.

5270. And likewise an argument in favour of allowing them to drink it during that time on the premises, is it not?—Yes.

5271. At Gateshead you seem to close everything, as I said before, and therefore you always adduce arguments in favour of closing. I suppose there is nothing open at all at Gateshead on Sunday?—Yes, there is.

5272. I suppose the churches and chapels are open?—Yes.

5273. Anything else?—There is a pleasure ground opened lately.

5274. What time is it closed; I suppose it is closed early?—I cannot tell the hour now, it is kept open I think until 10 o'clock at night.

5275. Are there any amusements in that place for the people?—It has only been lately opened. I have not been in it on Sunday to see what is going on.

5276. Do you think that it is a good thing to have places of that sort open on Sunday?—I think it is; I think if the museums were open on Sunday, if the Crystal Palace were open, it would be a great blessing for the people of London, and if we had museums in the country open in the same way, it would be a great blessing to the people there.

5277. Do not you think that it would prevent people going and standing at the bar of public-houses and drinking if they had something really to enliven them and something to look at?—It would prevent a good many from going to a public-house, I have no doubt.

5278. Do not you think that it would be a better thing to try that, than to try those laws which a great many people would consider extremely harsh and very interfering?—I should like to see both tried.

5279. Which should you try first; would you not try the soothing system before you tried the strong dose?—No, I think the other is necessary. I think the restriction of public-houses is necessary and advisable.

5280. And you think the other likewise necessary and advisable?—Yes, I think so.

5281. You have not probably given it your consideration as to which you would begin with?—No, I have not.

5282. Mr. Roebuck.] You say that you had 237 cases of persons convicted of drunkenness in six months in a population of 45,000; do not you think that a very small number?—It may be a small number; but still I think the number could be lessened.

5283. Do you, as a careful magistrate, think that by any human legislation you can reduce the per-centage of drunkenness below that?—I conscientiously do think so.

5284. What reason have you for thinking that?—Because those who are brought before us at the police-court are men who going into one public-house get half-drunk, and then they go into another and get wholly drunk, and I think that if those public-houses were not open so long they would not have so much opportunity, and therefore the number of cases would be lessened.

5285. Those are habitual drunkards, are they not?—Many of them are.

5286. Do you not think that an habitual drunkard would find means of getting his liquor on Sunday, whether you shut up the public-house or not?—I doubt it.

5287. Have you ever had any long intercourse with a regular drunkard; have you ever known him during his life, or six months of his life?—I am happy to say I have not.

5288. Do you think you know anything of his habits?—He tries to get drink as often as he possibly can.

5289. Do you think that you know anything of his habits, so as to give the Legislature advice concerning him?—I only judge from the fact that I see a man brought before me time after time for being drunk.

5290. I want to know whether seeing a man drunk enables you to tell us how to prevent him getting drunk; if I see a man reeling in the street I should say that he is drunk, but I do not know how I can prevent him; supposing he is a man who is habituated to drink, do not you think he would get it?—He would take means to get it; but not if you put difficulties in the way.

5291. If you put difficulties in the way he will do all he can to get out of the difficulties, and perhaps he will conquer them?—He may succeed or he may not succeed.

5292. Do you think it worth while for that small benefit of reducing the per-centage in some small degree to take a step like this, which would create a great deal of inconvenience?—I do not see the great inconvenience that it would create.

5293. Then you would take that step in spite of this small benefit which you expect from it, though there are other means in your power which you acknowledge to be efficient?—I would take the step because I think it would be no great inconvenience to those who require to go to public-houses to obtain beer for their dinner or supper.

5294. That is to say, what is not inconvenient to yourself you think is inconvenient to nobody?—No, that is not what I state or what I wish to convey to the Committee. I am giving you my experience since I have been in the position which I now occupy.

5295. You

5295. You have told me that your experience does not go to the habits of drunkards, and I ask you whether you can tell us whether a prohibitive law of this sort would prevent an habitual drunkard from getting drunk?—I think it would throw a difficulty in his way, and might tend to do good.

5296. You are very fond of throwing small difficulties, so to speak, in a man's way, which could prevent his attaining his end; do not you think there would be the illicit drinking which you spoke of as taking place in the barbers' shops; do not you think that there would be a great many more barbers' shops attempted, and such barbers' shops as would escape your magisterial eye?—They might be attempted; they are under the care of the police; it is not my eye that detects them; it was the chief constable who brought this case before me; I only gave that as an instance of one of the methods adopted for evading the law.

5297. Do not you think that there would be attempts made to evade this restrictive law?—No doubt there would be.

5298. Mr. Evans.] I suppose when cases of drunkenness are brought before you, you have the means of ascertaining, and do ascertain, under what circumstances the person got drunk?—I have tried as much as possible, before I was aware of this Bill, to ascertain how they have got drunk, but it is extremely difficult; they will not confess. In the cases of public-house keepers that have been brought before us during six months we have had three convicted of infringing the law by selling during the restricted hours, and they have been fined; and I have put the question to them whether they would wish to close the public-houses entirely on Sunday or to keep them open, and the three men answered that they would rather see them entirely closed on Sunday. We have had 10 beer-shop keepers convicted during the same time. I have not put the question so much to them, but still I think they are in favour of closing also.

5299. You think that they would be in favour of closing the public-houses, as far as this Bill provides, if everybody were obliged to close?—That is not the question which I put to them. I simply put the question to them on their own account, and they said they would rather close entirely on Sunday than keep open.

5300. Mr. John Abel Smith.] The orders to the police, I suppose, are not to take up every drunken man that they find in the streets, if the man is able to take care of himself?—No, it is only those who are incapable of taking care of themselves.

5301. Therefore the number that you have given, 237, in six months, does not represent the entire number of drunken people in Gateshead?—No, not by any means.

5302. It only represents the cases of drunk and incapable, and of drunkenness with violence?—Yes.

5303. Mr. Roebuck.] It only represents the persons convicted?—Yes, merely the persons convicted.

5304. Mr. Locke.] I suppose that, on the whole, you would consider Gateshead a sober place?—I think it is so, considering the enormous number of workmen who are engaged in iron works and chemical works, and other places of that sort, which are notoriously thirsty employments.

MR. SAMUEL ELIOTT, called in; and Examined.

5305. Chairman.] You are a Timber Merchant, residing in Plymouth, are you not?—Yes.

5306. Mr. John Abel Smith.] You are a town councillor at Plymouth?—I am.

5307. And a guardian of the poor?—Yes.

5308. And a Member of the Chamber of Commerce there?—Yes, and a Member of the Chamber of Agriculture.

5309. Is there also an association of the working classes with which you are connected?—Yes, I have been connected with those associations since their commencement.

5310. Have you paid a good deal of attention to the state of the labouring men in your town, and in that part of England?—I have.

5311. Do you believe that Sunday drinking is prejudicial to the social and moral improvement of the people?—I do.

5312. Do you believe that the restrictive laws now in operation have been useful in diminishing drunkenness?—They are considered to have been so to some extent.

5313. Are you in favour of total closing, or only of a still further extension of restriction?—I should prefer total closing on the Sunday.

5314. What do you believe to be the feeling of the more respectable of the working men of Plymouth and the neighbourhood with regard to the increase of restrictions on Sunday drinking?—The working classes, generally, are in favour of increased restriction.

5315. Why?—They feel that they are injured in various ways by the present system.

5316. There has been a public meeting held in Plymouth, has there not, on this subject?—There was one called by the mayor.

5317. How was that attended?—It was in the Guildhall, which is not a very large building, but it was crammed.

5318. What was the resolution or the feeling of that meeting?—There was a difference of opinion, but the large majority were in favour of total closing.

5319. How many persons do you suppose attended that meeting?—From 300 to 500.

5320. What is the population of Plymouth?—About 65,000; it is the Guildhall where all such meetings are held.

5321. Was that meeting as full as the room could hold?—Yes, a great number could not get in.

5322. Has there been any other meeting?—There has been a meeting since.

5323. When was that?—It was called for the same purpose, but not called by the mayor.

5324. But by friends of temperance?—I suppose it might be said to be so to a certain extent, but the public generally were invited.

5325. Was it held in the same place?—No, it was held in another public building; the Temperance hall, which would hold a large number of people.

Mr.
S. Elliott.

1868.

5326. Was it pretty well attended?—It was tolerably well attended, but not crowded.

5327. You have seen, probably, during the last few years, a very great improvement in the working classes, with respect to their drinking habits?—There has been a considerable gradual improvement.

5328. To what do you attribute that?—To various causes; to the altered habits of the people to a great extent; they are more temperate a great deal, and better educated than they were.

5329. Do you think that some legislation in the direction of the Bill referred to this Committee would tend to their more rapid improvement?—I think so myself, and that being the case, I should be inclined to support it.

5330. You believe that that is a very respectable feeling, which ought to be encouraged by the Legislature?—Quite so.

5331. Do you know anything of the county of Cornwall?—I do. I am a Cornishman, and am connected with it in business.

5332. What do you think is the feeling of the working men in Cornwall?—The feeling there is much stronger than it is in Plymouth, in favour of restriction.

5333. Are the miners and others there in favour of restriction?—Yes.

5334. Has there been any canvass at Plymouth?—There has not.

5335. Was the question of a canvass discussed in the town council?—No, it was not. The question of petitioning the House of Commons came before the town council, but the mayor and many of the councillors had previously signed a petition in favour of the Bill referred to this Committee, and it was on that ground that the council took no action.

5336. Have you any idea that if such a Bill as that before this Committee became the law, it would be met by any resistance, or public disorder, or violence in any way?—I should think not; it is too much in accordance with public opinion to be resisted.

5337. Generally, you come here to express a decided opinion as to the feeling in favour of legislation of this kind in the district to which you belong, and your conviction that it would be contentedly if not willingly accepted by the population?—I have no doubt that there would be objectors; but still, as a whole, it would be cheerfully accepted.

5338. Are there any publicans that you know who close on Sunday in Plymouth now?—There are some, but the bulk of them keep their houses open.

5339. Do you not believe that if those houses were closed there would be a large amount of weekly wages devoted to the clothing and food of families, if such legislation as this took place?—I have no doubt of it.

5340. And that, therefore, it would be a great social and moral benefit?—I believe it would.

5341. Do you believe that the inconveniences produced by such legislation are to be compared to the good which it would produce?—I think they would be very small compared with the great advantage that would be derived to the community generally.

5342. Mr. Bright.] Is there any means of knowing the sentiments of the licensed victuallers or of the beer-house keepers on this question in Plymouth?—I do not think that any steps have been taken to ascertain their opinion; my own impression is that, generally speaking, they are opposed to the Bill.

5343. Have you had any opportunity of conversation with any of those who have been in the habit of closing their houses on Sunday?—I have not.

5344. If there are any arguments against general employment and the carrying on of trades on the Sunday as regards the comfort and rest of families, and the advantages which men derive from the Sunday, are they not equally strong with regard to the licensed victuallers and beer-sellers?—I should think they were much stronger.

5345. Why should you think that they were much stronger?—Because other kinds of business may be said to be, to a considerable extent, useful, but these would be, to a large extent, employed for bad purposes.

5346. But as far as regards the supply of what may be called needful refreshments, of course it would be held to be just as innocent as any other trade?—Quite so.

5347. But, speaking of it as the supply of drink merely, or an object of sensual indulgence, there are additional reasons why it should be restricted?—Quite so.

5348. But is there any reason to believe that amongst the licensed victuallers and beer-sellers there are a fair minority of them who would regard a general closing or a general further restriction without disapprobation, knowing that their families would gain from it?—I have no doubt that the respectable portion would be glad of it.

5349. In supporting the general objects of this Bill (I am not speaking of its exact details), do you consider yourself advocating what is equally good for the persons on whom restriction is to be placed, as it is or would be to the general public, and especially to the working classes?—I have no doubt it would be for the benefit of those engaged in the business; and it is not only the parties who now immediately suffer, but the rate-payers generally whose interests are largely involved in the subject.

5350. The interest which the ratepayer has in it, arises from your idea that the open sale of these things on Sunday promotes drunkenness, and idleness and crime. I presume that is the argument which you adduce?—That is the ground.

5351. Mr. John Abel Smith.] Have you any doubt that a very large proportion of the poverty in every town is produced by drunkenness?—I have no doubt that it is.

5352. Mr. Baines.] Have you ever been engaged in Sunday school teaching?—Not absolutely. I am connected with a Sunday school, being the partial superintendent of one.

5353. Do you happen to know the opinions of Sunday school teachers as to the effects of opening public-houses on Sunday on the children attending those schools?—The school which I am connected with is an adult Sunday school, but I know enough of the teachers in Sunday schools in our neighbourhood to know that the children suffer very seriously from the opening of public-houses on Sundays. I have heard them say so.

5354. Therefore the teachers are of opinion that it would be a great benefit and assistance to them in prosecuting their benevolent work, if they were closed?—I know that to be their opinion.

5355. Have

Mr.
S. Elliott.

25 May
1868.

5355. Have you any town missionaries in Plymouth who visit the lower classes especially?—Yes, we have.

5356. Do you happen to have heard what the opinion of those town missionaries is as to the effects which would be produced upon the classes whom they specially visit for their moral and spiritual good from the closing of public-houses?—I do not know their opinions upon this special point of Sunday closing.

5357. Do you know anything of the opinion of the ministers of religion upon this subject?—Yes, do.

5358. May I ask what those opinions are upon this subject?—Their opinions generally are either in favour of entire closing on Sunday, or of partial closing.

5359. By partial closing, do you mean the present Bill?—Yes.

5360. Mr. John Abel Smith.] Do you know anything of the feelings or opinions of other employers of labour in Plymouth?—I think the employers of labour, and the middle classes generally in Plymouth, would be in favour of the present Bill, and the persons whom they employ are in favour of total restriction.

5361. Mr. Bright.] The present Bill, meaning this Bill before the Committee?—Yes.

5362. Mr. Locke.] Plymouth is a large port, is it not?—Yes.

5363. Have you give any consideration to the number of those persons who are on board ship on Sunday?—Not more than to any other particular class.

5364. Would they want places to go and take their meals and have something to drink on Sunday, such as public-houses?—They are often on shore on Sunday.

5365. And they require a place to go and get their meals, do they not?—They would do so, I resume.

5366. Would not it be a great inconvenience to them in a place like Plymouth if the public-houses were shut up?—I have no doubt it would be an inconvenience to many of them.

5367. How many thousands of that description of men are there at Plymouth always; have you ever made the calculation?—No, I have not made the calculation; but thousands would be rather a large term to use; hundreds would be more like the number of those who happen to be on shore.

5368. However many men there may be, if they do not come on shore every Sunday, they make it by turns, I suppose?—I believe they have some such arrangement.

5369. How many men do you suppose there are in the port in the different ships?—I cannot offer an opinion.

5370. How many men have you in your employ?—Fifty or sixty.

5371. They bear no comparison whatever, do they, to the number of sailors in the port?—No.

5372. However, you have not given any consideration to the sailors?—Not specially.

5373. Have you at all?—As affecting the general interests of the town; we know they are to a large extent a great nuisance in the town, and when they do arrive they find that the public-houses are open for them.

5374. Plymouth would not be very much without them, would it?—They keep up the commerce of the town.

0.69.

5375. They do not come merely on Sunday, do they?—No, not merely on Sunday.

5376. Would you close the public-houses all the week?—If the public wish it I should.

5377. You would not take them into consideration as part of the public?—Yes; I should take the whole public.

5378. The whole nation?—Yes; the whole nation, each particular locality.

5379. There would be a minority, would there, not?—There would be.

5380. What is to become of them?—If the practices of the minority are a nuisance to the majority, the majority must have the rule.

5381. You think so?—Yes.

5382. In everything?—Yes; in everything where the practices of the minority are a nuisance to the majority.

5383. What do you call a nuisance?—That which the majority consider injurious to them.

5384. Then you think that the majority have a right to bind the minority?—Yes.

5385. You think that is the usual way of doing things?—I think it is the right way of doing things.

5386. Chairman.] Supposing the majority disliked smoking, and the minority did not; there are towns in Europe where smoking in the streets is forbidden; do you consider that oppressive to the minority?—The streets would be different; in a railway carriage I think the minority have to give way to the majority.

5387. Supposing the majority considered that it was an extreme nuisance to them, and that the authorities were to say, as in St. Petersburg, that they would have no smoking in the streets, what would you say to that?—There they have a despotic government, but I am alluding to this country, where people are bound by the will of the majority.

5388. Although the law was made by the majority, instead of by an individual, would it not be despotic?—I think in all cases the minority must bow to the majority.

5389. We know what objects you desire to serve by advocating such a measure as this; do you think that they would be served to a greater extent, supposing the houses were restricted to the number proposed in this Bill, but that during those hours liquor might be sold for consumption either on or off the premises?—I have no doubt it would be better than the present state of things if we were to break the chain in the drinking habits of those who are abandoned to drink.

5390. You would look upon it as a considerable step in the direction which you desire?—I should.

5391. I suppose you would regret very much if Parliament, by a step somewhat too far in advance, produced a revulsion of opinion?—Quite so.

5392. You are no doubt aware that the Act passed in 1854 was so unpopular, and was so much complained of, that it was repealed in the following year?—I know it was.

5393. And you are aware that this Bill goes further than that Act?—It does.

5394. Mr. Evans.] Do you consider Plymouth on the whole a sober place or a drunken place?—With the large number of sailors and soldiers there, it is rather a drunken place.

5395. I think you said it has improved like most other places?—Yes, it has.

5396. Have you a large floating population of sailors

Mr.
S. Eliott.

25 May
1868.

sailors and others, in Plymouth?—We have a considerable population of that kind; we have 3,000 soldiers stationed in Plymouth.

5397. They are stationed in barracks of course?—Yes.

5398. Where do the sailors go when they come there; do they live in lodgings?—There is a Sailors' Home for some of them, and others are on board their vessels, or they live about at the various public-houses.

5399. Of course this Bill, if it became law, would not allow them to do that?—Not unless they were lodging there.

5400. In your opinion are there many sailors who lodge otherwise than in the Sailors' Home or in public-houses?—I should think not. I should think that they either live in lodgings at the public-houses or at the Sailors' Home.

5401. I understood you to say, in answer to the Chairman, that you would consider a restriction of the hours, even permitting liquor to be consumed on the premises, would be better than the present system?—Yes, I think so.

5402. In that case, do you consider that the hours selected by this Bill are well selected; do you think that those are hours which on the whole would be most convenient to the public, and would most tend to limit drinking to excess?—I should think they would be the hours most convenient on the whole.

The Reverend GEORGE MOLLETT MURPHY, called in; and Examined.

Rev. G.
M. Murphy.

5403. Mr. John Abel Smith.] You are a Congregational Minister, are you not?—I am.

5404. Of what church?—Of the Borough Road Congregational Church.

5405. You have for many years, I believe, given a very close attention to the question of drinking in all its forms?—I have endeavoured to do so.

5406. And you have taken the closest and most continued interest in the condition and well being of the working classes?—I have.

5407. How long have you been engaged in that pursuit, more or less?—For nearly 20 years in Birmingham and London.

5408. How long is it since you came to London?—Twelve years ago, in June next.

5409. During the whole of that time you have been conversant with the habits and the wishes, and the doings, generally, of the working classes in London?—Most intimately.

5410. Do you remember the benefits accruing to public order by the closing of public-houses, on Sunday morning, by the Act of 1839?—I do; at that time I lived in Chelsea, and I remember that Sloane-square, by the Star and Garter, on Sunday morning prior to the Church service time, was almost impassable from drunken and disorderly men. I also remember having occasion to pass the Marsh-gate, sometimes, at the end of the New Cut, which was worse, perhaps, even than Chelsea. Indeed all the crowded thoroughfares, such as Jew's-row and the New Cut, at that time, were almost unsafe for decent persons to pass.

5411. A great improvement has been produced, has there not, in the existing state of things, by the restrictions now existing?—A most marked improvement.

5412. Do you recollect Mr. Wilson Patten's Act passing in 1854?—Yes, well.

5413. Can you state, from personal knowledge, the effects of that Act as long as it continued in operation?—I was then in Birmingham, and the effects there produced were of the most striking kind. When Mr. Berkeley's Committee was sitting we had evidence prepared in connection with a committee, with which I was then associated, from manufacturers, from ministers, and from the whole of the town missionaries, and others, who were prepared to give evidence as to the advantage of that measure. The premature closing of the Committee, however, rendered that evidence unnecessary.

5414. I think there was only one witness out of London examined before that Committee?—That was all.

5415. Do you recollect the resistance which was offered to Mr. Wilson Patten's Bill?—I remember that there was a riot in Hyde Park, but it happened, with the full consent of Mr. Councilor Stinton, who at that time was president of the Licensed Victuallers' Friendly Protection Society, or a branch of it in Birmingham, to be present at their anniversary. The then mayor of Birmingham, Mr. Palmer, was in the chair at Dee's Hotel, where the meeting was held, and there was a deputation from London present Mr. Raven and Mr. Smith, who was described as the Parliamentary agent of the United Town Association. They took special credit to the association, and to the expenditure of its funds in providing the people with drink who created those Hyde Park riots.

5417. Do you recollect Sir George Grey's Act of 1864?—I do; I had made myself personally acquainted with the facts prior to the passing of that Act, by visiting the Haymarket, Catherine street, Bridges-street, and kindred localities, in company with one of the best-known ministers in London. I visited the same localities after wards, and the change was most marked as regards the benefits produced by the restriction that were brought about by that Act.

5418. You probably, as all the other witnesses will testify to the improvement of the working classes since you came to London?—I think there is a very marked improvement on the south side of London.

5419. And you are of opinion that their habits as to excessive drinking are very much improved since that time?—I am very much of Mr. Potter's opinion, whose evidence I had the privilege and pleasure of hearing, that the improvement is most marked amongst the higher class of artisans, but that there is a class, who are chiefly the Sunday public-house drinking class, who perhaps drink more, and are more violent than they had previously been.

5420. Do you believe that not only by the drunkards, but by the more self-restrained men the application of their wages to the wants of their families would be promoted by a further restriction in the hours of Sunday drinking?—I think that every restriction of the facilities for drinking would be sure to turn a certain amount of money into the pockets of the working people, and conduce to the comforts of their homes.

5421. Do you believe that the restrictions now existing have worked beneficially upon the condition of the working men in London?—Decidedly, so far as they go.

5422. And that they might be carried further with benefit to them?—According to the returns of a canvass which I have personally been interested in, a majority of two to one of the working classes, even in the lowest neighbourhoods, would go for entire closing. I have those returns here, not of London as a whole, but of different parts, taking such parts as would give a general idea.

5423. Are there any of those returns as to the accuracy of which you can speak from anything like your own personal knowledge?—I think I can speak for all of them.

5424. Will you put in those which you can speak to from personal knowledge?—Yes, I will do so. We have made a canvass of the different districts in the south of London.

5425. Whom do you mean by “we”?—The London Committee. As soon as this Bill was referred to the Committee, we endeavoured to help the Bill on, as we thought it was in the right direction, by some 15 or 20 of us uniting together, so that if any expenses were necessary, they might not fall upon any individual. But I may say, with regard to this canvass, of which I am now speaking, the working people with whom I am connected, my own church, pay the entire expense of it. The canvass is entirely voluntary.

5426. And the expense is paid by the working men?—Yes, as, indeed, all our meetings in the south of London have been paid for by the working men. No committee or association have at all contributed a halfpenny towards the expenses.

5427. Now, will you go on, and state the results of the canvass?—In Great Suffolk-street the replies to “Are you in favour of closing public-houses and beer-shops during the whole 24 hours on Sunday?” were, 62 yes, 28 no, and 7 were neutral. In Little Suffolk-street there were 6 yes, 6 no, and 1 neutral. In Wellington-street there were 12 yes, 6 no, and 2 neutral. In Wellington-place there were 14 yes, 14 no, and none were neutral. In King’s-court there were 7 yes, 3 no, and 1 neutral. In Prince’s-place there were 6 yes, none against, and 3 neutral. In George-street there were 12 yes, 10 no, and 6 neutral. Then, in the neighbourhood of the Mint, which, as some Honourable Members of the Committee will be aware, is considered to be one of the lowest places in London, and to the character of which a previous witness, Mr. Burcham, has already adverted; in Lant-street there were 23 yes, 10 no, 6 neutral; in Little Lant-street there were 21 yes, 1 no, and none were neutral.

5428. Chairman.] Were those householders?—Those were all householders.

5429. Do you know if they were lodging-houses or private dwelling-houses?—There would be in Lant-street, on the average, I dare say, four families living in each house.

5430. Mr. John Abel Smith.] Were the lodgers 0.69.

canvassed?—No, only the householders. In Lombard-street there were 6 yes, 5 no, and none were neutral. In John-street, 12 yes, 8 no, and 3 were neutral. In William-street, 6 yes, 7 no, and 2 neutral. In Ann’s-place, 2 yes, 8 no, and none were neutral. In a part of Southwark-bridge road, which is perhaps the most respectable part of the borough of Southwark, and the largest kind of houses almost in the borough, and the widest road south of the Borough-road, 20 were in favour of entire closing, 2 against, and 3 were neutral. In Great Union-street, another wide thoroughfare, 19 were in favour of entire closing, 6 against, and 3 were neutral. Then in the neighbourhood of the New Cut, in New-street, which runs parallel next to the New Cut, 18 were in favour of entire closing, 10 against it, and 1 was neutral. In Mitre-street, 21 were in favour of entire closing, 8 against, and 3 were neutral. In Queen-street, 26 were in favour, 3 against, and 6 were neutral. In Gray-street, 9 were in favour, 15 against, and 3 neutral. In Wootton-street, Cornwall-road, which is to the north of the New Cut, there were 34 in favour of entire closing, 17 against, and 7 were neutral. In Sidwell-place, a small court running out of Broad-wall, 8 were in favour of entire closing, 4 were against, and none were neutral. The total of the 20 different thoroughfares that I have enumerated, is 344 in favour of entire closing, 171 against, and 57 neutral.

5431. Do you believe that to be an extremely fair and honest return with regard to the disposition and desire of those people?—I believe so, thoroughly.

5432. The working men, as a whole, are in favour of entire closing, are they not?—I think they are. If the Committee would allow me, I have here the results of a workshop canvass, partially on the south of London, with which I am personally conversant.

5433. Mr. Baines.] Were those answers for entire closing, or for Mr. Abel Smith’s Bill?—For entire closing. The workshop canvass which was made by a man who is well known to all the people in the borough of Southwark, as one who takes a great interest in electioneering matters and in moral matters, Mr. Jabez West, shows the following result: We had a workshop canvass at Messrs. Cassell, Petter & Galpin’s; Price & Co.’s Candle Works; Cockrell’s & Co., Coal Merchants; Doulton & Co.’s, Lambeth; and Braby & Co.’s (Limited); at Messrs. Peek, Frean, & Co.’s Biscuit Works; Broadwoods’ Piano Factory; at the Phoenix Gas Works; in Steamboats on the River Thames; at Gibbs’, Leather Dressers; at Olney’s, Leather Dressers; at Horster & Palmer’s Leather Works; at Hebron’s Leather Works; and Corderoy’s, Fellmonger; and the result of that canvass showed 384 workmen in favour of entire closing, 214 against, and 59 were neutral.

5434. Mr. Roebuck.] Do you suppose that the number there canvassed represents the whole number of working men employed in those different places?—I am sure of it.

5435. Are you sure that there was not a larger number, because you have mentioned a great number of places, and the figures which you have given indicate a very small number of persons employed?—There are something like 650 persons who have signed.

5436. Mr. John Abel Smith.] Have you formed, from personal observation, any strong convictions as to the effect of Sunday drinking on the comfort and well-being of working men?—I have; I believe it to be most disastrous. On the south side of the Thames every locality that we have that is strikingly low, is surrounded by public-houses, and the largest public-houses are, where the poorest class of people congregate, and on a Sunday the scenes are most terrible. Some few years ago I made a map of the district, from the southern foot of London Bridge to Westminster Bridge, taking the boundary by the Westminster-road, Borough-road, High-street, Borough, and Wellington-street; and within that boundary, there were in that district, 301 public-houses and beer-shops, and there were but 106 bakers, including chandlers'-shops, which sold bread, and only 77 butchers; or 183 places in all for the sale of bread and meat; whereas there were 301 for the sale of intoxicating liquor. I have estimated that on the very lowest average, on every Sunday night, at least a half-dozen persons are turned out of each of those places helplessly drunk, or nearly so. I was mentioning that to two friends of mine, two navvies yesterday, and asking them whether they thought my average an excessive one, and one of them stated, "All I can say is, that I lived in this street some time ago, and out of that public-house at the corner, I have seen 50 persons turned out drunk between Saturday night and Sunday night."

5437. Mr. Baines.] When you spoke of half-a-dozen being turned out helplessly drunk from each house, did you mean on Sunday evenings?—On Sunday evenings entirely.

5438. Did you say that there were 301 public-houses in the area you refer to?—Yes.

5439. So that that number, multiplied by six, would be upwards of 1,800?—Yes, upwards of 1,800 every Sunday.

5440. Mr. John Abel Smith.] What is the effect of this upon the families of working men?—It leads to poverty of the most terrible kind, and it leads to the cheating of the people with whom the Sunday drinkers and drinkers of all other kinds deal, because the publican will have his score, and the chandler's shopkeeper has to go short of his cash. The people wear clothes of the roughest description, and the furniture of the houses, I need not say, is of the most dilapidated and deplorable kind, and the houses themselves are the most unlikely kind of thing for human beings to live in. But then the landlord cannot get his money; he would be willing to supply a better article if he could only get the means of doing it; the fact is, that however good he supplies a house, the rent is not forthcoming. In the neighbourhood of Kent-street, there is a place called St. George's New Town, which a few years ago, I can remember, was almost entirely rebuilt with a good substantial kind of house, but in less than three years, I believe, that one-third of those houses were in a state of complete dilapidation, and there was no mistake about the dirt, simply from the drunken propensities of the people in the locality.

5441. With regard to women and children, do they suffer especially?—Terribly.

5442. And of course the education and everything of that sort of the children is neglected?—Sadly.

5443. With regard to the observance of Sunday, do you think those people go to a place of worship, or would they go to a place of worship if they were not tempted by the public-house?—

Many of them would go, there is no doubt, if it were not for the sad circumstances into which they are brought by the facilities offered on the Sunday for their husbands and others drinking.

5444. There have been some very large meetings held in London with regard to further restriction on Sunday drinking, have there not?—There have.

5445. Were you present at any of them?—I have been present, I believe, at all of them, and taken part in most of them.

5446. There was one very large one at the Guildhall, was there not?—Yes, and I was present at that meeting.

5447. That was called by the Lord Mayor, I believe?—Yes.

5448. What other meetings have there been?—We have had some very large meetings indeed at the Lambeth Baths. I should have added likewise that they were called by working men, and the expenses were met by the working men who called the meeting, or by those who attended it; chiefly by those who attended as contributors to the meeting. We have also had a conference on education at the Lambeth Baths, attended by nearly 1,000 men, and it was held by adjournment on two weeks. Mr. Alderman Lawrence presided over one sitting, and Mr. Thomas Hughes, the Member for Lambeth, over the other; and I remember the resolution passed at the first sitting of that conference was to this effect, "That the conference is further of opinion that the diminution of the public-houses and beershops, the abridgment of the hours of sale on week days, and their entire closing on Sunday, associated with a keener sense of justice on the part of the clergy, squires, and farmers of the rural districts, would tend very much to diminish what of ignorance exists amongst us; and that the opening of the national museums and artistic collections on the week evenings, and the establishment or encouragement of local museums and schools of art throughout the country, would greatly aid the advance of intelligence, and contribute to the spreading a higher order of culture among the people." That was carried unanimously by the whole conference.

5449. How was that meeting at Lambeth Baths called?—It was called by advertisement in the public papers, and by placards.

5450. And the expenses you have already stated were paid by working men?—Entirely.

5451. Were they in any great degree unanimous in favour of further restriction?—Entirely; there was only one person who got up to oppose, and it ultimately turned out that we did not go quite far enough for him.

5452. But it was all but unanimous?—With that exception, it was completely so. I may say, that since this Committee has been sitting, in order to get at the opinion of the working men as accurately as possible, having had an intimation that I was to be examined, we have called a public meeting in our own church, as unfortunately on the south of the Thames, as in other parts of London, we have no great meeting place where the people can gather to express their opinion on these and cognate subjects. About that, I may say that the intelligent working men on the southside of the Thames have memorialised Lord Derby, when he was Prime Minister, for establishing such meeting places, that the feelings and opinions of the working people upon these subjects might be ascertained; but as we have no large meeting place, the "Bridge House Hotel" in Southwark, and the "Horns" in Lambeth, being the only two rooms, and neither of them holding more than 1,000 or 1,200 people, we are shut up to holding public meetings in places which, perhaps, are rather repulsive to many people. In my own church we had a very large meeting of the working people of the neighbourhood of the Borough-road in favour of entire closing, and in favour of petitioning the House, and that petition has been presented for entire closing; the feeling of the meeting was unanimous; two working men rose up spontaneously from the body of the meeting and advocated Sunday closing. One on the ground that his rates had been increased during the last quarter from 1 l. poor rates to 30 s., and he thought it very hard, he said, that he, a working man, endeavouring to keep himself sober should have to pay such a heavy additional rateage, simply for the publican's benefit, besides seeing their fellow working men in the circumstances that they were. The other man's idea was nearly on a par with that.

5453. Mr. Locke.] The complaint being that the rate was raised in consequence?—Yes.

5454. Mr. John Abel Smith.] He meant by that that the condition of the working men was such that they were reduced to pauperism by indulgence in those evil habits?—Yes, by the drinking on the Sunday and the idleness and drinking on the Monday that is frequently superinduced; and the very first class of people who come upon the poor rates are those who spend the most of their money in public-houses.

5455. Is not it a very regrettable and melancholy fact that a very large proportion of the week's wages goes to the public-house?—Yes, in some instances it is a very large proportion; I know the case of a man who worked at Maudslay's for many years, and he never need have been out of work for, I dare say, 13 years, and was earning large wages the whole of that time; there was but himself and his wife, for they had no children, and yet they had not an article of furniture of their own; and I am sorry to say they got into debt with a poor widow (which led to my becoming acquainted with the circumstance) for the necessities of life, and, after borrowing her furniture, they never paid her a halfpenny for it; this is an extreme case, no doubt, but I could mention a case which came to my knowledge when I was at Birmingham of a man who was in the habit of earning from 8 l. to 10 l. a week for just adjusting the wheels on the axles of railway trucks, and who, owing to his drinking propensities, was discharged from that employment; adjusting wheels on axles is a very critical work, and he was considered to be the man who could do it best; I suppose he was rather uppish, thinking that no one could be got to supply his place, and when he was remonstrated with about his drinking habits he was saucy, and was discharged, and in a week after his discharge he was applying to the guardians at Smethwick for relief.

5456. Mr. Baines.] What wages did that man get that you spoke of who was employed at Maudslay's for so many years?—His regular wages would be about two guineas a-week, and he would at extra times be getting, I dare say, nearly 2 l. 10 s.

5457. Mr. John Abel Smith.] The general result of the evidence which you have so usefully laid before the Committee is this; first of all, the miserable results of the indulgence of a certain class of men in London in Sunday drinking, and, secondly, the necessity for increased restriction?—Yes; But will you allow me to say with regard to that, that during three years I have been permitted by one of the London morning papers to cull from their columns a month's result of drinking as exhibited in those columns; as regards the general result of drinking, I find that in the police reports in the year 1865, from the 23rd of August to the 22nd of September, there were publicly reported 37 cases of wilful murder, manslaughter, and suicides in the columns of the "Morning Star" in that one month. There were attempts to kill, 29; brutal assaults and violence, 42; cases of furious driving, and danger to life by persons intoxicated, 15; there were robberies in public-houses by or on drunken persons, 24; indecent assaults, seven; and six charges against publicans.

5458. How many do those come to altogether in one month?—One hundred and sixty, I think, they come to. The following year exhibited a slight improvement; for the same corresponding period in 1866, there were 30 murders or man-slaughters, or suicides reported; attempts to kill, 11; brutal assaults and violence, 44; furious driving and danger to life, 8; robberies, 21; indecent assaults, 2; and charges against publicans, 23.

5459. Chairman.] Were those stated to have been committed in the metropolis, or were they merely the cases reported in the morning paper?—Over the entire country.

5460. Mr. Hibbert.] Were all of those cases connected with drunkenness?—All of them were stated to be so in the reports; in the past year I proposed to enlarge the enquiry, and I took the local papers; I took the "South London Press" in addition to "The Morning Star" and "The Alliance News," which is a Manchester paper; and the period taken was from the 1st of June for a month, and these cases were reported during the whole time of the Reform agitation, when the columns of the newspapers were filled, of course, with the Parliamentary debates, and the large public gatherings which were held incidental to them. There were in those three papers, murders, man-slaughters, and suicides, 86; fatal accidents and deaths by misadventure through drink, 77; making a total of 163 deaths during the month; there were attempted murders and suicides, 44; violent assaults and endangering life, 41; common assaults and disgraceful conduct by persons in drink, 155; robberies in public-houses through drink, 49; furious driving and danger to life, 13; indecent assaults, 8; and charges against publicans, 40, during that time. Having to go with a deputation to the present Prime Minister the other day, in order that we might be as accurate as possible as to the terrible results of drinking, I took the week preceding our interview with Mr. Disraeli; this was from the same three papers as the last returns, and the results are as follows: murders and violent deaths of different kinds for the one week, 15; attempted murders, three; life endangered, two; other public-house cases, 14; making a total of 34 in the one week. I have found that of those cases some of the very worst occurred on the Sunday.

5461. You have no doubt whatever that a very large proportion of the crime of the country is the result of drunkenness?—No doubt. There has been a presentment made recently by the grand jury of the county of Middlesex to that very effect, and it states this: "The grand jury cannot withhold from the court the amazement and horror which they have felt during their investigations at the systematic continuance of and encouragement to vicious habits by the facilities afforded by the numberless places of resort for drinking and profligacy, thereby providing nurseries for crime and destitution; and they earnestly hope that some effectual steps may be taken, either by the withholding of licenses, or curtailing the hours for the sale of intoxicating liquors, and thus to grapple with a system of demoralisation as antagonistic to the interests of religion and as injurious to the social well-being of all classes of the community as it is degrading to us as an enlightened nation."

5462. Chairman.] Have those cases any reference to Sunday?—Several of the worst of those cases have occurred on Sunday.

5463. Mr. John Abel Smith.] With regard to the accidents through Sunday drinking, have you anything to state to the Committee?—Yes. Before I came to London I was associated with the large firm of Sir Charles Fox, and Mr. John Henderson at Birmingham. Sir Charles Fox has stated (and it quite bears out my own views of the matter) that the large majority of accidents in connection with their extensive works occurred on the Monday, and were the results of unsteadiness occasioned by the Sunday's drinking. I had an opportunity of asking Sir Charles Fox within the last month as to whether he still coincided with that opinion, and he said that he did; and that he should be quite willing to ratify anything that he had said upon that subject.

5464. Have you taken any means of becoming intimately acquainted with the condition and wishes and feelings of the working classes in London and Birmingham?—Yes, in London as regards the South especially; and in Birmingham, I knew it as it was 12 years ago intimately.

5465. And do you believe that the better class of working men are now strongly in favour of increased restriction on Sunday drinking?—Decidedly.

5466. Do you believe that the Bill which is referred to this Committee would be beneficial in its operation?—I am sure of it.

5467. Do you believe that the inconvenience which would be produced by preventing drinking on the premises on Sunday are to be compared with the moral and social benefits to be produced by it?—Not for a moment.

5468. Do you believe that the excursionists in London, who are so numerous at certain times of the year, would suffer any easily understood inconvenience by having the public-houses closed at 10?—I am happy to say that we have now no regular Sunday excursions out of London. All the lines of railway have found out that they do not pay, and there are no Sunday excursions now.

5469. But there are a great number on the river by steamboats, are there not?—A great number of persons go by them, but they are a mere fraction compared with the mass of people that remain in London.

5470. Chairman.] Is it not the case that there are an enormous number of trains on some of the suburban lines which are almost in the nature of excursion trains on Sunday, only that they are regular trains?—There are not so many trains run on Sunday as on other days.

5471. Mr. Bright.] Are there not a great many who come into London on the Sunday evening late by trains?—Nothing, compared with the ordinary influx of persons coming into the City on any morning during the week.

5472. But to such extent as that travelling occurs, would the inconvenience to them be very serious if the opportunity of obtaining refreshment were prevented after 10 o'clock?—I think not. I had for many years a place of worship next to the South Western station, in Waterloo-road, in Hawkstone Hall, which was built to commemorate the centenary of Rowland Hill. The hours of service were sometimes late, so that I had an opportunity of seeing the excursionists, and the great majority of them I know went right away home without drinking; and the people who had been drinking were for the most part quarrelling, as though they had been rather unrefreshed than anything else.

5473. Mr. John Abel Smith.] Do you believe that restriction might now be carried further, both beneficially and usefully to the mass of the people?—I think there is no doubt, taking the general mass of the well-intentioned working people, that they would go decidedly further than this Bill goes; but they would be willing to accept this Bill as an instalment rather than run too violently counter to the feelings even of the lowest and most degraded of their brethren.

5474. If such a Bill as this became law, do you believe that there would be any violent resistance to it, or any disorder produced by it?—Not at all.

5475. Or discontent?—No general discontent.

5476. Mr. Bright.] Will you tell me whether you know, taking those 301 public-houses and beer-houses, what is the proportion of each in that district to which your map applies?—I think they are nearly equally divided.

5477. The public-houses have their licenses granted by the magistrates, have they not?—Yes.

5478. What magistrates are they?—They sit in the Newington Sessions-house; they are the magistrates of the county of Surrey.

5479. And the beer-houses have their licenses from the excise, I believe?—Yes.

5480. Do the magistrates generally refuse licenses, or do they give them freely?—They exercise a tolerable supervision over them, keeping them to about the number that they are.

5481. Do you know at all whether, amongst those public-houses and beer-houses there is a great change of occupation; do they all seem to get a living and to prosper, or is there often an entire change of occupation, and are the houses frequently taken by somebody else?—Owing to the advance of general temperance and other efforts which have been rather active on the south side of the water, there is no doubt that it has been a losing business on the south side of the Thames, contiguous to the river, for some little time in some parts.

5482. Do you think that the number of public-houses and beer-shops is rather diminishing than otherwise?—Rather so, in that locality.

5483. Have you ever had occasion to observe, or to make any calculation as to the duration of life amongst persons who keep public-houses and beer-houses?

beer-houses?—I should think that the general average of life is very limited amongst the keepers of public-houses, who themselves drink the drinks they sell. I have known cases on our side of publicans who have died, not a few of them, of lirium tremens.

5484. An eminent distiller once estimated that if a man began to keep a public-house his life was not worth more than seven years, that is to say on the average; of course there are many who may live 50; but have you ever observed whether there is any foundation for any such sad calculation as that?—No Insurance Office will insure the life of a publican, especially if his house is in a low neighbourhood, except at a hazardous rate.

5485. But in the general improvement which you have said has taken place amongst the population, I presume you would admit that there is probably a general improvement also in the habits of persons connected with this business?—I am afraid I cannot say very much on that score; I should have to put a very deep red mark, owing to deeds of blood, on almost all the public-houses on our side of the water that I am acquainted with, from the terrible things that have occurred in them, which might have been prevented, if that which I have heard given in evidence before this Committee were true; that is to say, if publicans would say to their customers, who were getting drunk on their premises, that they should go home. Many dark things might have been prevented, if that which we have heard spoken in this room had been done in any degree.

5486. Have your efforts, on behalf of temperance, placed you in such a position with regard to the persons who sell those liquors, that you could not have much opportunity of ascertaining their views upon the subject of this Bill?—I think that all who know me respect me, although they know that I have no love for their business; I know some of them, and I am in communication, occasionally, with some of them.

5487. Have you met any of them who have expressed an opinion, rather favourable than hostile, to the limitation of their trade on the Sunday?—I have not.

5488. Have you ever represented to any of them, in your character as a minister and well-wisher to your countrymen, that it would be a great boon to their families, if they could concur in the growing public opinion on behalf of some further limitation on that day?—I have in one or two instances, when I could do it, without going into their houses; but in the position in which I am situated, as regards working men, and my well-known opinions with regard to temperance, it would be injudicious to me to be seen going into a public-house.

5489. As far as your own opinion goes, without consultation with them, do you think that the licensed victuallers and beer-house keepers and their wives and their children, have at least as great an interest in the objects of this or some similar Bill as the general public at large have?—I think that if we leave out the pecuniary view of the matter altogether, it would be to them an inestimable advantage to give them one day's rest in the seven.

5490. In discussing this question with a view to legislation, do you think that that is a point of the question which should be entirely left out of view?—No, I do not think it should be left out of view; I think that it should be taken into consideration.

5491. Is it not an argument with regard to persons of an inferior class and persons employed in all kinds of trades that it is a great hardship upon them to be compelled, even although the public necessities seem to require it, to carry on their business on Sunday; is not it the general feeling that the more that day can be made a day of rest the better?—I am glad to say that that feeling is growing in every class of the community. I have had evidence of it in late years by the thousands of working men on our side the water, and indeed in other parts of London, who have met together when there have been efforts as they have thought calculated to weaken the resting privileges of the Sabbath-day. They have met, and in some instances, filled Exeter Hall inside, and as an Irishman might have said, they filled it outside too, just to resist any such attempt as that.

5492. If you were here as an advocate on behalf of the licensed victuallers and beer-house keepers, wholly apart from their pecuniary interest, would you be less a strong advocate for some further restriction than you are at present, looking at their family and moral interests?—No, I should be as strong as at the present time. Apart altogether from my temperance views, I believe that giving them one day's rest in seven would add one year to their life out of ten.

5493. Mr. Baines.] What is your opinion as to the effect of Sunday drinking, especially upon the young people, referring not merely to the direct effect, but also to the indirect effect, that is to say, the effect upon the children of the fathers being drunken on the Sunday. I want to know what you conceive the effect to be upon their health and upon their education and upon the general, moral, as well as material welfare of the rising generation to whom we have to look for the future hopes of England; what, for instance, is the effect upon a vast number of the infants of the working classes in consequence of their fathers drinking on Sunday?—I am sorry to say that there are thousands of children in London who grow up from their earliest childhood familiar with drunkenness and blasphemy on the Sunday as well as on the week-days. I preached yesterday afternoon in East-lane, Walworth, and walked from it to a street running out of Webber-street in Blackfriars-road, and I passed no less than eight gangs of boys ranging from seven to 30 in number, all engaged in gambling; and there is no doubt that most of them were the children of drunken parents.

5494. What do you believe to be the effect upon the health of infants and children still with their mothers from the fathers spending their wages in the public-house on Sunday?—It can be only most injurious in every way; it diminishes their food for one thing.

5495. And what as to their clothing?—The less said about that the better, unless it was provided for them by charitable aid very frequently.

5496. What is the effect upon their habitations, their beds, and all those things which contribute so much to health in infancy and youth?—It is very sad. In some places it is better, I am glad to say, than it has been; but on our side of the water there are some places in which I would not let a dog of mine live, but where human beings live; and as I have already stated to the Com-

Rev. G. M. Murphy. mittee, at the corners of the very worst localities there are the very largest drinking-houses.

25 May 1868. 5497. What is the effect upon their children's education; first, upon their day-school education has it any effect?—There is no doubt that there are hundreds of children growing up without any but street education.

5498. What is the effect upon their Sunday-school education?—There are thousands of them who never darken the doors of a Sunday school.

5499. Are there any who, having been for some period in Sunday schools, are seduced by those places into habits of intemperance?—The Westminster-road, just on the other side of the Bridge down to the junction of the Kennington-road, is on a Sunday night almost impassable from the crowds of young people, boys and girls, between 15 and 19 years of age, who are, there is not the least doubt, entirely beyond parental control. They are continually being brought up before the magistrates for insulting people as they pass, and for rudeness of behaviour. There is a large drinking-house there, that was the Hungerford Hall, Gatti's, which turns them out; they go in there and refresh themselves, and then come out and are a nuisance to every one; it is one of the most brawling neighbourhoods in the metropolis on Sunday-evenings.

5500. Can you fairly connect this with Sunday trading, because that is what we have to look to, and I do not want anything but what you can fairly connect with the indulgence either of their parents or themselves in drinking on Sunday?—The only connection, I think, must be that visible one, that if the father is away on the Sunday evening in the public-house when he might be with his children, there cannot be that affection growing up between the parent and the child which should be the groundwork of all home comfort and happiness.

5501. Do the children themselves get into those public-houses on the Sunday evening?—A considerable number of them do.

5502. Have you known children who were at Sunday schools, but who have been taken away from the Sunday schools in consequence of the habits that they had formed?—In some few instances I have known that to be so.

5503. Do you then think that the moral and material effects of such a course of life upon the rising generation are very disastrous?—They are most disastrous.

5504. And peculiarly on the Sunday evening, is it so, in consequence of their being so much more at leisure on that evening than on other evenings?—There is the leisure of the Sunday, which causes, there is not the least doubt, an opportunity to be embraced for drinking; and the Sunday evening, which should be the happiest evening at home, is very frequently rendered a curse rather than a blessing.

5505. Have you formed any opinion as to the effect upon female virtue of the opening of these public-houses on Sunday evening, when the young women are more at liberty than they are on other evenings?—I have not turned my attention specially to that subject.

5506. Mr. Hibbert.] With regard to the statistics which you have given us as to the workshops, are there any females employed in any of those places?—In some few instances there would be. At Cassell, Petter & Galpin's there would be a few, but the canvass would not touch them.

5507. Would the statistics include females?—I think not.

5508. Of course they would exclude any boys or young people who were employed in them?—They would include simply the men.

5509. That would account, probably, for the small number which appears to have been returned from those places?—Yes; the number comprise nearly all the adult persons employed in those places.

5510. Has your attention been drawn to the Bill before the Committee, with respect to the proviso for the metropolitan district, and that it allows greater latitude in the metropolis than is allowed for the country; do you think that it is necessary to give greater advantages in the metropolis than in the country?—If left to the working men themselves, they would say, "No."

5511. Do you think, from your knowledge of London habits, that it is necessary that you should make greater provision for the metropolis than for the country?—It might be wise, looked at from a statesman's point of view, to make an alteration; but the fewer distinctions of that kind the better.

5512. Why would you make a difference?—If it were left to myself I should not make a difference.

5513. Taking a statesman's point of view, why would you make a difference?—Statesmen, as I sometimes mingle with them, are not quite so familiar with the wishes of the people at large as they might be.

5514. I suppose there is a reason for that proviso which is applied to London; do you know what the reason is?—I do not, except, as I have gathered from the examinations here, that there are a large number of lodgers who appear to be regarded as having no place in which to have their meals; but for the most part, as far as I know, the lower class of lodgers in the lodging-houses of Mint-street and Kent-street, have a common kitchen, in which they all take their meals, which is open for the whole of the lodgers, and there is no difficulty in their having their food. In the case of lodgers, who are of a superior class, young men who are away from home, they generally live with the families with whom they lodge; or if they keep themselves, there are very few of them but have their dinner at home on Sunday.

5515. I suppose you are aware that it also allows any person who wishes to take a meal to go upon the premises, and to consume liquors upon the premises of public-houses during certain hours?—The number of persons who take their dinner in public-houses on Sunday is very small.

5516. Do you not, then, think it is more a matter of inconvenience which is felt from the very wretched homes of many people in London?—People who have got wretched homes, I am afraid, would have hardly any dinner in a public-house or anywhere else, worthy of the name of a dinner.

5517. According to your opinion, it is scarcely necessary, is it, that such a proviso should be kept in the Bill?—There may be reasons why, but I cannot see them; as far as I can see, I hardly think that there is any real necessity for it.

5518. Do you think that the present Bill would be more satisfactory in its working than any restriction of the present hours, allowing persons to drink on the premises if they thought proper, or to buy liquor for drinking off the premises during limited hours?—I think that the arrangement contemplated by the Bill would be decidedly more advantageous.

Rev. G.
M. Murphy.

1868.

5519. Do you think that the present Bill would cause more reaction, by the extent to which it goes, than the other plan which I have suggested would do?—I think that on the part of comparatively few, and those few not of the best class of the people, there might be some little soreness of feeling; but I am sure, if the honourable Members had passed with me down East—ane just as that class of persons were being turned out of the public-houses yesterday afternoon at three o'clock, they would have thought that the general good of the country must not be stayed by consideration for that class of persons; so far as their personal liberty of a wise and right kind is not interfered with.

5520. You think that you would not prevent legislation on account merely of the drinking portion of the population?—I should not like to say on account of the mere drinkers, but on account of that class of drinkers who make their Sunday drinking from home really a great point in their life.

5521. Taking into consideration the very wretched and miserable homes that are to be found in London, would you not think that at present it would be desirable to allow drinking in the premises for a short time; that is to say, supposing a person wished to leave his wretched home, and wanted something a little brighter and more cheerful, would you not allow him that even for a more limited time?—The wretched home is occasioned by the drink.

5522. Do you think that by closing the public-house you will very probably make the home less wretched than it was before?—There is no doubt of it. We find that when any man is won by moral efforts, and by the efforts of temperance reform, to leave drinking altogether, as I am glad to say that hundreds and thousands have been recently on the south side of the Thames, the very first thing he does is to seek a better home. We have, I am glad to say, not only in London but throughout the country, thousands of reformed drunkards who have now houses of their own; they have found the advantage of buying bricks and mortar instead of buying beer, and they own their own houses.

5523. Do you know whether any number of publicans in the district with which you are acquainted close their public-houses entirely on Sunday?—I do not think there is one.

5524. Mr. Locke.] You mentioned 301 public-houses; in what districts were they?—From the foot of Westminster Bridge to the foot of London Bridge, and bounded by the river, all within that district down to the Borough-road, Westminster-road, and High-street, Borough.

5525. Do you take the water side all along there?—Only on one side, the inner side.

5526. How do you mean the inner side?—The northern side of the way.

5527. From Westminster Bridge down to London Bridge?—If we were walking from Westminster Bridge to London Bridge we should take the left-hand side of the road; the public-houses on the right-hand side would not be considered to be within the boundary. We take all on the left-hand side to the river boundary.

5528. That is the left-hand side of Westminster-road?—Yes, the left hand side of Westminster-road.

minster-road and the left-hand side of the Borough-road.

5529. What do you do with the York-road; do you take that in; were any of those public-houses there?—We take all the public-houses in the district within that boundary between the river margin and the left-hand side of the broad road going to London Bridge from Westminster.

5530. That is a very large portion; what parishes is it in?—It comprises part of Lambeth parish; it embraces the whole of Christchurch; part of St. Saviour's; and part of St. George-the-Martyr; it is not a mile square.

5531. Does it take in Kent-street?—No.

5532. But it takes in Lant-street and all that part by Union-street?—Yes.

5533. What would be the population altogether there?—The population of that district would, I dare say, be 70,000 people.

5534. There are about 200,000 altogether, are there not, in Southwark?—In the Borough of Southwark there are, but a large part of the borough is excluded by my map, and that the best and most considerable part of it. I exclude all Bermondsey, which is the largest part; and Rotherhithe also is excluded.

5535. And a great portion of St. George-the-Martyr is excluded?—A large part of it; all that part of Kent-street and White's-row.

5536. You have not taken in the Kent-road at all, have you?—No, not all.

5537. Nor Kent-street?—No.

5538. I believe you are a total abstainer, are you not?—I am; I am very glad to say.

5539. Therefore you never want to go to a public-house either on Sunday or Monday, or any other day?—Not for my own personal convenience. I go sometimes when I am sent for to see sick people.

5540. For the purpose of having anything to drink, you would not go anywhere for it, not even at home; you never take any fermented drink?—No.

5541. Nothing but tea and coffee and those sort of things?—Anything that is pleasant and cool that would not make me tipsy.

5542. Therefore with regard to the wants of the public, you do not form a portion of the public that has wants in that direction?—Yes, I do; my salary is very limited, and I have to pay very heavy rates as the result of drunkenness.

5543. You have no wants in that direction yourself; you do not want any liquor?—No; but I have a deep interest in these matters, although I have no personal wants.

5544. Of course you have an interest in keeping down the rates, as we all have, but do you think that if those public-houses were restricted in this way on Sunday it really would put an end to drinking at all?—The best answer to that is, that it already has.

5545. Do you think so; I do not think that you have shown that; where has it done so?—The drinking in 1839, I well remember, was very terrible, when the houses were allowed to be open all day, and I remember that there was at once a marked improvement; I am quite sure that during the time of Mr. Wilson Patten's Act the improvement was, if possible, still more marked; and the action of Sir George Grey's Act has been beyond compute, and astonishing even to those who were the originators of it.

Rev. G.
M. Murphy.

25 May
1868.

5546. That Act was passed with the sanction of the publicans, was it not?—No, I think not.

5547. Sir George Grey's certainly was; there was no opposition offered by them to Sir George Grey's Act?—There was not, because at that time they were getting up as much opposition as they could against Mr. Somes and his Bill; but I may also inform the Committee that I had the pleasure of being in Guernsey, where the entire population is almost a working-class population, and they close the public-houses entirely on the Sunday there, not only without inconvenience, but with so much advantage from the restrictive principle, that now they are making a canvass through the various parishes to get the people to go to the Estates Court for restricting the sale of drink altogether.

5548. Drink is a very cheap thing in Guernsey, is it not?—Yes, very.

5549. It is the cheapest place for drink, of any, probably?—Except Jersey, perhaps.

5550. They have no duties to pay, have they?—They are in the happy position of having no taxation.

5551. Do you know whether they have a good many drunken people there?—There have been fewer drunken persons since the closing on Sundays than there was before.

5552. Setting aside that drink is cheaper in Guernsey and Jersey than in any other part of the Queen's dominions, is there more drinking there than there is here?—There is a considerable amount of drinking and a good deal of drunkenness.

5553. But is there more than there is in any other part of England?—I have had no opportunity of making the comparison.

5554. Then, if those persons are not worse than others, it is not always the facility of getting drink that makes people drunkards?—They do not earn so much money as they do in England; the wages are much lower, and there is not the same amount of money spent in drink now, though the drink be cheaper.

5555. The price of drink is not actually that which makes the difference, but it is the duty which is put upon it that makes it dear in this country?—I think that the publican, by mixing, makes it about equal before it gets to the customer.

5556. They make it weaker, do they not?—They use liquor discriminately; there is not the least doubt that they know how to use some other material too, if the reports in the police records are right.

5557. They do not make it stronger, do they?—They give it a fictitious strength.

5558. In what way?—If I am to judge by the proceedings got up by the Excise in the different courts, they have sundry ingredients, coculus indicus and strychnine for beer, and for spirits they have vitriol and sundry other things, if the evidence given be correct.

5559. Like other people they do not always give the pure article; we have had a good many accusations about bread, you know?—I am afraid they have more than their share of impurities.

5560. I think that publicans are almost the only persons who are visited by the excise, are they not?—They are the only persons who remain open on Sunday.

5561. I mean to say with regard to the adulteration of articles of sale?—The excise visitation is not perhaps so stringent as the visitation by the visitors from breweries, to see that they do not overdash the drink, so that the breweries may not suffer.

5562. However, the Excise have to examine it?—Yes.

5563. With regard to other shops, there are no special officers to do that, except in the case of publicans?—Yes, all persons who sell excisable articles are liable to inspection.

5564. For instance, in the case of the Adulteration of Food Act, there are no officers appointed by any parishes?—They can do it if they like.

5565. But they do not do it, because the expense would fall upon the parish if they appoint a person?—Yes.

5566. It would be necessary for them to employ a medical man with a laboratory, to test all the things that are brought to him, and therefore it has not been done?—It has not, as a rule.

5567. Therefore, with regard to publicans, they may be great sinners, but at the same time there are more people to look after them than there are to look after others. Are there not people actually appointed to do so?—No doubt there are.

5568. You have stated, have you not, that drunkenness has very greatly diminished?—I did not say very greatly, but there has been a diminution, and a very pleasing diminution.

5569. What I understand you to say is this, that the drinking people are a special class of low people who cluster about those public-houses on Sundays and on other days, and who get drunk?—No, what I said was, not the drinking people, but the class of people who drink on Sundays, and make the public-houses their home, instead of their own homes.

5570. But they are a low class of people, you say?—Very low, for the most part.

5571. Besides those people, do you think there are any others, respectable people who would require to use a public-house on Sunday?—There is no doubt that there are persons, but the public-house would be open for their convenience by this Bill, for two hours in the middle of the day, and two hours in the after part of the day.

5572. But will those hours suit everybody; are there not in London a large and respectable class of people who take their meals in public-houses every day in the week?—Very few; of course it is impossible to pass any law to suit everybody's convenience.

5573. Take those houses in Fleet-street, round about Chancery-lane, and round about the Inns of Court, are there not public-houses there where people habitually take their dinner, and likewise their beer or their wine, or whatever it may be?—The number of working people in Fleet-street or the neighbourhood on Sunday is very limited.

5574. I am not speaking of working people but of respectable people of another class?—In the neighbourhood of Chancery-lane they do not live there on Sunday, they know better than that.

5575. Some of them are obliged to do so, are they not?—Very few; I have passed up and down Chancery-lane on Sunday, and through Fleet-street, and I have seen very few of the class that you indicate.

5576. Where do they live?—They take their choice; some live at Croydon.

5577. I am speaking of clerks and people of that kind?—They mostly get out of town a little way, where they have a house.

5578. Do

Rev. G.
M. Murphy.

25 May
1868.

5578. Do you suppose that they all have arrangements of that kind?—I hope they have; they are thoughtful people they have.

5579. Supposing they are unmarried people, where are they to get their meals?—With the persons with whom they lodge.

5580. Do you think they do that in London?—I am sure of it.

5581. Where they lodge?—Yes.

5582. It must be a shocking bad dinner, must it not?—They mostly make an arrangement, as far as it comes under my observation, to pay too much for lodging and for food; the one payment covers the whole.

5583. Are not those eating-houses and places full, on Sunday as well as on other days in the week, of people eating their dinners?—No.

5584. Do you mean really to say that you have not observed on the north side of the Thames those eating-houses and places where I do not mean to say merely working men go, but other persons go and take their meals; in fact they have no other place at all to take their meals, but those places?—If any eating-houses on the north side of the Thames had to depend for a livelihood upon the profits which they derive from the sale of dinners, supposing they dined no more on other days in the week than they dined on Sunday they would soon be in the Bankruptcy Court.

5585. But suppose the case of a young man who had no dinner on Sunday, through the operation of the Bill he would be in a worse case, would he not?—The Bill makes provision for that.

5586. You said just now in answer to my friend that you thought that the Bill would be better without that provision, and that you would strike it out of the Bill?—I said that the number of cases which it met were so few, that it would really meet but a very few cases; everybody has a home.

5587. A man might likewise wish to go in, not to take a meal, but to take a pint of wine or whatever it might be, and he might not wish to go in probably between 1 and 3 o'clock, he might like to go at some other hour in the day, would it not be inconvenient to him and if there were a large class of such people it would be a great inconvenience to a vast number of people in London that they should be restricted in that manner?—It would be an inconvenience to a certain number, but I do not think it is quite correct to characterise it as a vast number.

5588. That is a mere matter of opinion, whether it is a large number, or a small number, but you admit that there are a good many people of that sort?—A good few would be inconvenienced by every law of this kind.

5589. Do you think that you ought to pass laws which you know will inconvenience a great number of respectable people, who can restrain themselves, merely for the purpose of protecting drunken people against themselves?—No, for the general advantage of the community; we have to look at the wants and requirements, and the general well-being of the community; not to the particular idiosyncracies of here and there one.

5590. But still you ought to be very careful in passing laws of this sort, ought you not?—Decidedly all laws ought to be very carefully passed.

5591. Particularly laws which interfere with person's domestic habits, and when you do not know exactly how it may affect them?—Such laws ought never to be passed until the voice of the people is largely in favour of them.

5592. That is to say, all classes of people?—Yes, all classes of people.

5593. Do you think that all classes of people have expressed themselves in favour of this Bill?—They have expressed themselves, so far as I know, going considerably further than this Bill.

5594. You have spoken of a particular class, and I think you have mentioned altogether 650 people, and those persons were all householders?—Yes.

5595. They do not care so much about it as the lodgers would and persons of that description, do they?—I have no doubt, whatever, as to the lodger's opinions being the same as the householder; we can only get at public opinion by such a canvass as that, or by public meetings, and as far as I know of every public assembly, and every attempt to canvass the people amongst any class of them, they have always gone decidedly in favour of further restriction even to a greater degree than the present Bill.

5596. By whom were those meetings called that you speak of; was it by the association?—No, not at all; but by working people.

5597. But those are working people, are they not, who are very much interested in this question?—They are interested in all social questions.

5598. They devote themselves to certain measures of this sort, from time to time, and call meetings?—Not particularly.

5599. At Lambeth Baths that is a place where they hold most of the meetings, is it not?—In the winter time.

5600. Besides calling those meetings at the Lambeth Baths with respect to the closing on Sunday, they meet for other purposes also, do they not?—Yes; all through the week we have scientific discussions, and we have lectures upon general topics, and almost all kinds of educational machinery; the week is spent in one way or another in elevating the people.

5601. Every night?—Yes; every night except Monday; on Monday night in winter there is the Surrey Chapel popular lecture.

5602. Then it is the people who congregate at the Lambeth Baths who have called those meetings, is it not?—The committee of working men who manage, and who are the deacons of my own church, whenever they see any opportunity of getting the opinions of the people so that they may receive information from them, or get any instruction from them, seeing that that is the only large meeting place on the south side of the Thames, are willing to run the risk of calling a meeting and paying the expenses for the general good of their fellows.

5603. Then I understand you it is the association of which you are the head that has called those meetings?—No, the meeting that was specially held which appointed the deputation originally to Lord Derby with regard to this matter, and the meeting held by the promoters of this Bill, were called by public announcement for the attendance of anybody and everybody.

5604. But who gave the notice; the committee of that association, I suppose?—The persons whom I have already spoken of.

5605. And you are their chairman, are you not?—I am their minister.

5606. And those are the parties who gave notice of the meeting, and who were instrumental in carrying it out?—Yes, but their opinions as regards drinking is shared, there is not the least doubt, by the great mass of the drinking community. As the Honourable Member is aware, we commenced the working men's exhibition movement at the Lambeth Baths; we have held two very successful ones, and on both occasions the exhibitors, not by any means attendants upon the baths, but indeed from the whole of the south and south-western district, met, and made their own regulations; and the most stringent regulation amongst the rest was this, that there should be no drinking of intoxicating drinks in the exhibition.
I 13 in

5607. That exhibition was got up, was it not, by meetings all over the town?—Yes; but still as regards that, the feeling was universal that there should be no publican element in it.

5608. I had the pleasure of meeting you, I think, at one of those meetings, in St. Olave's school?—Yes.

5609. Mr. Roebuck.] I take it that your argument is this, that past restrictions have led to good?—There is no doubt of it.

5610. And therefore further restrictions must lead to good also?—No doubt.

5611. And that would lead you to total closing, both on Sundays and other days in the week?—When the people were in its favour.

5612. That is your argument, is it not?—No, I am not arguing the question; that is not the way I should put it if I were arguing it.

5613. I hope there is argument at the bottom of what you have said, because if there is not, there is no value in it; and I want to know how you have got at your opinion?—I have already stated to the Committee, that by the observations which I have had of the working of the Acts of 1839, 1854, and 1864, from experience in Guernsey, and also experience of the action of the different restrictive laws in America, everything proves this; and indeed a resolution was passed by the licensed victuallers themselves in Birmingham, at a meeting of the Licensed Victuallers' Association, that every facility for the sale of drink increased the number of drinkers, and that the taking away of facilities made the people more sober; that resolution the publicans themselves passed against the beer-house keepers.

5614. That is what I want to bring you to. I say your opinion is that past restrictions have led to good, and therefore further restrictions would lead to further good, and if there were complete restriction it would lead to complete good?—That is so.

5615. Do you believe that?—Quite.

5616. Do you believe that you can ever put down drunkenness?—When people are prepared to do it for themselves, I should never attempt to do it alone.

5617. Do you believe that any legislative proceeding at all will put down drunkenness?—It may put down the public sale of incentives to drunkenness.

5618. You may put down the open sale of liquor, but will not it be sold illicitly?—There is a possibility of that being done, but that is against the law, and has not the law in its favour, whereas the present drinking habit has the law in its favour.

5619. I heard you quote America; do you know that the Maine Liquor Law is a dead failure in America?—No; and I do not think anybody else does.

5620. Have you seen the reports made to the British Government by the British consuls in Massachusetts?—I have not seen those reports.

5621. Then you do not know that those reports do not contain the statement that I make?—The Maine Law in Maine has been made more stringent very recently; and the prohibitory Liquor Law in Wisconsin has been incorporated into the constitution of the State, so that it is put out of reach now of the State elections phase, so that the Maine Law has been found to work so much good there that in the one, its parent State, it is made stronger, and in another it has become a part of the constitution of the State.

5622. I am directing your attention to Massachusetts, the largest of the New England States, and there we learn from our own authorities that it is a total failure, and has been repealed?—The authorities may perhaps not have given sufficient attention to the subject. I do not say they have not. I have not seen the reports, and therefore cannot express any decided opinion about them, but there has been a law giving the people a permissive power of prohibiting any license to be granted.

5623. Not in Massachusetts?—I think I am correct in saying this, that the new law adopted in Massachusetts contains a permissive prohibitory clause, giving the electors a veto by a bare majority on the issue of all licenses for drinking on the premises.

5624. What is the date of that law?—The date of that law would be within the last month.

5625. Are you prepared to pledge yourself to the accuracy of that statement?—I am. I am told that the mayor and the other local authorities are required when licenses are issued to give notice to the liquor sellers not to sell or give liquor to such persons as may be injuring their health or wasting their property by excess.

5626. You say that that has been passed within the last month?—It has been passed; I am not sure as to its being passed within the last month. I may also say that there is another clause, that the wife of any person injured by liquor sold to him may bring an action for damages against the person selling the liquor. I advocated that very principle myself before a meeting of the Society of Arts on the dwellings of the people, and if that was done in England, I am quite sure there would be better dwellings for the people very soon. Let me say, in order that I may be quite fair, that the governor of the State to which I have referred has refused to approve the law, but does not attempt to veto it, so that it remains law. The ground of the governor's disapproval, was that he believed that it was not sustained by the judgment and conscience of the majority of the Commonwealth, but he did not veto the law, and therefore that law is in force now.

5627. You refer to that as the present state of things in Massachusetts?—Yes.

5628. That is exactly what you want to bring us to, is it not?—When the people are quite ready for it.

5629. Do you expect and hope that the people will be brought very soon, or within a given time, to that state of feeling?—I do not know how soon it might be; but I am sure of this, that there are men who are prepared to work and

Rev. G.
M. Murphy,

and to spend money for it, until the public opinion of the country rises up to that point.

5630. And you are one of those men?—I am one of those persons 5631. Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen.] You have stated that you thought the majority of the well-intentioned working men were now in favour of further restriction?—I am sure of it.

5632. Do you consider it at all a test of being well-intentioned their frequenting or their not frequenting public-houses?—No; I think that a man who frequents a public-house may do so quite as honestly as a man not frequenting one.

5633. What you mean by well-intentioned, is the whole body of the working classes?—I mean gauging a man's intelligence by his general conduct, not by his drinking or not drinking.

5634. You stated, did you not, that public opinion is growing in favour of further restriction?—There is no doubt of it.

5635. Do you think that there has been any pressure of public opinion brought to bear upon the publicans?—I do not know; the publicans have been trying to do very much in getting public opinion upon their side.

5636. Are not publicans persons who exist by supplying a public want, fancied or real?—There is no doubt of it.

5637. Then, if public opinion is growing rapidly in favour of further restriction, must not that, in the very nature of things, bear upon the body of publicans?—There is no doubt of it.

5638. If the publicans believed in the voluntary closing of their houses on Sunday, and that they would be supported by public opinion, do you not think that they would be likely to do so?—At the present time I hardly think they would, because the legitimate wants of people are more than met by the number of public-houses which there are.

5639. You do not think that public opinion is sufficiently advanced to press publicans into closing their houses on Sunday?—I do not say that public opinion is not sufficiently advanced, but however advanced public opinion might be, the publicans would not yield to any expression of that kind.

5640. But they must yield if their customers put a pressure upon them, must they not?—That does not necessarily follow.

5641. You probably did not hear the evidence the other day regarding those publicans, who voluntarily closed, that the pressure put upon them by their customers, was such that they had to open again?—I did not understand the evidence quite like that; one after another of the 14 opened in spite of the engagement which they had entered into, and the result was, that when one after another went in, the whole caved in.

5642. Was not that re-opening occasioned by the public, that is to say, the customers not consenting to the closing?—No, it was not; the very same thing occurred many years ago at West Bromwich, and I believe that before Mr. Villiers' Committee in 1854, it was brought out. I am very familiar with the circumstance that at Hill-top the magistrates or the visitors got 60 publicans in that neighbourhood to agree to close, and I do believe that the majority would have honestly kept that agreement, only they found that one or two of the principal men began to open, in spite of the agreement, and then they all fell back.

5643. Still, if the public opinion of their customers had been sufficiently strong, the publicans would have kept to their agreement?—I do not know that; I cannot answer.

5644. Mr. Evans.] You have spoken about Guernsey; were you long in the Channel Islands?—No, only just passing through them; but since this Bill has been referred to the Committee, I have made special inquiries from the senior magistrate, Mr. Tupper, who was the president of the Harbour Commissioners; and I also took an opportunity of asking him, and he very kindly gave me the information; I said to him, "You have been employing a great number of men in the construction of this beautiful harbour; have you ever experienced any inconvenience when they have been working in wet or dry weather, as regards Sunday restriction, or any other restrictive laws against drinking?" and he said "No, they were almost all in favour of it."

5645. You do not know, from your own knowledge, whether they are a sober population or not?—Not from personal examination.

5646. I happened to be acquainted with those islands, and I should have said that they were a very sober population?—I was very much pleased with both the islands in passing through them, but I cannot say, from personal knowledge, whether they are a sober population or not.

5647. Mr. John Abel Smith.] Is there anything further which you wish to state to the Committee?—I have also a canvass, if the Committee would like to look at it, of the neighbourhood of Peckham, which shows the same kind of expression of public opinion from a different class of people (handing in the same). By this canvass it appears that 849 householders returned the schedules filled up, and that there were 529 in favour of total closing, 234 against it, and 86 neutral. I may also observe, that streets inhabited chiefly by artisans were selected for canvassing, though some of them contain a mixed population. Wherever this is the case the schedules strikingly bring out the fact that the majority of working men are in favour of total closing, whilst those who oppose it belong largely to the middle and upper classes: artists, gentlemen, clerks, &c. figuring mainly among the "Noes."

JOHN ARTHUR ROEBUCK, ESQ., IN THE CHAIR.

Mr. THOMAS SMITH, was called in; and Examined.

Mr.
T. Smith.
1868.

5648. Chairman.] I BELIEVE you have a statement to make to the Committee with reference to some evidence which was given on Monday last; would you wish to put it in the form of a written statement or to do it vivâ voce? —I wish merely to say a few words to correct one answer which has been given here, which is a palpable falsehood as far as concerns myself. Being present at the last meeting of the Committee, and having heard the evidence indistinctly, it was only through my friends that I knew of it; I afterwards saw the answer of which I have to complain, and I wish to say that that answer is quite contrary to the truth.

5649. Will you be good enough to state what you desire to lay before the Committee?—The statement of which I have to complain was in answer to Question 5,415.

5650. I will read you the question and answer, and then you will make any statement you think fit. “Do you recollect the resistance which was offered to Mr. Wilson Patten’s Bill? (A.) I remember that there was a riot in Hyde Park, but I happened, with the full consent of Mr. Councillor Stinton, who at that time was president of the Licensed Victuallers’ Friendly Protection Society, or a branch of it in Birmingham, to be present at their anniversary. The then Mayor of Birmingham, Mr. Palmer, was in the chair at Dee’s Hotel, where the meeting was held, and there was a deputation from London present, Mr. Raven and Mr. Smith, who was described as the Parliamentary Agent of the United Towns Association. They took special credit to the association, and to the expenditure of its funds in providing the people with drink who created those Hyde Park riots?”—That is the question and that is the answer; and the part which I object to is, that “Mr. Smith took special credit to the association, and to the expenditure of its funds in providing the people with drink who created those Hyde Park riots.” I can prove, as I hope to be allowed to do, that this society to which I have the honour to belong and of which I have been the secretary for 35 years, were really, although not the promoters of Mr. Wilson Patten’s Bill; at least in London we assented to it, and that caused very great dissatisfaction in the country towns, and with many of our friends in London. The result was that a new association was formed and then Mr. Berkeley asked for a Select Committee, and that Select Committee repealed the former Bill, and, therefore, it is impossible that I could have said that our society provided the people with drink for such a purpose when we supported the Bill; I should be ashamed of myself if I was guilty of such a thing; I never uttered a falsehood publicly in my life, and I do not think anyone can accuse me of it; and for such an assertion as this to come from a minister of religion I really think is too bad. That is all I have to say; a written answer or anything would satisfy me, so that it is a contradiction; and I thank the Committee for their kindness in allowing me to contradict it.

Mr. JOSEPH LEICESTER, called in; and Examined.

Mr.
J. Leicester.

5651. Mr. John Abel Smith.] WHAT is your employment?—I am a Glass Blower.

5652. Are you the secretary of the Glass Blower’s Friendly Association for England and Wales?—I am the secretary to the Glass Maker’s Friendly Society for Great Britain and Ireland, the London branch of it; that society is one of the richest and the best organised society in the kingdom, decidedly.

5653. Are you also a member of the Committee of the Working Men’s Association which has taken an active part in political questions for the last few years?—I am.

5654. Your employment and your habits of life bring you into communication very largely with the working class, and labouring men in London?—They do.

5655. On the whole do you believe that that class of men view with favour the proposal for increasing the restrictions on Sunday drinking?—Decidedly so.

5656. Do you believe that their personal wishes and aspirations go beyond the limits of the Bill referred to this Committee, inasmuch as a great many of them are in favour of Sunday closing altogether?—My opinion with regard to the sentiments and feelings of the working classes with reference to this measure is that it is not restrictive enough.

5657. That is your opinion; do you believe that

Mr.
J. Leicester.

1868.

at that opinion is shared by the majority of the respectable working men in the class to which you belong?—I do.

5658. The habits of that class, namely, the glass blowers, are rather intemperate, are they not?—The laborious hot character of the work induces thirst, and I think that a great deal of the intemperance of that class is to be attributed to that fact.

5659. In the process of their work, they are exposed to very great heat, are they not?—Yes.

5660. And that induces the habit of drinking beer?—It does.

5661. Is it their habit largely to indulge in drinking beer on Sunday?—I should say more so than on any other day.

5662. What sort of wages do they get?—It is according to the character of the work; the wages generally go by the ability of the workman. The very first class of workmen in the country get from 3*l.* to 3*l.* 10*s.* and 4*l.* a week.

5663. Those are very large wages; do you know what proportion of those large wages they spend on drink?—That would be a question which I should require time to consider; but I believe that the higher the wages are the greater is the indulgence in alcoholic liquors.

5664. Do you think that the drinking goes in proportion to the high wages?—I do.

5665. Instead of the money going to improve the condition of the wife and children, it goes to the public-house?—I would go so far as to say, that having studied the history of the very flower of our trade, men of first-class ability, and in every other respect first-rate men, I have found invariably that the condition of these men is something lamentable. It is a sociable state which ought not to be; and I attribute it all to the public-house and its pernicious influence.

5666. And do they also attribute it to the same cause?—Yes, undoubtedly.

5667. And they would view with great approval a measure which protected them to some extent against their own folly?—They would hail it as a boon.

5668. And I need hardly ask you whether their wives would be in favour of it?—Decidedly so.

5669. In spite of what you say, you probably think that there has been an improvement in that class?—I do think so of late years. I will just detail to the Committee a most tyrannical custom which we had in our trade, namely, footing paying. In one branch of the trade, there was this custom, which is a species of tyranny, that if a man was out of work, and got a situation, he would be fined 10*s.* for footing. If he was married, he would have to pay 1*l.* If he had a child he would have to pay 2*s.* 6*d.*; and so on.

5670. Chairman.] Would he have to pay 10*s.* first of all, and all the other payments in addition?—No matter whether he had a wife previously, if he was married; and for each child; and if he was advanced in the gradations of his trade, he would have to pay for it; and if he blew a new pattern or design of glass, he would have to pay for it. A few men like myself, setting themselves in the face of this tyrannical abuse, have agitated the question, and brought it before our triennial conference, and have so operated upon the minds of the glass blowers that we have rescinded all those absurd customs, and made a law which has really been an educator in the glass trade. We made that law, as a law of necessity, to meet the demands of the case; we lifted it as high as the demands of truth, and we find that the law itself has been a very powerful educator; the very benefits it has brought about has made it satisfactory to the trade. We have made a law that any man who asks another for a footing shall be fined 2*s.* 6*d.* for every such offence, and be deprived of all benefit until that fine is paid.

5671. You think that you perceive a marked improvement in the habits of the men with whom you associate?—Decidedly so, as far as these causes of intemperance has been removed.

5672. And you attribute that partly to the removal of this custom of footings?—I do. I believe that the removal of the footings has removed that portion of intemperance of which they were the cause.

5673. The general education of the men is better than it used to be, is it not?—I am sorry to say that it is not.

5674. Are they an intemperate and careless set of men?—They are good men in every other respect away from the drink.

5675. Supposing such a Bill as has been referred to this Committee became law, you say that it would be accepted by them, and be approved of; I suppose that that implies an absence of all fear on your part that there would be any disturbance or public opposition to its provisions if it became law?—I have not the slightest fear of any resistance of that kind. I have taken very great pains to ascertain the opinion of the class to which I belong; and what has struck me most is the absence of all opposition to the measure; and when it is reflected that publicans have put flaming placards in their windows, appealing to the basest passions of the working classes, and saying that their liberty was infringed by this measure, forgetting altogether that it is merely a supplement to the law which already exists, I have been much surprised the opposition has not been more fierce than it has. There has been no opposition whatever towards the measure. My position, as secretary for 16 years, brings me in contact with between 200 and 300 glass blowers in London; and on one occasion, I took a petition in favour of this measure into the club-room, and I merely pointed out the provisions of the Bill, and every name in the club-room was attached to the petition at the end of the meeting.

5676. I suppose you have a good deal to do with other working men besides those in that special trade to which you belong?—Yes; there are few men that move about more amongst other trades than I do.

5677. Do you think that the opinions which you have expressed as those of the glass blowers, are largely entertained by other working men in London?—I do. I would just inform the Committee that I have been in the habit of speaking at political meetings, as far as working men's meetings have been called together, and I have generally, when I have had anything to say, spoken to working men about the duty of inculcating self reform as the best of all reforms, and I have told them that I myself have not entered a public house for 30 years, and I find that I have better food for my wife and children; and the audiences, miscellaneous composed of working men, have received it with marked approbation; and not only that, but I speak along with many other working men who go to the densely-populated parts of London on Sunday morning, such as the New Cut, and its vicinity, Southwark, the Borough, Clerkenwell-green, Seven Dials, and other parts of London, and we have there, since this agitation has been commenced, tested the feelings of large numbers of working men who have congregated together at those places, and have always had a show of hands, and there has not been any opposition whatever to the measure, but all in favour of this Bill.

5678. What has struck you most is the absence of antagonistic opinions?—That is most strikingly the case.

5679. There has been a very great change, has there not, in the feelings of the working men?—I should say that in the last few years public opinion, with regard to restricting public-house traffic, has been rapidly marching on.

5680. Do you believe that the time has come when restriction may be carried further safely and advantageously?—I do.

5681. Do you believe that restriction produces this effect upon drinking that there is less drinking if there is more restriction?—I believe all things being equal that the greater the facilities the greater the drunkenness; that is admitted by the paid champions of the Licensed Victuallers Protection Society. I may refer the Committee to the celebrated remark made by the late Alderman Wire before the Select Committee on the 17th of June 1853. The question was put by Mr. William Brown: "What would be the effect of an open trade in public-houses?" The answer of Mr. Alderman Wire, who said that he spoke the truth on his conscience, was, "If the public-house traffic were thrown open public morals would be outraged, and the flood gates of vice would be opened." The chairman then asked the question "Why?" The reply of the Alderman was, "Because the publican deals in a dangerous article."

5682. Do you find that the intemperance of the men on Sunday affects their working power in the beginning of the week?—I find that Sunday tipping leads to Monday drinking, and I believe that the very cream of the Bill which you have had the honour of bringing into Parliament is, that it does not allow tipping on the premises.

5683. Do you conceive that the most precious part of that measure is, that which prohibits the consumption on the premises?—Most emphatically so.

5684. Have you ever heard any expressions of opinion by employers of labour with reference to this subject?—I have heard many.

5685. What do they say?—I am continually brought in contact with employers whose men lose their work through intemperance; I would not say anything against those men for any consideration whatever, but I have been called upon, within the last week by an employer who came to me and spoke about his men losing their work through drink; that through their intemperance the fuel of the furnace was being wasted, the metal in the pots could not be worked, and his orders could not be fulfilled; he asked me if I could send him any men; this has continually been the case, for, when I have gone to talk to the men about it, they sincerely wish that the drink was a thousand miles away, or that it was a guinea a pot; that is the general expression of working men; and it seems to me that they would be very glad if the temptation was removed.

5686. But the masters almost uniformly are unanimous, are they not, in favour of increased restriction?—They are in favour of any measure that would further restrict the consumption of alcoholic liquors.

5687. Were you not sent to Paris to the Exhibition?—I was.

5688. What did you go for?—I went to report upon glass, and upon the workshops of Paris, and also upon the state of trade in Paris with regard to its manufactures.

5689. Have you not gained some prize from the Society of Arts?—Yes; I gained a first-class prize for workmanship at the Kensington Museum.

5690. You have practically and personally, for a considerable time, been generally conversant with the glass trade, and with the details of it?—I have; I have gone through all grades, from the lowest position to the highest.

5691. And you confidently and strongly support the Bill which has been referred to this Committee?—I believe that the greatest blessing which could befall this nation would be the restriction of alcoholic liquors to its utmost limit.

5692. Mr. Baines.] Do you yourself entirely abstain from them?—I do.

5693. Have you found your health suffer in consequence?—I have never had a day's illness in my life.

5694. How long have you abstained?—Thirty years.

5695. Have you known a considerable number of glass blowers who have had good health, notwithstanding their severe exertion and exposure?—Yes, I know a considerable number. At one time nearly half the men in the factory where I work were total abstainers; but many of them are now masters themselves, which I attribute to their sober and careful habits.

5696. On the whole, have the total abstainers or have those who take beer or porter the better health?—I should say that the total abstainers have far better health than those who drink.

5697. What liquor do you take?—I drink milk and water, coffee, and tea, when I am thirsty; I only drink when I am thirsty.

5698. Did you know the late Mr. Joshua Bower, an extensive glass maker at Leeds?—I did not; he was a glass manufacturer.

5699. Am I right in saying that in the glass trade, from your own knowledge, not in your own works merely, but in other works, the class of men who have maintained their health best are those who are total abstainers?—I should say yes, decidedly so.

5700. I believe glass blowers are exposed to about as intense a heat as any class of men?—Yes.

5701. It is a life of most severe labour?—It is.

5702. They are exposed immediately in front of furnaces blazing at a white heat, with the metal which they have to handle in the face of it?—Yes.

5703. So that one may consider it as a very severe experiment?—Yes; I may just mention that the man who works with me, who blows for me, has been a teetotaler for over 10 years, and I have never known him lose one day through illness.

5704. Do you happen to know that in similar trades, the puddlers in iron furnaces in some of the great works in the north, there are many hundred of total abstainers, concerning whom it is testified that they have better health than those who take liquor?—I have read of such cases frequently, but I am not personally cognisant with them.

5705. Are

5705. Are the men in your trade who take liquor in any considerable quantities persons who have good health, or are their lives frequently bridged by their habits?—I should say that their lives are very much abridged, because we hardly ever see an old man a glass blower. I could go over the names for years past, and I find that they die generally young men, and the mortality must be very great in our trade.

5706. Do you believe that if the public-houses were closed on Sunday it would effect such a break on the drinking habits of the men, especially after the Saturday, as would be salutary to themselves, to their characters, to their families, and in every respect whatever?—Yes, I do; I most fervently believe that; from observations which I have made for years, I believe that Sunday drinking is the prolific source of Monday tippling.

5707. Mr. John Abel Smith.] Would you not include Saturday night?—I would include all Saturday; I would close the public-houses up on Saturday as well as on Sunday.

5708. Chairman.] Would you not include the whole week?—Yes, I would indeed; I have not the slightest doubt of it.

5709. Mr. Baines.] Do you believe that it would tend to improve the health, the morality, the comforts, and the education of the working classes?—Decidedly.

5710. And that is the result of your own personal experience, who have had a very long acquaintance with working men?—Yes; I sat down one night last week and wrote down on a sheet of paper the very flower of our trade, the best men in the trade, men that I personally knew, men who earned fabulous wages, and although they ought to be in a state of complete comfort, they are in a state of abject poverty and rags; I know one case of a man who had earned, according to the clerk's book, for I got it from the manager himself, 3*l.* a-week for 15 years, and during that time I have often seen his wife go to the workhouse for bread; I know another who had earned the same wages at one factory with which I am personally acquainted; he was discharged from the factory in consequence of drunkenness, and the last time I saw his wife she had for underclothes merely a piece of old carpet stitched round her body; and this person was a relative of a wealthy family in Birmingham, who had done all they could to restrain this poor victim from his pernicious habits. And so I could go on ad libitum showing that low wages do not cause intemperance, but that high wages are the prolific source of it.

5711. Do you believe that they would generally be in favour of Sunday closing?—I do indeed.

5712. Do you believe that they would be very much better dressed and have better food and have better houses, and be able to take better care of their children, if the public-houses were closed on the Sunday?—Yes; when I contemplate this fact that there are 11,000 public-houses in London, that there is an expenditure of 3,000,000 l. in drink, I cannot conceive that such a fearful drain from the earnings, and which uses up so much of the wages of the working class, can be attended with anything but disastrous results to the best interests of the class to which I belong.

5713. Are very many of those who have been slaves to the habit of intemperance of the same opinion?—There are thousands who would wish to be delivered from this temptation.

5714. Do they in their sober senses deliberately consider that it would be conducive to their best interests to have Sunday closing?—Decidedly, I think so, from all the inquiries that I make, and they are not a few; I go to them and talk to them and I find that they wish that drink was far away or that they could not purchase it. It seems to me that habit and custom, and appetite, all those things are far stronger than the will of the victim.

5715. Does that appetite when once formed, and especially under such circumstances, so severely trying to those glass blowers, tend to perpetuate itself?—Yes, decidedly.

5716. Does it tend to create an ever fresh craving for liquor?—Yes, it grows upon that which feeds it, like all other narcotics.

5717. Do you know any trade which is more severely trying to the health of those engaged in it than that of a glass blower?—I do not.

5718. Mr. Locke.] Would this drinking take place during the work?—The drinking is not so prevalent during the work now as it was previous to the time when those footings were abolished.

5719. But does drinking take place while the work is going on in the place where the work is done?—No, I cannot complain that there is much drinking in our glass houses during the work.

5720. But is there any?—Yes, there is drinking, and that considerable.

5721. That is on the week day; it does not interfere with Sunday?—No.

5722. I presume that men when they are over those furnaces are sometimes thirsty?—Yes.

5723. And you think it better that they should drink something else than alcoholic drinks?—Yes, I do think so.

5724. That is not a very limited opinion, is it; in the case of people out shooting for instance, a great many people take with them cold tea; that is a thing which you would approve of?—I cannot tell about those people that go out shooting.

5725. When you are at work by the furnace, what do you take?—I generally drink milk and water, or tea, or coffee.

5726. Is that while the work is going on?—Yes.

5727. But it is necessary that they should drink something, is it not?—Yes.

5728. Is not the perspiration tremendously great?—Yes, and when the perspiration is greatest with me I drink the best water I can get.

5729. Good pure water you think is a good thing?—Yes.

5730. And a great quantity is drunk, is there not?—Yes.

5731. And it is necessary that you should do so?—Yes.

5732. Some of them, while the work is going on, drink beer, do they?—Yes.

5733. They do not drink spirits, I suppose?—Yes, they do sometimes.

5734. Pure spirits while work is going on?—Yes.

5735. Is that done in the workshop?—Yes, and in proportion as they drink just in that proportion are they poor and wretched.

5736. Of course they are, if they have not got money enough to pay for it; but what I want to understand is this, whether a great amount of drinking is carried on while the work is going on?—A large amount of drinking goes on while the work is going on, and much injury is done both to employers and men, yet it is not so much that that which I complain of, but you see the glass makers have got a great deal of time on their hands, and unfortunately there are a great number of public-houses about at every corner of the street; wherever you go there is one of those licensed temptations, and my wonder is not that the working men are so bad as they are, but that they are not worse.

5737. But what I understand you to say is, that while the work is going on the drink is consumed on the premises not of the publican, but upon the premises where the works are?—But it is fetched from the public-house of course.

5738. This Bill would not alter that in any way, would it?—Yes, it would.

5739. How would it; they do not drink on Sunday, do they?—Certainly they do; and when a man has been drinking on Sunday, it generally makes him thirsty on Monday; there is no mistake about that.

5740. I suppose, when he has been drinking on Monday he is thirsty on Tuesday?—Just so.

5741. Therefore, your proposition is, that he should not be allowed to drink on any day?—My proposition is, that the law should just do what public opinion demands; that the law should be a reflex of public opinion, as this Bill certainly is.

5742. I understood you just now to express your opinion that there should be no drinking allowed upon any day, and that the public houses should be shut up altogether?—That is, if I had my own way. The question was conditional, and the answer was of a like nature.

5743. Therefore, rather than have none you would be glad to have even a smaller amount of restriction than that?—I would.

5744. But you would like restriction altogether, if you could get it?—My opinion is, that it would be the greatest boon that the Legislature could confer upon this nation.

5745. Do you think it would be a wise and proper thing, even though the promoters of this Bill would not go so far as to say that persons should not be allowed to drink either wine, or spirits, or beer, at all?—I do not think you would need many medical men, or policemen, or gaols, or anything of that sort, if people were to be sober.

5746. Do you think that people who are sober never commit any crimes?—People who are sober commit crime, but there is no incentive to crime from sobriety, whereas there is from drinking and drunkenness.

5747. Do not you find very sober people very often very great thieves and cheats?—I should say that the thieves in general are the offspring of drunken parents.

5748. I mean a higher class of thieves of whom we have seen a great many during the last year or two, men who do not steal a shilling, or take a purse, out of a man's pocket, but who cheat them by millions?—I believe that that remark would hold good with regard to prostitutes, many of whom are well-known thieves, who never get drunk, but who just take as much drink as fire them for their nefarious calling.

5749. My question had no reference to prostitutes, but with regard to the great thieves, is not it the fact that some of the greatest criminals in this country, men who rob the public to an enormous extent, are some of the most sober people in it?—Yes, I believe that is so; and I quite believe that of some of the greatest murderers as well, but that does not destroy the other fact, that the great prolific source of thieving and robbing, and murder, are intoxicants.

5750. But still there are many persons, are there not, who are extremely temperate, and who use their temperance very frequently to get the better of other people who are not quite so temperate, so that crime is not limited entirely to persons who are not total abstainers?—I remember reading a sentence delivered by the Recorder of Hull, Mr. Warren, in which he said that during the time he had been on that bench for a period of ten years, he never had a total abstainer before him, but that nine-tenths of the people who did come before him came from the public-house or the beer-shop.

5751. Are you aware that at the Quarter Sessions where Mr. Warren presides, that class of persons to whom I alluded in my question, are very seldom tried; I mean the great offenders, whose offences are too great for him to try?—I am not aware of anything of the kind; I am only speaking of those whom he has tried.

5752. Those are ordinary cases, are they not, of persons stealing trifling amounts, and so forth?—It would be very easy to show from the judges themselves, what is their view of the great cause of crime. I do not believe that truth can ever beget falsehood, or that virtue can ever beget vice, nor do I believe that sobriety will ever beget the habit of thieving.

5753. You put all the offences upon persons who consume these liquors; and I ask you this, whether very great offences are not committed by persons who do not indulge in liquor at all, and even greater offences?—I do nothing of the kind; I only state what the judges of the land are continually stating. Let me refer you to a statement made by the Rev. John Clay, the chaplain of Preston Gaol for 30 years; he gave in a map in 1855, which map I have studied very carefully; it is a criminal, religious, moral, and educational map of this country. The Rev. John Clay says, that no matter what the condition of a country is, whether it is educated or not, crime is always the reflex of the number of drunkeries in the country.

5754. What sort of crime?—I suppose he speaks of crime in general. I am not here to particularise the crime, but that which is productive of one class of crime, I have a right to infer would be productive of all others.

5755. But there is a very high sort of crime, swindling, and so forth, does that arise from drunkenness?—It was a very high sort of crime which caused President Lincoln to be shot, and the assassin was fired with drink at the time he did it. I call that a very high crime.

5756. Was the man who shot President Lincoln a drunkard?—No, a drunkard would not do it; it is the man who is only moderately drunk; the man whose arm is nerved for the deed of darkness by drink; it is not the drunkard class.

5757. Are you aware whether that man was a man who drank habitually or not?—Decidedly; Booth was an habitual rum drinker.

5758. Was not he mad besides?—Yes, but he was mad, because he took that which made him mad.

5759. Are you quite sure of that?—Positive; for my reading of the American papers proved to me that Booth was a regular rum drinker, or a regular spirit drinker. In the case of the man who murdered Mr. Plow the other day, there was the usual concomitant of murder, the whiskey or the rum flask was found on the murderer.

5760. You

5760. You must be aware that in the Central Criminal Court a great many persons are tried who are not drinkers at all, but who have committed very great offences?—I am not aware that any teetotallers ever go to those places; that is not a place for teetotallers.

5761. I am not speaking of total abstainers, because I never saw above five or six of them, but will you answer my question?—I have a great respect for the Honourable Member, and I should advise him to come into the New Cut next Sunday morning, where we should show him such an immense gathering as will show him what the public opinion of Southwark is with regard to this measure.

5762. You were speaking of those meetings which you have had in the New Cut, where all the people held up their hands; who are those people, do you take them promiscuously?—Yes, they are the passers by; the men who by their stabilities and by their demeanour will show you that they are hard working men.

5763. How is it that you got this class of people to hold up their hands?—We hold a temperance meeting every Sunday; that is to say, those who take a very great interest in all that will reduce this misery and drunkenness, and we hail this Bill as a great blessing, and we speak upon it.

5764. You address anybody who chooses to come round when you are in these places upon temperance?—Upon temperance in general.

5765. And when you finish your address you call upon those people to hold up their hands?—When there is any special measure before the House of Commons such as this, we think it is a good way to test public opinion.

5766. This is not the only question upon which you address them in the New Cut, but it is the only questions upon which you address them on Sunday?—All that we talk about at those meetings is, what a comfortable condition we are in who abstain, compared with the poor victims who use the drink, and when the Legislature has it in hand to further restrict the liquor traffic, we think it is our bounden duty to not only to point out its provisions; but also to show what the effect of the measure would be upon the country at large; and at the close of the meeting we ask them to show their approval or disapproval of it by holding up their hands, and if the Honourable Member will only come there next Sunday morning, I will promise him that 2,000 people will come and see him, and he shall have a hearing on the other side of the question.

5767. Whereabouts will the meeting be?—Close to the Victoria Theatre.

5768. I understand you to say that this was not the only question about which meetings were held?—These are the only questions that we advocate at these meetings.

5769. You hold other meetings likewise, do you not?—I have spoken at political meetings in connection with the Working Men's Association.

5770. In the New Cut?—No, not in the New Cut; I only refer to temperance meetings in the New Cut.

5771. This is the only question that you agitate in the New Cut?—That is all.

5772. You always get a favourable audience, do you?—They are very favourable when they come, no doubt of it, but a speaker can always tell by his audience whether he is appreciated or not. When we speak about the money that is expended in drink and the vice and misery that it engenders, and when we point to the public houses there, flourishing in the midst of the nation, and the ruin that is caused by drink, the moment we show them that that money which is spent in the public-houses is just the absence of so many comforts from poor people, we can see their eyes kindle and their faces light up when they think what a blessed country this would be if it was not for those public-houses.

5773. You mean that it would be very much better if they had the money in their pockets instead of spending it?—I think it would be very much better if they spent the money in a more useful manner.

5774. If they had saved it instead of spending it in drink it would be very much better for them; of course they all agree to that proposition?—They all agree that Mr. Abel Smith's Bill is a first-rate measure for England.

5775. All that you have addressed I am quite satisfied would think so, but do any of them come up and go away in the middle of your discourse?—Yes, they go away if they do not like the matter, just as they would from you or any one else if you were speaking at an election.

5776. As I understand you, the people in the New Cut are extremely polite; but who are those who remain to the end and are disposed to agree with the orator?—They are a class of men that I along with others wish to elevate and improve; but we find that the public-house is the great stumbling-block; Mr. Buxton, the great brewer, said some time ago, in the "North British Review," public opinion ought to guide the number of licenses, and he made use of this observation; he said that the library and the school and the church pitted against the public-house and the beer-shop, is only one stage of the conflict between heaven and hell; and he might have added that his satanic majesty gets the better of them.

5777. What remedy did he suggest?—A Permissive Bill that a certain majority in a parish should decide whether there should be public houses or not. He is an ultra man, is Mr. Buxton, in theory; whatever his practice may be, I do not know.

5778. Where did he write that?—It was written a few years ago; Mr. Lawson quoted it in the House of Commons.

5779. But Mr. Buxton has changed his opinion since that, has he not?—Yes; he found he was hotly pursued by public opinion, and he wanted to veer round, and set his sail for another haven; but somehow or other the words stick there.

5780. Public opinion has convinced him the other way, I suppose?—I cannot enter into his convictions. I can only deal with arguments and facts.

5781. But he has changed; his opinion now is not what is expressed in that pamphlet?—I do not know that he has given any reasons for the change which you say has taken place. Indeed, I do not know that he has changed at all; that is an assumption. He has endeavoured to explain away something, but I do not know what it is. But the facts are too patent for any change of mere opinion.

5782. Chairman.] I think you stated that some time after you went to the trade there was a great reformation wrought about the paying of footings, and you did that by argumentation with the men, did you not?—Yes, it was the negative virtue of abstinence in the man who abstained.

1868.

5783. I want to know whether this great reform that you made in paying footings was done simply by argumentation?—No; it was not made by argumentation; it was made by a law of the representatives of the trade, who saw the mischief and provided the remedy.

5784. It was done by the trade?—Yes; but it was done independently of the education of the masses.

5785. It was done by the trade?—Yes, by the representatives of the trade in conference.

5786. And it was done without the aid of the general law?—Yes; without the aid of the general law.

5787. It was a great reformation, was it not?—Yes.

5788. And done through the influence of the more respectable class of the working men?—Yes.

5789. And done through their intellectual exertion?—Yes.

5790. And their moral feeling?—Yes.

5791. And done without any aid from the law?—Yes.

5792. I want to know why you cannot think that a further reform can be effected by the same means?—Simply because the public-house traffic counteracts that counteractive.

5793. Had you not there the counteractive influence of the public-house?—Only to a very limited extent; and the remedy has been embodied in a law by the trade.

5794. Why cannot the law of the trade put down all drinking whatever?—That is just the position with regard to this measure; we say that public opinion demands the law, and we beg you, the Legislature, to grant it, as the intelligent portion of the glass trade demanded the abolition of those tyrannical customs. They found that it was for their own interest, and the law was embodied in a rule, and passed, and that is what we want from the House of Commons.

5795. Are you not confounding the word law with a rule of your association; I use the word law in a general sense as meaning that which has been passed by the Legislature of the country; but this great reform of which you speak was done by your rule?—I am no word-monger or intellectual posture-master; the principle is just the same in its effect upon those who constitute the glass trade as though it was an Imperial measure, and is analogous to law itself.

5796. You see that it was without the aid of the law, and I want you to consider this; cannot you carry restriction to such a point that attempts at evasion will follow?—I dare say that that same thing might be said of every other law, that all law is evaded; but that is no reason why we should have no law, surely.

5797. Do you not see the great fallacy that you are attempting to put upon me; we put down all thieving because thieving is a bad thing in itself, and we put it down altogether, but eating and drinking are not bad things in themselves; it is only in excess that they are bad; but here is a totally different case. You have to a certain extent, by the aid of the law, improved the morals of the people as regards drinking, and I want you to consider whether you do not think that the law has gone far enough; that it has stretched its powers enough, and that there would be danger of evasion, and all the mischief following upon evasion, if you go further?—The law does not allow every man to sell on Sunday. The law prevents the sale of liquor on Sunday morning; and the law prevents the sale of liquor from one to four on other mornings in the week; and we say that what is bad from one to four in the morning cannot be good from four to seven, and therefore restriction, if logically carried out, is entire prohibition. And only one man in 40 is allowed to sell, so that the present law is really, and, in fact, 39-40ths of prohibition. The Legislature says, and the publicans themselves say, that morals will be outraged, and the floodgates of vice will be opened if the trade in liquor is made perfectly free. Now this is a trade which is created by the breath of the magistrates, so that we might logically call a publican a ticket-of-leave man, because he has his ticket or license on condition that he behaves himself for 12 months; and that is a ticket-of-leave, in fact.

5798. We know what the insinuation is; do not use that phrase, I beg of you?—They have their licenses from year to year, and I should like to know what other trade has its rights created from year to year. If the magistrates can create this trade by a breath, it is the right of the public, surely, to put it down, if it proves injurious to itself.

5799. You have not yet answered my question; will there not be danger of evasion, and does not evasion lead to the vice of hypocrisy, and those mischiefs which arise from hypocrisy?—I do not know that there is any greater danger of evasion under this law than there would be under the existing law; I cannot deal with speculative imaginings.

5800. I want you merely to tell me your opinion; you seem to believe that a partial restriction is quite the same as a total restriction?—My opinion is this, that no human being that ever was created was born with the love of drink.

5801. Pray just answer my question and do not make a speech?—If you will allow me to answer it in my own way I will answer it; I say that the love of drink is acquired just in proportion as facilities are held out for its indulgence.

5802. A legislator sees the mischief of drinking, but, in his endeavours to stop it, a time comes when he finds that restrictions may be followed by mischief; I want to ask you simply whether you have ever considered the danger which the Legislature might create from evasion by passing a too restrictive law?—The only fact I have considered is, that the private drinking it might cause would bear no comparison to the vast amount of public drinking it would prevent; and I contend that the public is the most proper tribunal where restriction should stop. To that tribunal we appeal as to the justice of this measure; we believe the public will hail it as a boon, and my answer once for all is, that I cannot possibly conceive any greater danger of evasion under this proposed law, than I do from the law already existing.

5803. Mr. Horsfall.] You have informed the Committee that you are secretary to the Glass-blowers' Association; does that association consist exclusively of masters or exclusively of men, or does it consist of both?—Exclusively of workmen.

5804. By how many firms are those workmen employed?—There are about 50 of those workmen employed in London in one manufactory, but I have no idea of the firms; we only include numerically the number of the men.

5805. But you know where your men work, do you not?—Yes.

5806. For how many different masters do they work in the association of which you are secretary?—They are spread all over the kingdom, England,

Mr.
J. Leicester.

28 May
1868.

England, Ireland, and Scotland, and I am secretary to the London branch.

5807. How many workmen are there in your association?—About 1,700 all over the kingdom.

5808. In the evidence which you have given, have you been speaking the sentiments of the large majority of those working men?—Yes.

5809. How have you ascertained their opinion?—By conversing with them, by meeting them from week to week, by going from place to place, and having an interchange of ideas with them.

5810. Not only in London but in different parts of the country?—Yes, in other parts of the country.

5811. You stated that there was more drinking on Sunday than on week days; how have you ascertained that?—What I wished to convey to the Committee was, that, considering the time for drinking on Sunday was fortunately limited, there was in the time more drinking than on other days, and that such drinking on Sunday led to Monday tipping.

5812. When you stated that the higher the wages the more drinking there was, I presume you spoke from your own observation?—Yes, I did.

5813. Are you not disposed to vary that opinion when I inform you that we have had directly contrary evidence before this Committee?—I only speak of facts which have come under my own observation.

5814. Can you inform the Committee what was done with the money which was paid for the footings of which you spoke?—It was spent in drink; I wish to inform the Committee that it was not only the mere fact of footings being paid that was so injurious, but every man round the furnace had to pay so much money in addition to the footings, and we have now got rid of all that source of intemperance.

5815. You stated that there was no opposition on the part of the men whom you represent to the measure before the Committee?—Not the slightest.

5816. But there were placards put in the publicans' windows in opposition to it?—Yes.

5817. Were those placards put in any other windows than the publicans'?—I never saw one in any other window than a publican's.

5818. Were they signed with any name?—No; there was always this put to them, that petitions could be signed inside against the Bill.

5819. Did those placards appear to be authorised by any body?—Yes; they were in the publicans' windows.

5820. But there was no direct authority for them from any body or association?—No; not that I am aware of.

5821. Do a large majority of the glass-blowers approve of this Bill?—Decidedly so.

5822. Would they be in favour of further restriction?—I believe they would.

5823. Do you think that they would be in favour of the entire closing of public-houses on Sunday?—I do believe so.

5824. Do you yourself go through any of the hard work which you have been speaking of which is carried on in such intense heat?—Yes; I have been unfortunately working all my life, ever since I was nine years of age.

5825. But you never yourself partook of any spirituous liquor?—Never.

5826. You informed the Committee that there were 11,000 public-houses in London, and that there were 3,000,000 l. spent in them in a year?—0.69...

Yes; 3,000,000 l. are spent in London every year.

5827. How have you ascertained that?—The Temperance League got up a paper that was read at the Social Science Congress, I believe in Newcastle, and there all the facts and all the details about the number of public-houses in the suburbs and in London, and they are set down at somewhere about 14,000, with an annual expenditure of 3,000,000 l.

5828. Mr. Knatchbull Hugessen.] What number of glass-blowers are there in London?—I should think between 200 and 300; about 250.

5829. And by your efforts and example you have obtained considerable influence with that body?—Yes, I have.

5830. But you do not think that your moral influence is sufficient without you have the Legislature to back you in persuading them to abstain from drink?—I do not think so. Moral influence has no chance against the influence of the public-house and beer-shop.

5831. Are you not afraid that the moral influence would be impaired by an addition to the restriction?—Not the slightest; it would be improved.

5832. You have told us that the publicans appealed by placard to the basest passions of the working classes, telling them that their liberty was in danger; do you think that an appeal to the love of liberty is an appeal to the basest passions of the working classes?—That depends upon the spirit in which the appeal is made. When a publican points out that there is a danger to the liberties of the people, and that the liberties of the people are endangered by certain measures, I think that it is an appeal to the very worst passions to excite them against this Bill.

5833. Is not every restriction, whether wisely or unwisely imposed, a diminution of the liberty of those whom it affects?—Certainly.

5834. Then it is not quite inaccurate to say that their liberty is endangered when restriction is about to be imposed?—That is if liberty means license; but you use the word liberty in its absolute unlimited sense.

5835. You take away from a man some freedom which he possessed; in this instance it is the freedom of going to certain places at certain times?—Yes; but you do it in the interest of the public good; and all law has that object in view.

5836. That is your opinion, but that may not be the opinion of those who are about to be deprived of it?—The object of the measure is such; and of the nature and extent of the evil there is no question.

5837. That may be; but would you impose restrictions upon many thousands who are capable of resisting temptation in order to save a minority who are incapable?—The evil is of such a gigantic character that I think the public good in that respect should be the supreme law.

5838. Supposing a man was in the habit of using violent and intemperate language at public meetings, would you put an end to public meetings in order to save him from the temptation?—No; but I cannot see by what reason you class intemperate language with the use of speech.

5839. May there not be moral poison inculcated which may be equally dangerous as physical poison?—You cannot very well do without public speech, and that has no connection with the moral poison of which you speak. Public speaking

Mr. J. Leicester. speaking is a necessity, and this silences everything else.

1868.

5840. Supposing a restriction were to be put upon public meetings, and that persons were to object to that restriction on the ground that the liberty of the subject was in danger, you would not, I think, say that they were at all appealing to the basest passions of the working class?—The law has already put a restriction upon everybody, both in public meetings and everywhere else. The law does not allow me to speak ill of my neighbour.

5841. The law does not allow you to use seditious language, neither does the law allow a man to get drunk and injure his neighbour, is not that so?—Yes, the law already interferes with freedom of speech.

5842. If a man exceeds the proper limit at a public meeting, and if he exceeds the proper limit at a public-house, he comes within the operation of the law?—Yes; but the law says what is proper and what is not; it does not leave it to my ignorance, or prejudice, or intelligence, so that already there is a restriction, that being a restriction in order not so much to punish me as to prevent me from vilifying my neighbour.

5843. The law says what is proper and what is improper at a public-house, so that if a man gets drunk and disorderly, or injures his neighbour, he is equally under the operation of the law?—Yes; but I wish the Committee to notice that no man has a right to get drunk and disorderly; the law has that to prevent, but public-houses antagonise the law, and produce the very evils the law intended to put down; the law puts its legal muzzle upon the sellers, and says who shall and who shall not sell. So that the principles of Mr. Smith's Bill is really embodied in the existing law.

5844. You are now going away from the point that I want to make; if you begin to establish this restriction with regard to this physical poison, are you not afraid that it may be extended so as to affect other things?—I wish the Committee to understand that I am quite aware of my logical stand-point. I at once admit that good law may be put to bad purposes. The Emperor of the French may put down the freedom of the press, but surely that is no reason why immoral prints should be tolerated in England. The nature and extent of the evils alone must decide the lawful remedy; and I believe this measure will be productive of great national good.

5845. Are you in favour of the Permissive Bill?—Decidedly I am.

5846. Do you think that the localities can settle for themselves with regard to all these cases either in London or elsewhere?—Yes, I think, they are the proper tribunal.

5847. That is a very tangible argument; if that is your opinion, how do you advocate a Bill by which the central Legislature imposes a restriction upon the opinion of localities?—Because it is simply a reflex of public opinion even then.

5848. Would you be satisfied with this measure, or would you take it as an instalment?—I shall not be satisfied with the reduction of any wrong; whenever a wrong is reduced, it never makes the remainder right.

5849. You consider a public-house a wrong?—I do, and so does the law.

5850. And you will not be satisfied until public-houses are shut up altogether?—Decidedly.

5851. Mr. Yorke.] With regard to glass-blowers you say that they get 3*l.* or 4*l.* a-week wages?—The best workmen do.

5852. Down to what is the lowest?—Down to 30*s.*; say from 30*s.* to 40*s.*; there are three gradations, the lowest perhaps is about 23*s.* or 24*s.* a-week.

5853. I presume that they are not men as a body who would be inconvenienced by not being able to get beer at the public-houses?—I believe that they would be satisfied to put up with the inconvenience, provided the temptation was removed.

5854. Men who have wages varying from 25*s.* to 3*l.* or 4*l.* a-week, would be in a position to have a stock of beer in their own houses?—Yes, they would.

5855. Do you think that the operation of this Act would have any material effect in diminishing the amount of drunkenness among those men?—I believe that the further you remove the temptation, the more you diminish the drinking.

5856. But if, as I understand you, it is in their power to have as much drink as they please at home, being in a position to buy beer in considerable quantities, is it not the case that they, at any rate, are not the class who would be subject to inconvenience by this Bill?—I do not properly understand your question.

5857. When you say that those men are in a position to have a stock of beer in their own houses, if there is any class that would be inconvenienced by this Bill, it is not those men whom you represent?—No; they would not be inconvenienced if they were inclined to follow the advice indicated with regard to having it at home, but I question whether they would do so. My point is, that if the facilities were removed, they would not indulge either at home or anywhere else.

5858. You think that if the facilities of which they are not obliged to avail themselves, namely, the public-houses, were removed, they would not drink at home?—I do believe that.

5859. There is another point of view in which I think restriction ought to be viewed; do you not consider that it is degrading to its objects, and that when you inflict a restriction on a man of this description, you are, to a certain extent, lowering him in his own estimation?—No; I do not at all think so, because the measure itself is a demand of the people.

5860. Are you not treating him more like an animal than as a reasonable, rational being, when you tell him that at certain hours he shall not go to a place which he has been in the habit of frequenting, without his doing any harm there?—That may be said against all law. I presume no man born in a civilised state has a right to absolutely unlimited liberty.

5861. Is he not entitled to liberty, so far as he does not use it either to hurt himself or other people?—Yes; but the public-house does injure other people; that is the point.

5862. That is your statement?—That is the state of the respectable publicans themselves, and of the judges of the land.

5863. Is that doctrine tenable from any other point of view than that of a total abstainer?—Yes, it is the true policy of the State.

5864. Do you mean to say that from any other point of view, except that of the total abstainer, moderate drinking is a harm in itself?—I cannot answer what the case of moderate drinking would be, whether it would do so, or not; but I know this, that the State has imposed restrictions upon the public house, and has done so upon the grounds of public morality; even the Government has not dared to make the trade free, and wherever wherever it has been tried in any locality, as it has been in Liverpool, it has been a curse unmitigated.

5865. Do you not shrink from inflicting inconvenience on moderate drinkers, simply on account of those who may use their facilities for getting drink immoderately?—We say to moderate drinkers, "Get your drink if you can; but not at the expense of public morality, because you cannot, by any possibility, separate the public-house from the evils they cause."

5866. Is it not the fact that there is a very large class of men, lodgers and others, in London, who would be placed in great difficulty if this Bill were passed?—Yes, but the law surely is not to wait upon my convenience before it makes laws for the public good. I conceive that there never would be any law made, if that were the case.

5867. I understand you to say that any minority, however considerable, must give way if it can be proved that there is a large class of men for whose good a restriction ought to be imposed?—I believe that the Legislature ought to legislate according to the light they have, and if they conceive that it would be a great national blessing to place a restriction upon anything which causes vice, however the minority might suffer, it would be the duty of the Government to place that restriction.

5868. Chairman.] Is not the contrary proposition also true, that if they think it is for the public good that they should not impose restriction, they ought not to impose restriction?—I quite agree with that.

5869. Mr. Yorke.] Would not your doctrine so laid down extend much further than you appear to think; would not it go to putting down, for instance, racing, and sports of all kinds?—I do not see that the training a horse has anything to do with horse-racing, seeing that there are so many other and legitimate uses to which horses can be applied; I do not see any connection between training horses and horse-racing; the one is by no means a sequence of the other.

5870. Are there not a great many public amusements which are liable to abuse from various causes, if people choose to abuse them, and would not your doctrine extend to the prohibition of all such sports, if a reckless minority of persons are injured by them, if they are carried to excess?—I cannot answer all those questions. I am not disposed just now to trouble myself with regard to what may follow from other sources of evil. One fact is evident that this is a gigantic source of evil which every judge in the land admits, and the publicans themselves also.

5871. Have you in your mind all the consequences of the doctrine which you have laid down; take, for instance, a day like the Derby; all would be willing to conceive that a large amount of mischief may have resulted from that race yesterday to various persons who were inclined to abuse the amusement; but would you be in favour, on that account, of putting down a day of that description?—If the circumstances demanded it and the people required it, I should, very decidedly so.

5872. Would you not prefer, if you could, in this matter of Sunday drinking, to use some milder method before resorting to prohibition?—We have tried the milder method.

5873. Would you prefer prohibition to a milder method, if it appeared that some milder method would be likely to succeed?—You tried it in Liverpool for three years. I have the speech of

Mr. Coleridge, the Member of Parliament, at the Licensed Victuallers' dinner, in which he says, that, in consequence of the free trade in drink, poverty, death and crime has been quadrupled, quintupled; that is in Mr. Coleridge's speech delivered two days ago.

5874. What was the milder method which had been tried in Liverpool?—Free trade.

5875. I mean, for instance, if you were to try and induce people by other attractions on the Sunday to desert the public-houses, and amuse themselves in a more rational way?—This at once admits the evil of public-houses, an evil which counteracts the counteractive of which you speak.

5876. Would you not prefer to resort to some other method, such as attractions of various kinds to compete with the attractions of the public-house, such attractions for instance as the Crystal Palace, the Museums, or the Parks with music in them, and attractions of that description?—Highbury Barn is a place which no father would take his daughter to, and so are Cremorne Gardens; what is it which makes the difference between Cremorne and Kew, between Highbury Barn and Kensington Gardens; simply this, the one is infested with public-houses, the other is not. Surround Kew and Kensington with the same influences, and you will have the same results. I am in favour of everything moral, and humanising, and onward; but I do not believe that the public-houses are places anywhere productive of good, but always of evil.

5877. I understand that you would prefer that places of the description that you have mentioned should be open on Sunday to compete with the public-house?—When I was in Paris I saw a great deal that staggered my belief in that kind of tinkering, if I may say so without offence. I saw that they are perhaps the most pleasure-loving people on the face of the earth, and, I think, the most wicked. I do not think that you can dance people into morality, or fiddle them into virtue, or theatre them into goodness.

5878. But you think you can bring them by Act of Parliament to temperance?—I believe that where the Legislature sees that public opinion demands a beneficial measure for its own protection, it would be wise to grant it.

5879. Mr. Evans.] I think you have lived in London for some years?—Yes.

5880. Do you think that on the whole temperance has diminished or increased during late years?—I should require a great deal of information to answer that question; but here is one point, that there are thousands and tens of thousands of men who do not use these drinks at all, and yet when I look at the returns I find that 88,000,000 l. last year was expended on drink, and I am sure that every time I go out I see all those public-houses filled with inebriates; and if anybody will go into the great centres of population in London, he will find that it is most startling. If he walks down Regent-street, the Haymarket, or round about the New Cut and Seven Dials, he will see that it is all a reeking mass of abomination in consequence of drink.

5881. Do you consider that a larger or a smaller proportion of the population are in the habit of getting drunk now, than was the case, say, 10 years ago?—I think that drunkenness is quite as prevalent as it ever was; I do not think that it has diminished at all.

5882. Mr. Locke.] You state that 88,000,000 l. is expended in drink; where do you get that from?—From the Returns of the Revenue.

Mr.
J. Leicester.
—
28 May
1868.

5883. That 88,000,000 l. includes every species of drink, wine, spirits, beer, and everything, does it not?—Yes, everything inclusive.

5884. Is that for England, Wales, Scotland, and Ireland, altogether?—Yes, the United Kingdom.

5885. Have you dissected that so as to be able to say how much applies to wine and how much to other things?—No; I have only read Mr. Porter's "Progress of the Nation," and a speech delivered by Lord John Russell in 1854, in the House of Commons, in which he said that on the average every family in Great Britain expends 6 s. per week in drink.

5886. This 88,000,000 l. would include the consumption of wine, spirits, and everything else in every private house or public place throughout the three kingdoms?—Yes; I may say that if you could bring any possible influence to bear to raise the wages of the working class 6 s. per week, you would be about the greatest benefactor to a very large piece of the human race.

5887. Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen.] I thought you said just now that in proportion as the wages are higher there is more drinking?—Yes; as far as my own observation went; I did not mean that in an unqualified sense.

5888. Mr. Locke.] Seeing that that 88,000,000 l. is mostly spent by a number of people who are not drunkards, but who do still think it necessary that they should have these things to drink, it is part of their food and support, is it not?—Yes; but it rather amuses me to hear gentlemen talk about the food which is contained in these intoxicating drinks.

5889. There are some persons that die from gluttony, are there not?—Yes.

5890. And there are other persons who think that it is absolutely necessary with their dinner to take some good wine and whose food would very much disagree with their stomachs if they did not do so, and probably many who, if they only drank water with their dinner would be very sick and uncomfortable, and you would debar those people from having their wine with their meals; you have laid great stress upon milk; but although milk may agree with you, other people may dislike it excessively; supposing a man were eating a tolerably good dinner and he were to drink a tumbler of milk, there are hundreds and thousands of men who would be sick; would you recommend that?—But my reply to that is this, that if I could not get my milk without those evils attending it, then my milk ought to be put under the same restriction as this drink.

5891. Do you mean that if milk made the majority of people sick, you ought not to have any more milk?—No, I mean to say that if that milk was productive of so much poverty and crime as these drinks are, I must get my milk as I like, but not at the expense of the public good.

5892. But supposing the majority of people are made sick by milk, ought you not to give way and never drink any more?—If the public good demands that milk should not be used, of course the case would be exactly the same. But Dr. Lancaster has entirely settled that matter at the Kensington Museum; he has analysed the materials in a quart of ale, and he says that there is only about half-an-ounce of solid matter in 40 ounces, while you can get water for nothing.

5893. Colonel Fane.] You have used the words "public opinion" very often; are you not aware that an Act was passed in 1854, which was called Mr. Wilson Patten's Act, in which there was less restriction than in this Bill?—Yes.

5894. And that public opinion cried out so that it was rescinded the next year by Parliament?—I am not aware that public opinion did it.

5895. Was not the Bill rescinded in consequence of a cry, I do not say where it came from, but it was an outcry, and the Bill was rescinded in the following year?—Yes, but there was a national outcry, that that opposition was got up by interested parties.

5896. If that was the public opinion, it is very much changed now; as you say, it is universally in favour of the present Bill?—I deny in toto that public opinion ever demanded the abolition of Mr. Wilson Patten's Act.

5897. It has been proved before us that there was a cry. I do not say by whom it was got up, but you do not think that Parliament was likely to attend to a mere public-house cry, although they rescinded that Act the following year?—I should be perfectly ashamed of the class of working men who mixed with this disgraceful mob for the purpose of putting down Mr. Wilson Patten's Act. That there was a mob I quite admit.

5898. The expression of public opinion was so strong that Parliament rescinded it the following year?—The expression of the opinion of that particular class was so strong, but not of the whole nation.

5899. Mr. Baines.] Do you remember the facts of the year 1854?—Yes.

5900. Do you remember whether there were any riots at all during the 10 or 11 months after the passing of Mr. Wilson Patten's Act?—There were not any riots for some months after the Bill had become law.

5901. You are aware, are you not, that Lord Robert Grosvenor, now Lord Ebury, introduced a Bill relative to Sunday trading, which it was apprehended would make Mr. Wilson Patten's Act much more stringent than it was before?—I am aware of that.

5902. And you are probably aware that the riots immediately followed the introduction of Lord Ebury's Bill, and not the passing of Mr. Wilson Patten's Act?—I am quite aware of that.

5903. Is that really the state of things with regard to that Act?—That is the state of things.

5904. Would it not, then, be a mistake to ascribe those riots to Mr. Wilson Patten's Act?—Decidedly so.

5905. The riots really sprung from Lord Ebury's Bill?—Decidedly so.

5906. Mr. Locke.] Mr. Wilson Patten's Act was repealed the next year, was it not?—Sir George Grey, the then Home Secretary, publicly declared, in his place in the House of Commons, that the Act was working beneficially, and was in harmony with public sentiment; and he further stated, that throughout the whole country there had not been any manifestation of opposition to the measure.

5907. But it was repealed the next year?—It was repealed the next year, in consequence of the fears which was aroused by interested parties who were in favour of Sunday trading, and who got up those riots in Hyde Park. Mr. Berkeley's Committee was sitting at the time, and presented its Report just as these riots had produced the desired effect. That report was presented to Parliament before one provincial witness had been examined, although many witnesses had tendered their services to be examined in favour of the Bill.

5908. Mr.

5908. Mr. Baines.] You do not think that the frame in which that Bill was passed was particularly creditable to Parliament?—I think it was disgraceful.

5909. You have in your hand a book containing what Mr. Abel Smith states to be a return made to the Austrian Government, of the quantity of intoxicating drinks of various kinds consumed annually in Great Britain and Ireland; will you state what is the amount put down for British spirits?—£. 20,811,115.

5910. What amount is put down for foreign and colonial spirits?—£. 8,415,271.

5911. What amount is put down for wines?—£. 10,794,314.

5912. What amount is put down for malt liquors?—£. 48,599,066.

5913. What is the total of all intoxicating drinks?—£. 88,619,876.

5914. Out of that 88,619,876 £. only 10,794,384 £. is for wines of all kinds?—That is so.

5915. And 77,825,452 £. is for spirits and beer?—Yes.

5916. Mr. Locke.] Does that include British wines?—There are no British wines in the Return; at least, they are not classified as such.

5917. What is that Return?—It is an account made up by the Consul at Liverpool for the Austrian Government at their request last year.

5918. What does the population amount to by whom those things are consumed?—29,768,000.

5919. Mr. Baines.] Do you believe that the bread of the people costs as much as that?—I cannot answer that question, but I should say it was nothing near it.

5920. Mr. John Abel Smith.] Do you think that illicit drinking in unlicensed houses would be increased by the operation of such a Bill as that before the Committee?—I do not consider that it would be increased at all, but greatly diminished.

5921. Even if it were increased, the benefit of the restriction would be out of all proportion to the evil of the illicit drinking if it were not carried to any great extent?—That is my opinion.

5922. You are quite aware of what I mean by illicit drinking, and you know that there is drinking carried on in unlicensed houses at present?—Yes.

5923. But you do not believe that that would be beyond the control of the police if this Bill were to become law?—Decidedly not; I believe that the more you remove the temptation the more the habits of drinking will die out.

Mr. WILLIAM COCKBURN, called in; and Examined.

5924. Mr. John Abel Smith.] You are the Manager of Messrs. Pease's ironstone mines in Yorkshire?—Yes; and also of some limestone mines in Durham.

5925. How long have you been so employed?—Fourteen years.

5926. And previously what was your employment?—I was in the colliery districts of the counties of Northumberland and Durham in various capacities for 18 years.

5927. Then you are one of those persons who have had the pride and satisfaction of feeling that you have raised yourself by your own exertions from an inferior position?—I am very glad to say I am.

5928. What did you begin as?—I began when I was between 13 and 14 years of age, and I went down into the pit to be an overman's assistant, to lead timber.

5929. How many men and boys have you under your direction now?—I have fully 2,600 men, but there are about 10,000 people, including children, depending upon those 2,600 men.

5930. How many tons of ore do all those mines raise per month?—We turn out upwards of 100,000 tons per month.

5931. This position enables you to be entirely cognisant of the feelings, the wishes, and the habits of a very large mass of the labouring population?—Yes, it does.

5932. Have you ever taken any account of the per-centage of the men who are off work on Mondays, Tuesdays, and Wednesdays, from January 1865 to April 1868?—Yes, I have.

5933. Will you be so good as to tell the Committee what that number is?—In 1865, in the Upleatham Mine, where we pay once a fortnight, in the first week after the pay, I get 14 per cent. off work on Monday, Tuesday, and Wednesday, and in the three following days, Thursday, Friday, and Saturday, I get nine per cent. off. I might say that I average from the workings of the men on the three first days and the three last days of the week a difference of some 0.69.

thing like about 14 per cent. On the first three days of the following week, I get 13 per cent. off, while on the latter three I only get eight per cent. off, and I also find that at the Lofthouse Mines, taking them identically in the same position, as I have just now stated to the Committee; as to the other mines, I get 25 per cent. off on the first three days of the week, and 16 in the latter three; and on the following week I get 21 per cent. off on the first three days, and 15 per cent. on the other three days.

5934. Chairman.] How do you account for their being off; is it because they get tipsy, or is it because they like a holiday?—On the Monday, Tuesday, and Wednesday, it is from the effects of their drinking principally on the Sabbath-day.

5935. Mr. John Abel Smith.] Now, will you go on with 1867?—In 1867, taking them in this way at the Upleatham Mines, I found on the first three days 15 per cent. off, and 10 per cent. on the other three days, and the same thing in the remaining portion of the days of the week; and I find, on comparing the Monday with the Thursday, that I have 17 per cent. off at Upleatham on the Monday morning, and I have 9 per cent. off on the Thursday, while at Lofthouse I have 21 per cent. off on the Monday, against nine on the Thursday.

5936. To what do you attribute that great difference of attendance on those two days which you have named?—I can only attribute it to the men being in the habit of going to the public-house on the Sabbath-day. I live in a little country village, and I frequently have an opportunity of seeing it so on the Sabbath-day. I not unfrequently, from my own knowledge of the men, seeing the men that are off work, have found that they are the men that I have seen going there on the Sabbath-day.

5937. What sort of wages do those men get?—Their average net wages are 4 s. 5½ d. per day clear money, or 27 s. a-week.

5938. What is the condition of those men as to personal comfort in their houses and families? —As a rule, I think the working men by whom I am surrounded, are, on the whole, very comfortable indeed. There are exceptions, and they are more prevalent than I should like to see them, and those exceptions are arising from the men who neglect their work in the way they do. There are a great many evils attending that, inasmuch as miners leaving off work on Monday and Tuesday, and sometimes even on the Wednesday, when they come on the other three days, they exert themselves to the very utmost, so that they are reducing their physical strength very much; and more than that, they are in a great measure more careless on the other three days, and liable to a greater per-centage of accidents arising from that than they otherwise would be.

5939. Mr. Locke.] Do they work piece-work? —Yes.

5940. Mr. John Abel Smith.] Have you any account of the comparative number of accidents on the Monday and on the other days? —No, I have not worked that out, but I know that it is so. I could not actually state in figures at the present time what it is, but I know from the facts which I get from the hospital book the entries of those who are admitted on Mondays, Tuesdays, and Wednesdays, and on Thursdays, Fridays, and Saturdays. We keep a regular register.

5941. I suppose very considerable pains have been taken with the workmen under your control to improve their habits, and promote their education and self respect? —To a very great extent I am very glad to say that is so; my employers have supplied them with schools, with libraries, and with reading rooms; they have also supplied them with cricket clubs, and quoit clubs, and with a hospital, and, in case of accident in the mines, we keep them in the hospital the whole time that that accident incapacitates them from working, and we give his family 5 s. per week, independent of that.

5942. Under that treatment you probably have seen very great improvement in the habits, manners, and feelings of those men? —Undoubtedly; I consider that we have one of the best set of men; the 2,600 men that we have I consider to be the very cream of Yorkshire.

5943. Have you not seen during your experience a very considerable improvement in the manners, habits, and feelings, of the men? —Decidedly so.

5944. And do you attribute some portion of that to the restrictive laws at present in force on drinking? —Yes, I do.

5945. Do you consider that those restrictive laws have assisted the objects and the efforts of your employers? —I am quite satisfied that they have, and of the working men themselves, too.

5946. Do you believe that that restriction might be carried further with benefit? —Yes.

5947. What do you think would be the feelings of those working men, if restriction was carried further? —The major part of them would wish to see it carried further.

5948. Are any large proportion of those men in favour of total closing on the Sunday? —There are a few.

5949. Do those men attend any place of religious worship, generally? —Yes, they do, a very great number of them. At Old Mask we have 172 scholars in the Zetland school, and 40 in the infant school. In a private school that there is at Mask there are 54 scholars and 31 infants, and at New Mask, which is entirely under our own control, there are 105 children attending the schools, that is the day schools; and on the Sunday there are 155 attendants in the Church schools; 111 in the Wesleyans, 100 in the Primitive Methodists, and 136 in the New Mask school. We have four places of worship; New Mask has not a church; there is only a room, and various parties who wish to go there and worship may do so; it is open to the whole of them; it is unsectarian.

5950. To go back for a moment to the question of the number losing work on certain days in the week, have you made any table or turned your attention to the actual amount of loss per week per man? —Yes, I have.

5951. What do you make it to be? —I find, on looking over it, and making calculations, that if every man were working with the exception of about one-sixth who were off work from natural causes over which they have no control, the proportion of days in the week would be 5·92 which is nearly equal to six days per week, while on the other hand, taking off the per-centage for sick men, I find that the proper per-centage works out only 5·14 which is equal to ·78, or say three-fourths of a day each man per week.

5952. Which you attribute to drinking on the Sunday? —Yes; I would not say that I attribute it all to drinking; I qualify that by saying that there was a certain portion off work from other circumstances which had no connection with drinking.

5953. Then that entails a proportionate loss on the owners of property, as well as on the men themselves, does it not? —It entails very serious loss upon the owners of property themselves, and not only upon them, but upon all the various works which are depending upon their works, as they are the producers of the raw material, and there is the same staff to keep for the Monday, Tuesday, and Wednesday, of clerks and officers, and men about the place, as there is on the Thursday, Friday, and Saturday; and that gives something like three-halfpence more per ton in the working cost for the first three days. Then the railway company has to keep the same number of engines to carry out the stuff, and they have to go out very frequently with a certain quantity of stuff. Their proper loads are 250 tons, but they have to go out very often with little more than one-half of that, and thereby they are increasing the cost to the railway company very materially; but the greatest of all costs is this, that the furnaces which are kept at work during the Sunday want a greater supply of stone on the Monday, and the men being off work to the extent of the per-centage which I have stated, the furnaces cannot really get their proper supply, and therefore they are not infrequently caused to lay off some of their men, and also to reduce the blast in the furnaces, which is very detrimental to them indeed; one can scarcely realise or calculate the extent of loss that it is to them.

5954. Therefore, in the district of which you speak, the consequences of Sunday drinking are very extensive in its injurious effects both on the men and on the masters? —I consider it so.

5955. Have you read or looked at the Bill which has been referred to this Committee? —Yes, I have; I have it before me.

5956. Do you, on the whole, approve of the provisions of that Bill? —I do; I think it would be an improvement.

5957. D

5957. Do you believe that the inconveniences which it would occasion to some persons are to be put against the great public advantage to the community?—No; I do not think that those ought to stand in the way of it.

5958. Do you believe that many men would be inconvenienced by being prevented from working on the premises on Sunday?—As far as my own knowledge is concerned, from the fact that I have under me, I do not think there is a great proportion that would be inconvenienced.

5959. Do you believe that public opinion in that district, on the whole, would be in favour of such a Bill as this?—I have heard the men and a good few of the inhabitants round about express their approval of the Bill.

5960. And you have no idea that if such a Bill became law it would be received with riotous public disturbance or resistance by the working men?—No, certainly not; I think that the majority of the working men will hail it as a boon.

5961. Why do you think so?—Because I have heard it from the men. Not 100 yards from my front door, when I was coming home one night, I met a man what we would technically term half-seas-over, and he says, "Shall I have work, Mr. Cockburn, to-morrow?" I said, "I think it is a pity that you have stayed away from it to-day," and he said, "I would not have stayed away if the public-house had been closed on Sunday." I said, "Why did you go into it at all?" He said, "I was thirsty, and I went in, and I could not help myself; I could not get away, and if I had not had the opportunity of going in, I could have been at my work;" and I believe the man was speaking the truth, because when he does do a thing of that description it invariably leads to that end with him.

5962. Have there been any memorials from anybody that you know of to the magistrates against further licensing?—Yes, I saw myself a memorial presented to the magistrates at Gainsborough at the Brewster sessions, signed by between 300 and 400 of our men against licensing another public-house in Mask.

5963. Did you use your influence with them to make them sign it?—I did not; I never mentioned it to them beyond reproving them when they are off their labour.

5964. I understand you to be strongly in favour of such legislation as is proposed in the Bill before the Committee?—Quite so.

5965. And further than that, you think that the improved and improving habits of the working men in your district would be further advanced by legislation in that direction?—I think so, and I think it is the opinion of the majority of the working men themselves by whom I am surrounded.

5966. Colonel Fane.] Are there any lodgers amongst the number of men that you speak of?—Yes.

5967. How would they get provisions and a glass of beer on Sunday if every public-house was closed?—They could take it home by this Bill.

5968. Supposing they lived a considerable distance off, it is very difficult to carry beer about in that way, as it destroys to a great extent its pleasantness; therefore, would not it entail a great inconvenience upon them to have to carry it home?—I do not think that the men, as a whole, as a general rule, would feel that an inconvenience.

5969. We have also had it in evidence here that there are certain classes of people in London who, without being in the least drunken, choose to have a holiday on Monday, particularly tailors to a great extent, and many other classes who do no work on Monday; does that apply at all in the iron districts in the same way?—I think it does not.

5970. You think that there is no such thing as taking holidays on Monday without some reason, before which this might arise?—No, not with us.

5971. Chairman.] You never heard of St. Monday, did you?—I have heard tell of it when I was in the counties of Durham and Northumberland; but I have been now nearly 14 years in Yorkshire; and I was six years in Durham before, and I never knew of that being put into operation once during that time.

5972. Mr. John Abel Smith.] Have you excursion trains, flower shows, and various things of that kind, which the masters lend themselves to?—Yes, we have; but inasmuch as we live in one of the prettiest districts in the country, excursion trains are really not appreciated. They are not patronised by the working classes as they are in towns where men are shut up, because we live in the open country, and have a most magnificent view all round us. If you give them a good cricket club and good reading rooms, and a quoit ground, I think that they are content with the scenery round about their own neighbourhood, and do not wish to go off on excursions.

5973. Mr. Locke.] Have they any special amusements on Sunday?—None at all.

5974. How do they employ themselves on Sunday?—A very great proportion of them go to churches and chapels, and the other percentage that I have been speaking about, the one-sixth off employment mostly when they can get into a public-house go there, and spend their money there.

5975. They do not go out for a walk, or anything of that sort?—Sometimes they do; of course, they do not stay in the house.

5976. If there were any recreation for them on the Sunday, do not you think that those persons who now go to public-houses would be induced to forsake them?—I do not know whether they would appreciate public amusements on Sunday in the district that I am living in; I have no reason to think so.

5977. Supposing there were a band of music for them to listen to, what would you say?—I think their ideas of morality are such, that they would be shocked at the idea of it in the district where I live.

5978. It appears that a certain portion of them go to church and chapel, and the rest go to the public house?—Yes.

5979. What do you think that the residuum would do supposing the public-houses were shut on Sunday?—I think that if the public-houses were shut they would either go abroad and enjoy the beauties of creation, or else they would go to a place of worship; that is my idea.

5980. You think that the public-houses being open prevents their going abroad?—Yes.

5981. And likewise prevents their going to a place of worship?—Yes, quite so; a man cannot serve two masters at once.

5982. Chairman.] I take it that the population round you, generally speaking, are a moral and kindly population, are they not, at the present time?—Generally they are.

Mr. W.

28 May
1868.

5983. Would you say, speaking of them as a class, that they were a drunken population?—No, I would not.

5984. You would say that they were a sober population?—As a class they are; the men that I am speaking about, as a class are a sober class of men.

5985. I take it that generally speaking you would say this, that they were a good kind-hearted moral population?—There is no doubt about that.

5986. And that under the present law?—Yes, and that under the present law.

5987. Have you seen in your time any great improvement in the manners and habits and feelings of that class with which you are connected?—Yes, I should say I have.

5988. At the present time have not your generous employers, now and then, the means of improving their minds and their habits?—Yes.

5989. And you are very well gratified by the improvement you have seen?—Yes, I am satisfied with it as far as it has gone.

5990. From your observation I gather that the population round about you are what is termed a strictly religious population?—No, I would not say a strictly religious population.

5991. You talked about their feeling it to be contrary to morality to have music on Sunday in the open air?—It is quite so; they have two bands in the village, or a very short distance off, and it is the last thing that they would think about to have those bands out playing on the Sabbath-day.

5992. That comes round to what I said, that they are a rather strict population as regards religious habits and manners?—I do not know that we must apply that directly to religion; we must apply it to morals more than to religion.

5993. You think that, that it is a correct statement, that they are a highly moral population?—Yes, I do.

5994. And that under the present law?—Yes.

5995. You attribute, I suppose, I do not say all the effects, but a great many of the effects, to the restrictions in the present law?—I do.

5996. Has it ever entered into your mind that restriction has a limit?—Yes; decidedly so.

5997. And that beyond that limit there is danger?—Yes.

5998. What makes you believe that we have not reached that limit now?—From my own experience; seeing men coming out of those public houses, I think if the limit was closely applied to them, and the liquor removed from them altogether on the Sabbath-day, they would appreciate it.

5999. Would you go for the entire closing of public-houses on the Sunday?—Yes, I would, certainly.

6000. Taking the wages of your men, could not they get all they want to drink on the Saturday?—Yes, quite so.

6001. They have a good deal of leisure, have they not, in spite of churches and chapels, on Sunday?—They are pretty regular in church and chapel going, I am quite certain, but they may have leisure as well.

6002. A great number of persons have told us that there is great mischief in leisure; people do not know exactly how to employ their time, and, when facilities come, they drink?—It is an old adage that a certain person finds work for idle hands to do.

6003. And there is another one, that the mother of mischief is no larger than a midge's wing?—Yes.

6004. But that being the case, do not you think that a confirmed drunkard, a fellow who was determined to get drunk, would order in on Saturday night quite enough to occupy him on Sunday?—I quite believe so; but it is my own opinion, which I am here to express, that the selling out system is doing as much harm to our working population as is done by their going and drinking at the public-house; I mean that we have a shop beside us in the village where they sell out spirituous liquor, and the people take it away, and there is no doubt that a large proportion of the drunkenness arises from that cause as well as from drinking in the public-house.

6005. Increased restriction on the Sunday would no doubt induce those persons to get more on the Saturday preparatory to the Sunday; do not you think that the limit of restriction is already arrived at, and that it would be dangerous to put on further restriction, even in that point of view?—I do not think so; it is my candid opinion that restriction has not arrived at the proper pitch yet that it should do.

6006. Restriction, you think, has not yet arrived at the dangerous point?—No.

6007. Under the present restriction, you tell me that great mischief is done by the sending-out system?—Yes.

6008. If you increase the restriction, do not you think that still greater mischief would arise from the sending-out system?—Not if it was applied to that system of sending-out as a system alone.

6009. But why?—Because, if it was applied to that, you could not get it; but then this is only dealing with a Sunday Closing Bill; it is not dealing with a prohibitory measure altogether.

6010. Supposing that A. B. is a man who likes drink, and will have it, and the law says you shall not drink in a public-house on Sunday, he has plenty of wages, with a certain sum of money in his hand on Saturday, and he says, "I will look out in time; I will get a pint of gin in my own house to drink on Sunday;" he sends for it to the public-house, and he brings it home, and when it is in his own house, being nearer to him, the facilities are increased by that means?—To a certain extent it is so; but there are not many men amongst the working class that I am now amongst, who stick entirely to spirituous liquors; they drink more beer, I think.

6011. Do you not think that beer would be injured by being brought home?—I think that a man could buy on Saturday night as much as would suffice till Monday morning.

6012. Could not he send for it in a larger quantity?—He would only send for a moderate quantity.

6013. Why should he only send for a moderate quantity, when, by the supposition (and of course we are dealing with the supposition) the man likes drink; why should he not send for quite a sufficient quantity to make him tipsy?—Simply for this reason; if he was sending for a sufficient quantity to make him tipsy, in my experience of working men, there are not many men who go and sit down and get tipsy alone; they like to have some company with them, and if they were to go and sit and drink in their own homes, the owners or proprietors of the mines or the iron-works have the control over those cottages, and they would be called to account about it, and therefore

Mr. W.
Cockburn.
28 May
1868.

Therefore there would be a restriction put upon them in that shape.

6014. Supposing John Brown, which is a very common name, has a very great friend John Smith, and those two want to tiddle together. John Brown says to John Smith, you know by a new law they have shut up the public-house next door, and we shall not be able to get there to-morrow; will you club with me, and we will have plenty of drink, and you will come and drink with me, and I will drink with you next Sunday?—Yes; but suppose John Brown were employed by James Evans, and James Evans knew that John Brown had a love of drink, and that at once, he would say, I will take care that you do not stop there and have drink in my house next Sunday.

6015. Those men are there; they are doing nothing against the public. John Brown and John Smith drink together, and get fuddled together; has Mr. Evans any right to ask whether a man has got fuddled in his house, or not?—If he can get two men who will do their work equally as well as those two men who are getting drunk in that way, he is justified in removing those two men, and not keeping them any longer in his place.

6016. But if there was a pressure of business, do you think that Mr. Evans would go to such a length as that?—Yes, I believe there are some cases in the North Riding that would go to that length.

6017. What sort of proportion do they bear to the whole?—I cannot speak to that, but I know it is almost an invariable rule in the North Riding of Yorkshire, to allow no drinking, whether upon the works, nor yet in their houses.

6018. You give a very different description of your workmen from what we have just now received of the glass-blowers?—I am giving a truthful description.

6019. I have no doubt of it; do not for an instant suppose that I disbelieve your statement, I have very great faith in it; but tell me, is the population about you at all given to, I will not call it religious controversy, but discussion? No.

6020. Then they would not employ a portion of their spare time on Sunday afternoons in discussion?—No; I do not think they would; I can only say this, that during the 14 years that I have been in Cleveland, and have had the number of men that I have had under me, we have never had one misunderstanding, or only one, and that was after I went down, about two or three weeks, when I saw some things that I thought wrong, and I tried to put them right; from that day to this we have never had an unpleasant word, or any discussion, or anything at all in the place.

6021. When I use the word discussion, do not suppose I mean quarrelling, because I discuss a great number of things with people, and we are very good friends. I only want to know the bits of the people?—They do not in the reading rooms; they have lectures connected with their institutions, at which various working men take part; and they may put a subject down for discussion, but it is merely as a mental recreation at they do so.

6022. I want to know how a working man who has worked hard for six days passes his Sunday; a portion of his time is spent in his devotions at church or chapel, but in spite of all that there must be many hours of leisure; do you do anything to give him recreation on Sunday?—No, we do not; nothing beyond his going to church or chapel.

6023. You think it a mischief, and no doubt it is a mischief for him to go to a public house, but did you ever consider or consult with your employers that there might be other things done to win him from the public-house, rather than to come down upon him with stringent regulations?—I could not do so, because it would be against my own conviction to do so; and, therefore, I could not recommend my employers to do so. I think that they can spend their time in their devotional exercises, as you term them, and if they wish to improve their mental capacities, they have libraries and books. After one has worked a hard day's work I find a great deal of recreation from my mental exercise and reading, and I think that they may do so also on the Sabbath-day, as well as I have done it.

6024. Supposing a man has a family of little children; he has gone to his church with them all dressed neatly and clean, and he has dined, and has got an hour or two hours upon his hands, do you think it would be any harm to him that he should walk in a pleasant park, or amongst beautiful gardens?—Certainly not; not a bit of harm.

6025. Has anything of that sort been attempted to win men from the public-house in your neighbourhood?—We have not a public park; the population of the place is not sufficiently large to get a public park, but we have some of the most beautiful walks that England can produce; and they are free to everybody round the works; we have a sea view and a land view, which I might say are almost unparalleled in the North Riding of Yorkshire.

6026. Giving them every possible recreation of that sort, do you think that the public-house has such a wonderful charm that you must come in with a stringent and ghastly Act of Parliament for their government?—The percentage that I have stated shows that it has, and therefore I think that it is necessary to step in, because I think when the majority of the population are enjoying themselves in that way, if you could persuade the other persons to do so in the same rational way in which they are doing it, I think it is only right to legislate for them.

6027. You would coerce them?—No, I would not coerce them. I only want to get them by entirely persuasive means, and to remove temptation out of their way.

6028. You see that we are making laws not simply for happy Cleveland, but general laws. It may be a mischief to a man who lives in the midst of this world of brick and mortar to be shut out from the pleasures of nature, and he goes on Sunday by train, which I dare say you would not like, but still he does go by train into the country, and he comes back late at night, and he is a lodger. In spite of all that we may say, he may be a very sober and very good man; but he may be thirsty, and he may want a pint of beer; why should you, for the purpose of preventing some fellow who is a thorough-grained tippler, prevent that honest man from getting a pint of beer?—You have afforded him an opportunity of getting his pint of beer by taking it home on the Saturday night, or, if he is a lodger, he could take it home on the Sunday night, because you are going to leave the public-houses so long open on Sunday.

6029. How does he know that he may not be thirsty,
L L 4

Mr. W.
Cockburn.

thirsty, and that he does not want to spend his sixpence, and get a pot of beer?—If the public-house is open from eight until ten; of course I cannot speak as to what the habits of a town population may be, but I think a man would then have an opportunity of getting his glass of beer as the Bill provides between eight and ten. You also give him an opportunity during the forenoon to get a glass of beer, but if he begins to get over many glasses of beer, the effect will be that he will go and sit down, and stay the whole time there.

6030. You seem to think that the Legislature ought to step in as a sort of good nurse, to take care of those poor men who cannot take care of themselves?—If a man cannot take care of himself, I think it is charity for some one to take care of him.

6031. Is it your opinion that a large body or any portion of the working men of England are so incapable of taking care of themselves, that you ought to have this sort of restriction?—I have not exercised my mind upon that question to any greater extent than where I am immediately connected with; I think if I stick to my own business and look after my own men I do very well.

6032. What I want to know is, putting you in the place of the Legislature, whether you would think that one ought to use those stringent laws to govern the comparatively few drunken people in a way that may be inconvenient to a large body of others standing by, who are perfectly sober?—I hardly understand how to answer your question; I do not know that I exactly understand the way you put it.

6033. Do you think it wise in the Legislature to use restrictive legislation in order to coerce a comparatively small body of the population, and thereby create an inconvenience to other large bodies standing by who do not want that species of coercion?—I think that depends upon circumstances, and that they would be justified in so doing, if there was a great majority of the population who wished it to be so.

6034. The question is, whether the great majority wish it; but supposing the majority does not, what then?—But the majority does, in the case that I am speaking about to-day.

6035. That is just the question; I have no doubt that the persons you represent might be of that view, but we shall have thousands who are of quite the other view, and when there was this conflict, I am a legislator standing by with no earthly interest in the matter, and I want to know what I ought to do; I find large bodies on one side and large bodies on the other, and in this exceptional state of things, do you think it wise to make such sumptuary laws as this?—I would make such laws as this Bill proposes to make; that far I would go, because I do not believe it would be a very great inconvenience to any class of people; that is my opinion.

6036. Mr. Horsfall.] The Chairman put a case to you of John Smith and John Brown sending for liquor at home, and going and drinking together; you admit that such cases might exist, but I presume you consider that they would be very exceptional cases?—In the case of our own locality, they would be very exceptional cases.

6037. And I apprehend you would consider that there was this difference between drinking at home and drinking in a public-house; that whilst in the former case a man would send for what he thought was necessary, when he got to the public-house he would go on drinking without knowing what quantity he was drinking?—Nine times out of 10, or almost 99 times out of 100, it is so.

6038. The Honorable Member for Southwark put a question to you which I do not think you exactly understood; it was that a certain section of the people went to chapel or church on Sunday and the rest went to a public-house; I presume you did not mean to say that they would all do that?—I only meant to say that a portion of the number when I was speaking of the percentage went to the public-house, not the rest.

6039. Others might occupy themselves by a walk into the country or might engage in other duties?—Yes, decidedly so.

6040. You were asked whether you consider that your men are a sober body under the present law, and you answered in the affirmative; but I presume that that does not militate against their being more sober under an amended law?—I only meant that I considered the whole number might be brought in if there was a more stringent law than there is upon that point.

6041. You are very decidedly of opinion that such an amended law is necessary?—I think so.

6042. And would be a great benefit?—I think so; that is my candid opinion upon that question.

6043. Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen.] With regard to John Smith and John Brown you introduced a third party upon the scene, Mr. John Evans, and you said that he would have stopped the private drinking altogether, and that the men should not drink in his house?—Yes.

6044. What prevents Evans at the present moment from stopping drinking by saying if you come to my works on Monday not sober and fit for work you shall not work for me any longer?—Because John Smith and John Brown very frequently live in their own houses, and Evans has nothing to do with them there.

6045. But it does not signify where they live if they work for Evans; why should not the coercion of the master, supposing it be right, be equally exercised at that particular point where it can be exercised, namely, by forbidding a man to work at his place?—But I think that the restriction ought to come from the Legislature and not from private individuals; I do not think that an employer of labour ought to be placed in that position, especially if there is a majority of the population in favour of restriction: if it were not so it would be a different matter.

6046. Will you draw your distinction clearly if the coercion of the master would be wise and salutary if the law were altered, why should it not be wise and salutary now, it being equally efficacious; you tell me that if this law were altered private drinking would be stopped by the interference of the master?—Yes, if they live on his property.

6047. Private or public drinking can be equally stopped; can it not now, if the master interfere and says, you shall not work for me if you continue to drink?—He is not justified in going that far. I think a master is justified if he provides a house for his men, in taking his tenant to task so far when he sees him violating a law of that description, but you cannot interfere with a man who is living in his own house, at least not justifiably, because it would then be considered tyranny upon the man.

6048. Do you think that a master would justify stified in interfering with a man who was drunk, the master happened to be the owner of the property, because the drunkenness took place on his own premises, but that he would not be justified in interfering with a man because his drunkenness offended against public morality?—Morally he would be justified, but I do not know whether he would be so politically.

6049. If this man that you spoke of who was thirsty wanted to go into a public-house found the public-house was closed against him, he would have to bear his thirst and remain unsatisfied, would he not?—Yes, and he would be a great deal better man if he had done so, for he confessed so himself.

6050. Are there not many persons who go in who do not yield to the temptation which this has yielded to?—Certainly there are; still I think the facility is sufficiently large to allow them to get it, under the Bill that is now before the Committee.

6051. You do not define all the men who go to a public-house into exactly distinct classes do you; there may be some who go to a place of worship, and afterwards to the public-house?—I do not define them into classes.

6052. They possibly may go afterwards to a public-house?—Quite so; I do not mean to say that a man who goes to a public-house never goes to a place of worship.

6053. Nor that the people who go to a place of worship never go to a public-house?—No.

6054. What was this memorial to the magistrates of which you spoke?—It was a memorial from the inhabitants to the magistrates not to grant another license for a public-house in the village of Mask.

6055. How many of your men signed it?—Between 300 and 400.

6056. It was not anything with regard to the general question of drinking?—No, but it showed that the men abhorred the system being extended.

6057. Your men being the cream of Yorkshire, there is not much drunkenness amongst them?—There is not much drunkenness amongst them.

6058. Then they do not want this legislation or themselves so much, but their desire for it arises from kindly feelings towards others who are less favourably situated?—Generally so.

6059. Mr. Yorke.] You gave us some statistics about the per-centage of people who are off work on the first three days of the week at the Upleatham mines, and at the Lofthouse mines; at Upleatham there were 14 per cent. off the first three days of the week, and in the other mine 27 per cent.; to what do you attribute the difference?—Because we have a great number of houses of our own at Mask and Upleatham, and we have not at Lofthouse, and therefore we have the control of the former to a greater extent than at the other place.

6060. Has that any bearing upon the question of the comparative drunkenness of the two places?—Yes, it has; there is a great deal more drunkenness at the one place than there is at the other.

6061. That difference is owing to the control which you exercise at one place, and which you do not exercise at the other?—I exercise control at both, but I have not the same control at the one place as at the other.

6062. Are any of those schools, libraries, and reading rooms open on Sunday at either of those places?—Yes; the reading room and the library are opened for places of worship of a non-sectarian character, the Primitive Methodists, and the Wesleyans, and so on, all used them as places of public worship on Sunday.

6063. You said that you thought that they were too moral in your neighbourhood to be willing to have bands of music playing anywhere in the neighbourhood on Sunday: do they have bands on the week days?—Yes; they frequently have them on a week day, but they would never think of having them out on Sunday.

6064. But would those same people who would shrink from having a band of music playing out of doors on the Sunday also shrink from going into a public-house to drink on Sunday?—The great majority of them do.

6065. There are a considerable number, I presume, who although they shrink from having a band of music playing in the open air on Sunday do not shrink from going into public-houses occasionally, and getting drunk there?—It is the exception with us, and not the rule.

6066. Is it, in their opinion, comparatively worse to have a band of music playing on Sunday than going into public-houses?—I do not know what their opinion may be; I know what my own is.

6067. I want to know their opinion, as shown by their acts?—As shown by their acts the majority say that they will do neither; they will neither go into the public-house on Sunday, nor have a band of music, so that I may say their conduct proves it to be so.

6068. There is a large number, who, although they would shrink from having a band of music, would not shrink from going into a public-house?—I do not know what their views are upon that point; they do, as a fact, go into the public-house on Sunday to the extent which I have given in the statistics.

6069. You say that public opinion among your men is so conclusive against bands that they would not suffer them?—Yes.

6070. I may consider that it is not so conclusive against going to public-houses from time to time as you think it should be?—I do not know what their opinion may be; I have only spoken as to facts, which I am in a position to speak to.

6071. You said you thought that they were too moral to approve of bands of music; would you accept this as a definition of a moral man, a man who having the choice between good and evil, deliberately adopts the good from a sense of responsibility?—That depends upon what in his opinion is the good. When you place good and evil before him, a man is responsible for his own actions, and if he adopts evil he is clearly in a wrong position.

6072. Is not the distinction between a child and an adult that the child is led to choose the good by coercion, whereas an adult man does it from his own knowledge and sense of responsibility?—I think in nine cases out of ten the child follows the example which is set before him, and is not influenced by coercion.

6073. Is not that the general distinction that the child in the first instance is led to a sense of responsibility by coercion?—No, I cannot admit that; I admit that he is led to good results by good example, but I do not admit that he is led to good results by coercion.

6074. Coercion is a command enforced by punishment, is it not?—Yes, decidedly.

6075. Is not the application of coercion to persons who are grown up to an age to have a sense of responsibility degrading to them, and placing them on a level with inferior beings?—It is far more degrading to them when they are doing their wives and families a very great act of injustice by going into a public-house and spending their money; they are not only doing an act of injustice to themselves, but their wives and families are suffering considerably. And then we shall find very frequently that instead of coercion, the child is following the bad example that is set before him, and therefore if there was that salutary prohibition upon these things, it would extend to children as well as to adults at the present time.

Mr. W.
Cockburn.

6076. But if those persons have such a sensitive morality as to object to bands of music and things of that kind in the open air on Sunday, is it not fair to suppose that they would recoil from such violations of their duty in the way of getting drunk on Sunday?—I have already stated that there was a certain per-centage who did not recoil from that.

6077. Then you wish to legislate to prevent the much larger proportion of your men, who do not misuse their liberty, from using it moderately in favour of this very small minority, as you describe it who get drunk?—I put it the other way; when the Honourable Gentleman next to you put nearly the same question to me, and I put it exactly the contrary way, that I think it is necessary to legislate for it if the majority wish to have it so.

6078. You mean the local majority?—Of course I am speaking of the locality.

6079. Then do I understand you to be in favour of the Permissive Bill?—No, I am not in favour of the Permissive Bill.

6080. How do you reconcile that with your statement, that where there is a local majority you would be in favour of legislating according to their views; the Permissive Bill is that the local majority shall be able to determine whether a certain law should be locally applied?—I think that has but little to do with the evidence which I have given to day; I am not prepared to give evidence upon the Permissive Bill.

6081. That is not, I think, beyond the question, because we are sitting on this Bill not necessarily with a view to its entire rejection, but possibly with a view to adopting it in a modified form; therefore I want to know how you reconcile your statement that you are not in favour of the Permissive Bill with your previous statement, that you are in favour of legislation in accordance with the wishes of the local majority?—Because the Permissive Bill would go all through the country, I suppose, where the majority carried it through.

6082. I understand you to say that where a local majority is in favour of legislation you think it should be adopted?—But I am not prepared to say that the local majority would be in favour of the Permissive Bill.

6083. The Permissive Bill gives power to the local majority, in all places to make such and such legislation in the matter of the sale of liquor as to them shall seem fit, and supposing the Permissive Bill to pass the House of Commons it would not necessarily lead to total closing in all cases, the local majority might determine to carry out the recommendations of Mr. Abel Smith's Bill in any place; and I suppose, having given you that explanation of the effect of the Permissive Bill, you would say that you are in favour of it?—No, I am not in favour of it.

6084. And yet you are in favour of the local majority legislating for the closing of public-houses on Sunday?—Yes.

6085. Mr. John Abel Smith.] Do you not consider the feeling in favour of further restriction amongst the working men that you have alluded to, is a very respectable feeling founded on very respectable motives, and one to which the Legislature ought to pay attention?—I quite think so.

The Rev. EDWARD MATHEWS, called in; and Examined.

Rev. E.
Mathews.

6086. Mr. John Abel Smith.] You are a Baptist Minister at Bristol, are you not?—I am a Baptist minister at present residing at Bristol; I should state that I am an Agent of the Central Association for stopping the Sale of Intoxicating Liquors on Sunday.

6087. You have paid great attention, have you not, to the effects of Sunday drinking, and to the feeling of the people in reference to that subject?—I have.

6088. What do you think of the effects of Sunday drinking?—I think that the effects are most injurious to the morals of the people everywhere, and that they produce disturbance in the family, and poverty, and misery, and crime; I think that the effects are most sad.

6089. Do you think that there is more drinking on Sunday than on the other days in the week?—I think there is.

6090. Have you brought any statistics with you as regards drinking in Bristol on Sundays?—I have not.

6091. What do you think is the general feeling of working-men with reference to further restriction?—I have held a large number of meetings, and at those meetings there has been a good opportunity for the working men to express their sentiments, and I have found, testing them by public meetings, by canvasses from house-to-house, and by petitions to Parliament, that they have been, by an overwhelming majority, in favour of the Sunday closing of public-houses.

6092. Are you alluding now to total closing or to partial closing?—The meetings that I have attended have been meetings which, as a rule, have been called by the chief magistrate in compliance with the requisition of the inhabitants, and petitions have been presented to the meeting for adoption, praying for the entire closing of public-houses on Sunday. Those meetings were of course open to discussion, and I have heard a great many discussions, but I have never observed at those meetings, where there has been a discussion, that those who have been opposed to Sunday closing have had more than a handful on their side, and very often the entire vote, after a full discussion, has been for the closing of public-houses entirely on the Sunday.

6093. Are you aware that the Bill which is referred to this Committee does not go that length?—I am aware of that.

6094. I presume you would only take this Bill as an instalment?—So far as I am concerned I should desire to see the public houses closed the entire Sunday, and I believe that the generality of working men would only take it as an instalment, ment, and would desire to see them closed the entire Sunday.

6095. There has been a canvass at Bristol, has there not?—Yes, there has.

6096. Can you tell us what the result of that canvass has been?—There are three tables of the result of the canvass with regard to the Sunday closing of public-houses. I would observe that the inquiry was put on the canvass paper which was left at every house, "Are you in favour of closing the public-houses the whole of Sunday?" This may not have been the exact expression, but it was the sentiment. There were three columns in which they were asked to sign Yes or No, or Neutral, so that there was a fair opportunity for every householder to give his opinion, and the results were: "Yeas, 8,829; Nays, 1822; and Neutral and not voted, 3,134;" so that the total returns were 13,785.

6097. Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen.] Was that for the whole of Bristol?—Yes, for the whole city.

6098. Mr. Horsfall.] There is a larger number of householders in Bristol than that, is there not?—The number of householders is 29,360. Then I have these tables in wards if the Committee would like to hear the wards read over.

6099. Mr. John Abel Smith.] Where were the houses that were left out, because you have only accounted for something over 13,000 householders?—I would like to reply to that question presently if I may be allowed to read the particular classes who voted. The tabulation of classes gives this result: Working class, 5,912 yeas, 1,226 nays, and 1,551 neutral; shopkeepers, 1,033 yeas, 200 nays, and 467 neutral; professions and independent persons, 1816 yeas, 321 nays, and 1,087 neutral; publicans, beer retailers, and wine merchants, 68 yeas, 75 nays, and 29 neutral.

6100. Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen.] How many publicans are there altogether in Bristol?—The licensed victuallers in Bristol are 467; beer-sellers, 701; refreshment houses and so forth, with wine licenses, 33; wholesale wine and spirit merchants, 35; total, 1,236.

6101. Mr. John Abel Smith.] Now, will you explain the numbers that have been left out?—It happened in this way. We have endeavoured to send to every house a paper and to obtain a return from each; but Bristol is at present in a somewhat peculiar position, that is to say, I think there is a share of the population waiting for more information on the question, but unhappily we are under the despotism of a class of licensed victuallers. Our last meeting was broken up; we have not, therefore, the means which other towns have of holding public meetings, and through the press and speeches giving that light which the people desire, therefore they are in that undecided state of mind.

6102. Chairman.] I gather from what you state that you have not had the means of getting at the public opinion of Bristol?—As far as public meetings are concerned we have not.

6103. Mr. John Abel Smith.] Do you consider the canvass to be an indication of the feeling of Bristol?—The canvass, I think, is a fair view of the feeling of the people so far as they are informed upon the question; but there is a large class who are not informed, and, as I have said already, the ordinary means of giving them information has been taken away from us, and I think I can show this to be the case. We had a meeting called by the mayor on a requisition signed by 34 clergymen, 36 dissenting ministers, and a large number of large firms, showing that the people wished the matter to be fairly put before them and to hear both sides, but I am sorry to say that only one person at that meeting had a fair hearing, and that man was sent by the publicans.

6104. Was there an address, largely signed, presented to Mr. Berkeley upon the subject of this Bill?—Yes; there was an address signed by upwards of 1,580 electors.

6105. Chairman.] Can you give us the total number of electors in Bristol?—I should say that the total number of electors in Bristol might be 12,000 or 13,000.

6106. Mr. Locke.] How many are on the register?—I should think there would be between 12,000 or 13,000 on the register. There were upwards of 1,580 who sent a request to Mr. Berkeley, asking him not to oppose, but to support Mr. Abel Smith's Bill.

6107. Chairman.] That would be a very small minority of the whole?—Yes, of the whole body of voters.

6108. Mr. John Abel Smith.] There has been no strongly-pronounced feeling in Bristol one way or the other?—Except so far as the canvass showed it.

6109. But that is only a partial one?—It does not give the entire population, but, comparing the yeas with the nays, to my mind it shows a very large majority for Sunday closing.

6110. Are you in the habit of mixing much with the people in the town?—Yes; I have moved about a good deal amongst the citizens.

6111. I mean amongst labouring men?—I have been somewhat amongst the labouring men.

6112. And do you find them in favour of total closing?—There are a large number of them who are.

Rev.
E. Mathews.

1868.

The Rev. GEORGE WILSON MCCREE, called in; and Examined.

6113. Mr. John Abel Smith.] WHAT is your position in London?—For 20 years I have been the Domestic Missionary of Bloomsbury Baptist Chapel, visiting the poor in St. Giles, and, in conjunction with that, the Pastor of the Mission Church in St. Giles.

6114. You have, then, the closest and most intimate knowledge of the working classes in London?—I have visited the houses and factories of the poor for six and eight hours a-day during a great portion of that time.

6115. Will you tell the Committee what you think yourself of Sunday drinking in its influence.

ence upon the moral and social condition of the poor?—I have been in the habit of visiting the poor in their homes on the Monday, and during all the week, and I have always found a larger proportion of drunkenness to have existed on the Sunday, and consequently a larger amount of misery, and unhappiness, and vice existing on the Monday and Tuesday, in consequence of Sunday drinking.

6116. Do you believe that there is more drinking on Sunday than on Saturday evening?—In St. Giles there is remarkably more on Sunday than Saturday.

Rev. G. W.
McCree.

6117. To

Rev. G. W.
McCree.
28 May
1868.

6117. To what do you attribute that?—To the fact that a large number of the population work late on the Saturday night, the consequence is they wish to finish their work, such as tailors' work, shoemaking work, and so on, and then they devote their Sunday to drinking.

6118. Have you any returns at all to show a comparison of the attendance in public-houses on the Sunday, or anything of that sort?—I have nothing to state as to that, except that I have been in the habit of visiting the neighbourhood of St. Giles, I mean going up and down the streets on Saturday evenings, and also on Sunday evenings, for the purpose of conversing with the people, and I have found comparatively little drunkenness on Saturday evening compared with Sunday night.

6119. Are there a very great number of all ages attending the public-houses on the Sunday?—People of all ages attend, and I am sorry to say a considerable proportion of young people, men and women, young men and young women, and even boys and girls.

6120. The habits they acquire there are, of course, excessively injurious to them?—Yes; it makes them poor and disorderly and vicious.

6121. Do you believe that the people feel that themselves, and that they are disposed to see restriction carried further than it is?—It is very common, both for the men and the women on the Monday and Tuesday, to say to me, and often with tears, "Oh, Mr. McCree, we wish the public-houses were all shut up on the Sundays; it would be a great blessing to us and our families."

6122. Of course Sunday drinking is entirely antagonistic to the efforts made by you, and by others similarly employed, to produce greater attention to moral duties?—I have done what I could to establish classes for innocent recreation, popular entertainments, and other means of entertaining and amusing the poor, but I have found, in every case, that the public-house is the chief opponent to those efforts.

6123. Mr. Yorke.] Do you mean on the Sunday?—No, during the week.

6124. Mr. John Abel Smith.] Are you in favour of popular entertainments on Sunday?—No, not on Sunday. I have endeavoured to attract them from the public-houses on other days, especially on Monday nights.

6125. Have you not had a great deal to do with excursion trains?—I have a great deal to do with taking the poor into the country in the summer for a day's holiday.

6126. Do you allow any intoxicating drinks on those excursions?—No, never.

6127. Do you find that that destroys the desire in those people to go by those excursion trains?—So far from that, I find that many persons who consume intoxicating drinks themselves prefer to go with my excursions because of the greater comfort and order amongst the people, and the great enjoyment they have in being with us.

6128. What ground have you for thinking that juvenile drunkenness is increasing?—For some years I have been engaged in correspondence with chief constables, medical men, missionaries, clergymen, schoolmasters, masters of boarding schools, parents, and so on, and I have endeavoured to elicit from them the amount of drunkenness amongst young people, and to a remarkable extent my correspondence shows that during the last five years there has been a decided increase in juvenile intemperance.

6129. Do you think that the same remark applies to drunkenness among women?—To a large extent. I might say that I believe a considerable amount of drunkenness amongst children arises from the fact that a large number of publicans in London endeavour to entice children to come to their public-houses to buy drink for themselves, or to bring their jugs to their public-houses for their parents' beer; they offer them prizes and rewards to do so. And, if the Committee will allow me, I will state one case where a large public-house was opened, the proprietor of that house sent all over the neighbourhood in which his house is situate a band of music in a van, and scattered small bills all over the neighbourhood, stating that he would give away a handsome jug to every person who came to his public-house that evening, and a number of children went to the house, and some of them were certainly in a state of intoxication. I might also say, that in another locality the window of a gin-shop there had the following notice, "Children, do not forget to bring your jugs all the week, as a thousand pieces of rich cake will be distributed on Sunday next." And, in another window there was this notice, "Children who deal at this establishment will be presented with a piece of rich cake on Sunday next."

6130. Colonel Fane.] Will you give the names of those houses?—I should not like to give the names.

6131. Chairman.] It is such a striking circumstance that I should like very much to have some more proof of it than the mere assertion?—I am in this difficulty, that I visit those places, and I go from door to door amongst those people; and, therefore, to specify names would expose me to considerable difficulty in my attempts to do good in future years. I may say that I guarantee the accuracy of my statement.

6132. Mr. John Abel Smith.] You are confident of the truth and accuracy of the statement which you have made?—Yes.

6133. Chairman.] Did you see what you have just stated?—Yes, I did. I have here a map of the part best known as Seven Dials, and on this map I have marked the public-houses, amongst which I have to labour; the Committee will see in a moment the enormous amount of drunkenness which must exist in that part of St. Giles (handing in a map to the Committee).

6134. I believe that a large part of the population of St. Giles is Irish?—Not so much Irish as it was 10 or 15 years ago. In those 26 public houses I have reason to believe that 52,000 l. a-year are spent. The map shows that in that part of Seven Dials, where I am more particularly labouring, there are four day or Sunday schools, three places of worship, three newspaper shops, 10 bakers' shops, no butchers' shops, and 26 places where intoxicating drinks are sold.

6135. Mr. John Abel Smith.] Are you acquainted with other parts of London where Sunday drunkenness may be supposed to prevail such as the New Cut, Whitechapel, and the Westminster-road?—I have examined those places very carefully on Sunday evenings, on purpose that I might endeavour to get the amount of drunkenness amongst the poor, especially as to young people.

6136. And are you satisfied with the result of your observation, that there is an amount of drunkenness which seriously interferes with the moral state and social comfort of the labouring people?—I find that the attendance of young people in those neighbourhoods at the public on the Sunday evening is the chief cause of their subsequent poverty and vice, and the of ruining a vast number of young girls.

67. Do you believe that a large proportion of working men do drink on Sunday more than ought?—I believe that they do; I believe it is their chief day for drinking, and consequently their chief day for folly and extravagance.

68. Do you believe that a large proportion of the working men of London spend a great deal of their earnings in Sunday drinking?—I believe that there are a large number of working men in London who have not been in any place of public-house for the last 5, 10, 15, or 20 years, and who spend a large part of their money in public-houses on Sunday, and who are at present irretrievably in consequence of the perpetual temptations to which they are exposed by the public-houses being open on that day, but usually open from six o'clock and later on every night.

69. Do you believe that there has been an improvement amongst the working classes since the Bill has been in London?—I do think so.

70. To what do you attribute it?—I attribute that improvement to the extension of public schools, temperance societies, bands of working men's clubs, open air preaching, and the general influence of improved civilisation.

71. And the general efforts made to civilise and improve the people?—I do think so.

72. Have you had any personal experience of London at any large distance?—I walked in Northumberland, Cumberland, Westmoreland, Yorkshire, and other parts of the North of England, living amongst the people, living in houses of shepherds, miners, tailors, carpenters, farmers, and so on; and that has extended 15 years, but chiefly 15 and 20 years ago; and early I have been in those counties for similar purposes.

73. What do you think of the feeling of the population generally; first of all, are their habits of drinking still considerable?—Their habits of drinking are deplorable, and worse than any returns ever shown, because a vast number of intemperate persons are never apprehended by the police, and, therefore, their intemperance never appears in the police returns.

74. The police returns, as a rule, only enumerate the cases of drunken helplessness, and drunkenness with violence?—A sergeant of police in St. Giles, a few days ago, said to me that a wise policeman never interferes with a drunken man if he can help it.

75. Chairman. Would you separate the country, or would you say the same with regard to the country?—The same statement applies to the police in the country. A policeman in a village will never touch a drunken man if he can help it.

76. You said that the inebriety was deplorable in London; did you say that that was the case in the North of England?—Yes, in every part of England which I have visited.

77. Mr. John Abel Smith. Do you believe that drunkenness prevails in the country to any extent?—I believe that the drunkenness in the villages is very much greater than the residents in many of those villages imagine.

78. Why do you think so?—I believe that the beer-shops you have a large amount of drunkenness which is not known to the persons living in the village.

6149. Do you believe that the drunkenness in beer-shops is worse than in public-houses?—I believe that a lower type of persons go to beer-shops, and I think that in many cases the attractions presented by the beer-shop keepers to their customers are of a very immoral character.

6150. Reverting to the feelings of working men as to restriction, do you think that they look at the existing restriction as a useful means of protecting them from their own folly?—I have found the more respectable and thoughtful working men to be decidedly in favour of increased restriction.

6151. Have you looked through the Bill which is referred to this Committee?—I am acquainted with its provisions.

6152. Are you in favour of it?—Yes, decidedly; and I should like to have more than that Bill.

6153. You wish to see restriction carried further?—Decidedly.

6154. You would only take this as an instalment of more?—Exactly.

6155. Do you believe that there would be anything like disorder or confusion, or resistance to the law, if that Bill became law?—There would not be in St. Giles.

6156. Do you recollect the year 1854?—I do.

6157. Do you recollect Mr. Wilson Patten's Bill in 1854?—Yes, I do; I very carefully watched its operation.

6158. Can you give the Committee any information as to the supposed resistance to that law; was there any resistance?—It did not originate with the poor in St. Giles.

6159. Did it originate with the poor in London generally?—I do not think it did.

6160. Was there another Bill at the same time, which excited great apprehension, the Sunday Trading Bill?—I think so.

6161. And you do not believe that there was any resistance to Mr. Wilson Patten's Act which justified Parliament in repealing it?—No.

6162. It was in operation about a year, was it not?—About that time.

6163. During that year were the effects which it produced favourable or unfavourable?—The neighbourhood of St. Giles was quieter, and the working people generally spoke of the Act in kind and appreciative terms, the women especially.

6164. Do you believe that drunkenness is limited by restriction?—Decidedly so.

6165. And increased by facilities?—Yes; it is increased by facilities presented to poor men to obtain intoxicating drinks. The more facilities you put before them, the more drunkenness you have.

6166. Having a very long and varied experience in reference to the working men of London, and the country generally, do you give an undoubting testimony in favour of increased restriction, wishing to see it carried further than the limits of my Bill?—Yes; and I believe that such restriction would be perfectly safe, and most beneficial to the poor.

6167. Do you know anything of the feelings of employers of labour in London upon this subject?—I have conversed with large numbers of them.

6168. What do they say?—They are decidedly in favour of closing public-houses on Sunday, because their losses in consequence of the absence of their men on the Monday are simply enormous.

mous, and the disappointments to their customers are often very painful to themselves, and are injurious, of course, to the public altogether.

6169. You are probably of opinion that the desire of the working class to have restriction and protection against themselves ought to be considered, and favourably considered, by the Legislature?—I think that the Legislature would act a kind and a proper part if they protected the poor man from the vast and injurious temptations that are placed before him on the Sunday.

6170. How would you have those men employed on the Sunday?—One thing would be the result; the poor man, being separated from the public-house, would probably devote more time to the education of his family, and to that pleasant social intercourse with his wife and children of which he is deprived during the week by the hours of his labour, and that would have a very soothing influence upon the man's own character, and be a great benefit to the wife and to the little ones.

6171. As a rule, do the working class of London go out much into the country on Sundays?—Not so much, I think, as many seem to imagine they do.

6172. Do you believe that the restrictions in this Bill with regard to the hours of opening would impose any serious inconvenience upon any large class?—I think not; I think that the excursions would be more beneficial and more delightful altogether.

6173. Would you allow excursions on Sunday?—That is a question which, perhaps, I am not called upon to decide at this moment. I may say, that as a whole I believe that the Sunday excursion is not beneficial to the morals of the working men; and that anyone who will stand at the railway station, say from 9 till 11 o'clock, will see that a very large number of those excursionists come home intoxicated. And I may also say that I have been in the habit of going to the Bow-street Police Court, and hearing the Monday morning cases, and I have heard men deplore that they went into the country and got drunk in a public-house, and got into mischief and trouble. The small tradesmen who employ their own horses and traps to leave St. Giles on Sunday for half-a-day in the country, are just the men who become bankrupts and go to shame and misery.

6174. Then you believe that the working men of London, even of the lower class, with whom your benevolent labours bring you into contact, would be in favour of such a Bill as is now before this Committee?—I believe that they would be in favour of it, and perfectly satisfied with it, and especially if those in a higher station would kindly allow them to take their own way in the matter, and not incite them to disturbance.

6175. You mean that if there was no temptation offered to them to combine against it, their own inclination would not lead them to do so?—No; it would leave them to accept the law, to respect it, and to keep it.

6176. Mr. Hibbert.] Referring to the cases which you have named of two licensed victuallers having enticed children to their houses by the offer of cakes or jugs, do you know what the result of it was, whether many children were attracted to those houses?—It would be difficult for me to give the precise number, but I have reason to believe that in two hours about 147 boys and 139 girls entered the house in the one case; and in the other case, where the house was opened, the whole neighbourhood was in a state of disorder and disturbance, and very serious complaints were made through a public newspaper of the demoralisation in connection with the distribution of jugs.

6177. Were those two cases both upon the opening of the public-house?—No, one was the opening, and the other was simply a method of attracting custom. I may say, that it is common for publicans of a somewhat coarse type to present attractions to the poor and young, and to do all they can to have them in their houses. That arises partly from the fact, that a large number of young people in London who are 14 years of age and upwards make large wages and have a good deal of money at their disposal and are willing to spend it in vicious amusements.

6178. Did either of those cases occur on the Sunday?—One was on the Sunday, the other was on Saturday night.

6179. Which case was on the Sunday?—The cake was offered and was to be distributed on the Sunday.

6180. Was that the case which you said led to great disorder?—No, the distribution of jugs on the Saturday night led to great disorder. Ten thousand pieces of rich cake were to be given at that establishment to the children who came all the week with their jugs, and the cake was to be given away on Sunday, so that, in fact, the child has to go seven times to the public-house to get his piece of cake.

6181. I suppose that in those cases the children would go with their jugs, and fetch liquor for their parents, not for themselves? In some cases, I think, it was for their gratification. But I may say that my connection with ragged schools enables me to state that children of 10 years of age, and upwards, are sometimes in a state of intoxication; and I have had a letter from the country stating that a correspondent of mine found 20 boys and girls drinking in the back premises of a public-house on a Sunday evening, and he recognised most of them as Sunday scholars; therefore, the benefit received in the Sunday school on the morning of Sunday is counteracted by the demoralization of Sunday evening.

6182. Would you say whether this took place in the district of St. Giles, or would you object to state when it took place?—I may say that attractions of this sort are presented all over London, more or less.

6183. When you speak of those two cases, they take place lately, or some years ago?—One took place not more than eight months ago, and the other about 18 months ago.

6184. In the district of St. Giles, of which you have put in a map, are any of those public-houses closed on Sunday?—None of them.

6185. Do you know any cases where the publicans close their houses entirely on Sunday?—Not in St. Giles.

6186. You say that you remember the operation of Mr. Wilson Patten's Act, and that it was looked upon favourably by the poorer classes; you remember the hours during which the houses were open under that Act?—I do not know what I can specify them.

6187. They were open from one to three in the middle of the day, and from 6 to 10 in the evening?—Yes, I think those were the hours; I may say that the drunkenness of the lower and most sensual and degrading type is just what which prevails from 10 to 11; the last hour is the worst.

6188. Hav

1. Having that recollection of Mr. Wilson's Act, I want to ask you whether you think it would not meet the case if the present law were shortened; instead of going so far as it now goes, would you allow the sale of liquor on the premises and off the premises during a limited number of hours?—I think every hour you shut the public-house you do upon the public a great benefit.

2. If the greatest amount of drunkenness takes place at the later hours of the day, if you were to close at 9 o'clock or 10 o'clock you would diminish the drunkenness to a very great extent?—I believe that you would very considerably.

3. So far as that goes you think it would be a benefit to the working classes?—I think so.

4. Have you noticed that in this Bill there is a different provision for London to other parts of the country to this extent, that a person would be allowed to have liquor on the premises provided he took a bonâ fide meal in London, but in the country that is not allowed at all; do you think any reason why the country should be dealt with differently from London?—No, I do not see why you should not have the same law extended over the country.

5. There is no reason on account of the difference of the homes of the working classes that would lead you to allow them to have their meals in a public-house in London, and not allow them to have their meals in a public-house in the country?—I think that the more a working man is in his home and with his family the better for himself and his family.

6. [Mr. Locke.] Supposing a man is not a lodger, but is a lodger, are there not a number of persons who require to take their meals in a public-house?—I think not.

7. Have you given any attention to any particular places?—I have explored, I think, every part of London, such as Lambeth, Somers-Street, Whitechapel, Shoreditch, the New Cut, and so on, going just where I wished to go, and talking with the people and studying the neighbourhoods.

8. Have you ever gone through the centre of London, taking the City, and round about the City, and all round that way?—Yes.

9. Are you aware whether in those cases where persons take their meals in public-houses a great number of them living in lodgings?—I do not think a very large proportion of them do so. I believe that as a whole the Sunday dinner is taken at home, and in the lodging where the young men stay.

10. What makes you think that?—From my knowledge of young men in London.

11. Have you ever dined with them on Sunday in their lodgings?—Yes, I have; and I have seen young men living with me for nearly 12 years; and I am also familiar with a large number of gentlemen who let off part of their houses to young men who are connected with City businesses.

12. Do they take all their meals in their lodgings?—In nine cases out of ten, they get their meals at home.

13. Not on a week-day, certainly?—No, I am speaking of Sunday.

14. All those houses, I do not mean in the City, but in other parts where young men who live in lodgings take their meals during the week-day, are likewise open on Sunday, are they not?—I am acquainted with a large number of young men connected with City houses, and they inform me that dinner is provided for them in their houses of business.

6202. That is to say, where they live in the house of business they all dine together?—Yes, and in the house where they lodge; I may say that a very large number of City young men do not live in the City at all; they live in Islington, Barnsbury, New Cross, Forest Hill, and so on; they go away to those places to get out of the temptations of London life.

6203. And there do they all lodge together?—They lodge in twos and threes, with respectable families.

6204. Do you know any of them who lodge in London?—Yes.

6205. Take Southampton-buildings, and the neighbourhood of Furnival's Inn, and all round that district which surrounds the Temple and Lincoln's Inn, and that part of the town; are you aware of the mode in which young men lodging there live?—Yes, I am.

6206. Do not you know that they dine at different taverns and public-houses every day in the week, unless they are engaged to dine out somewhere else?—To a large extent they do.

6207. I ask you whether closing those houses on Sunday would not be inconvenient to them?—I think not, because they might provide themselves with what they desire on the Saturday.

6208. But somebody must cook their meals for them?—Of course.

6209. In answer to my friend, the Honourable Member for Oldham, you said that you would extend the same law throughout the country; this class of people would, to a certain extent, be benefited by the proviso in this Bill, which says that if they take a meal in a public-house on the Sunday, they may have liquor to drink during that meal; do you think that they ought to be deprived of that?—I think that in that case very strict supervision would be necessary over those houses by the police, in order to see that dinner was taken with the liquor; that it was a real actual dinner.

6210. My friend used the term bonâ fide meal; that would mean breakfast, dinner, or supper, any meal during the day?—Yes; I think that such a clause would open the way for a vast amount of evasion.

6211. But that clause is in the Bill, and is part of the Bill; do you think, likewise, this would be open to evasion, taking liquor to be consumed off the premises, when a person goes with a jug to get some liquor, might not he take that jug, and have this liquor drunk just outside the door?—I have found, as a whole, that when a jug is sent, not more than a certain quantity of liquor is sent for, and that there is very little intemperance in the homes of the people; the intemperance is in the public-house and in the beer-shop.

6212. If the liquor were only allowed to be taken off the premises and carried off, persons might go there with a jug and take it just outside and drink it, might they not?—They do so now in certain parts; often in the country, where there is a retail shop, where the license says, "Not to be drunk on the premises," they stand on the step and drink it; and I may say that a publican who wishes to evade the law as to not serving a child with intoxicating drink, under a certain age, I think it is 14, will serve him with liquor to be drunk by himself, and will say, "Just go outside and drink it, and bring back back the jug." The consequence is that a vast amount of juvenile drunkenness is promoted by, or winked at by, publicans in that way.

6213. It would be better, then, that the parent should go to the public-house and drink there, so that the child might not get drunk in carrying it home; is that your view?—I think that for any parent to send a child to the public-house, is to expose his child to fearful temptation and moral wrong, because of the obscene language which the child is sure to hear in the public-house, and because the child in coming home is likely to sip the jug, and thereby imbibe very early an appetite for drinking.

6214. I think you agree with me, that if drinking is to take place a grown-up person had better go to the public-house and drink there, than entrust his child with a jug to fetch it?—I think he had better not go the public-house at all.

6215. But it would be better for the child than sending the child to the public-house with the jug?—Yes; it would be better for the parent than the child; that is to say, it is still better for the parent not to go at all.

6216. The reason why this publican would have said that there was a piece of cake to be given on the following Sunday, is the competition between different public-houses, I presume, is it not?—I mentioned the fact.

6217. A little child goes out with a jug to get the drink somewhere, and naturally the child would go to the public-house that gave it a piece of cake; is not that the case?—I presume that there is a vast amount of competition amongst the publicans.

6218. But still the child would have gone to a public-house, at all events, to get the drink?—No; I think it is very likely, indeed, that in many cases the children begged the money, or persuaded the father or mother to have some beer, so that they might get the cake.

6219. But that is your mere opinion; you did not hear the children do that?—I am so intimately acquainted with the children of the poor that I know they will do anything to get a piece of cake or an orange, or some sweetmeat; they would say to the father or mother, give me an opportunity of getting the cake; and, therefore, it would not only tempt the child, but the child would tempt the parent.

6220. Would it tempt the father to drink, because the child wanted to go to the public-house to get a piece of cake?—Yes; and therefore you have a double evil involved in this fact.

6221. The temptation to people to go to particular shops to buy things by offering the present, is not confined to public-houses, is it?—do not many grocers, for instance, when they open their shop, say, "If you come and take your tea of us, we will give you some lollypops in the tea." Only, if you take the tea, there is no moral temptation. Only, if you take the drink, there is a moral temptation.

6222. Do not they hold out temptations to come and buy tea at a particular grocer's shop, making a present to the person who comes to purchase those articles?—I would not object to a grocer doing that if he thought proper, because I would say to myself, if a child should go into a shop, there would be no moral temptation, if a child goes to the public-house there is a moral temptation.

6223. But I only ask you the bare question whether that course of proceeding is confined to publicans or not; whether other shops do pursue precisely the same course?—I do not know of any shop that I am acquainted with in St. Giles where that practice obtains. Now, then you have it when a shop is opened, but as a general rule.

6224. It is not a rule with publicans either, is it?—It is a rule with a large number of the publicans, and further, they are desirous to find attractions in their houses behind the bar in different shapes, in order to get people into their houses to drink.

6225. There are attractions held out in every shop in London, where there is so much competition, is there not, to induce people to come and buy different articles?—Yes, I am aware of that.

6226. Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen.] What is the dining hour of the working classes in St. Giles?—About one o'clock on Sundays.

6227. Do they send for their beer from public-houses?—Many do, but a large number of them dine at home, and having dined they go out and lounge about the streets, and finding public-houses open they go into them.

6228. That is a temptation which you would wish to remove from them?—That is a temptation which I should like to remove from them.

6229. Mr. John Abel Smith.] There was a very large petition presented against this Bill to Parliament; do you know anything about that petition or the getting up of it?—I cannot say that I did not come in my way.

SIR JAMES FERGUSSON, BART., IN THE CHAIR.

Mr. ROBERT MATTHEW MORRELL, called in; and Examined.

6230. Chairman.] WHAT are you?—By trade I am a Goldsmith and Jeweller. I was 25 years in the establishment of Messrs. Drayson & Burwash, manufacturing goldsmiths and jewellers, 16, Brewer-street, Golden-square; 10 years of which I was foreman of the establishment.

6231. Are you now in business on your own account?—Yes.

6232. Do you employ many workmen?—No; I am in business as a shopkeeper.

6233. Have you men in your employ?—No, nothing but my own family.

6234. Is your acquaintance with working men large?—The following list I think will show: I have been 20 years a ratepayer in St. Pancras and Marylebone parishes, having lodgers. I was a committeeman of the first working men's excursion to Paris, a committeeman of the North London Industrial Exhibition, secretary of the West London Industrial Exhibition, secretary of the borough of Marylebone Working Men's Club, secretary of the delegates of the London trades, appointed to prove the working classes to be in favour of the opening of the national institutions on Sunday, secretary of the Sunday bands in the parks, secretary of the National Sunday League, secretary of the Crystal Palace Share Clubs, for enabling working men by weekly subscription to purchase a share, giving them the right of free admission to the Palace on Sunday, a committeeman of the Technical Education Committee, which is at present sitting with regard to technical education, and a committeeman of my own Goldsmith's Annuity Institution, and various other things.

6235. Have you been elected to most of those offices by large numbers of members, or have some of them been self-constituted committees?—I may say without any vanity on my own part, that my name is so well known as a worker, and so well known among the working classes, that it is difficult for me to go into any meeting, called for a progressive movement, without being elected on to it, and to some of them I have been elected in my absence. I may also mention that, with the exception of the West London Industrial Exhibition, the whole of the offices that I have held have been honorary, and without remuneration.

6236. I may ask you again, generally, the question that I put a little while ago; do you consider that you represent the opinions of a large number of persons, with regard to the question before the Committee?—I should be glad to answer that in my own way, if you will allow me; I am not appointed by any of those societies to represent them on this question. I come forward simply on public grounds to represent what I know to be the general feeling of the working classes, and because I have witnessed, and have read in the statistics, and in the evidence that the Committee have had before them, what I know to be a vast amount of misrepresentation.

6237. But do you represent the opinions of a great number of other persons upon this question?—Exactly so.

6238. You would be content to say that you represent a large number of other people?—Yes. Perhaps I might say at once that I had a visit yesterday from a gentleman, who had seen the report of the evidence taken before this Committee, and who had seen in one of the papers that I was to give evidence before you to day; and he brought this statement to me yesterday, that I might lay it before the Committee. His name is Mr. Henry Wilson, a foreman of Poole's tailoring establishment. There could be no question about its accuracy, because you all know Poole's tailoring establishment, and you can refer to him at No. 21, Clifford-street, Bond-street. The question of closing the public-houses on Sunday was put throughout the establishment on Saturday last to the 300 men employed on the premises; and I have here what is sent to me as the result.

6239. Mr. John Abel Smith.] Do you yourself know anything which enables you to judge of the accuracy of the information given to you?—Not beyond this: that I should say the sentiments throughout all the societies of working men that I am acquainted with are about the same as are given here.

6240. Mr. Locke.] Do you know anything about Mr. Wilson?—I know Mr. Wilson as being a man of strict integrity, and I could pledge myself that what he states is the truth.

6241. Chairman.] Will you tell us what he has stated to you?—The men are described as intelligent; they read the "Times," the "Star," the "Standard," "Punch," and other leading journals, and of the whole establishment of 300, which is the number employed on the premises, nine only are in favour of closing, and of those nine only a portion of them are for coercive measures; some portion of them wish to see the spread of teetotalism, but they decline to have it done by coercive measures. A general feeling, he adds, was expressed that drunkenness on Sunday was as nothing compared to the Saturday night, and that such places as the British Museum, the National Gallery, and the Crystal Palace should be open on Sunday.

6242. Are you aware of the object of the Bill before the Committee?—I am.

6243. Have you read it?—Yes, I have read its objects and provisions as given in the newspapers.

6244. Are you in favour of any additional measures for restricting the hours for the sale of liquors on Sundays?—I am not; I am for maintaining them as they are.

6245. Will you give your reason for that opinion?—As a working man with a large family, what recreation I have been enabled to take has been on the Sunday, to Brighton, we will say, or to Southampton, or whatever other place I could occasionally snatch a day to go to. I should say that, economical as I am obliged to be, it necessitates the taking of our dinner and provisions with us, and when we get to such a place as Brighton or Southampton, the only places that are open to us to go in and have our dinner or family meal is a respectable tavern. We there have a room and the accommodation of knives, forks, plates, and so forth, and with that we get what to me is a necessity, and that is, a glass of ale or a glass of malt liquor.

6246. Do not you know that the Bill would not restrict the practice of using public-houses under such circumstances?—I do not know that. It seems to me that it would be just the contrary.

6247. But it has been stated to the Committee that the intention of the Bill is not to deprive bonâ fide travellers of any of the privileges that they at present possess?—I am aware of that; but then the traveller would have to make the publican open his doors to him, and to prove to him bona fides as being a traveller; and if you know the feelings of the working classes as well as I do, you will find that they would look at a shut-up house and pass on rather than have the trouble and difficulty of knocking up and bringing the landlord to the door to open it and prove that they were bonâ fide travellers. They would just make the best shifts they could, or rather they would find, and this, I believe, is the object of some of the supporters of this Bill, that such difficulties would be put in the way of excursionists that the excursions would be abandoned altogether.

6248. Will you go on with your statement of your reasons?—That is one reason why I would not alter the present regulation; and there is another thing; as I have stated before, I am secretary of the Sunday bands in the parks; some of you gentlemen may never have paid a visit to the parks on Sunday, and, if you have not, I would strongly advise you, if you wish to see the working classes, to come to one of the parks, especially to Battersea, on the Sunday, and you will find that there we have commonly 50,000 persons on the Sunday afternoon, and the order and attention is such, that if it was in a building, as the saying is, you might hear a pin drop. I am sure that I was delighted yesterday afternoon with the orderly conduct of the vast mass of the people there. Those people come from a long distance; they walk in the park for two or three hours, and they have a long distance to go home, and if there are 50,000 there, probably one or two persons in a hundred may go into a public-house to have a glass of ale previous to their return; I confess I do myself; I have been all my life one of those who could use without abuse, and I cannot for the life of me see that there is anything wrong in my going in to have a glass of ale previous to my return home; I find that this Bill would deprive me, and all who go to the parks on Sunday, of being able to get a glass of ale previous to returning home.

6249. Unless it happened to be within the permitted hours?—But then they could not have it on the premises; it shuts us out altogether; therefore, on the part of those vast audiences that go to the park, I must enter my protest against this Bill. I would also call attention to another class of the community that would be very much discommoded by this Bill, I allude to the small tradesmen. The practice has been growing of late years for them to shut up shop on Sunday; Sunday trading is going out of fashion altogether, not from the spread of Sabbatarian views, but simply from the fact that the people have learned to value recreation on the Sunday, and on Sunday the shop is now shut. In my own neighbourhood, where I have resided, I have watched the closing for the last 20 years, and I have seen streets where once the shops were wide open, where now they are all of them closed, and the proprietors of those shops are off to some place a little way out of town. What would be the result if you passed this Bill? they go in their little traps or their horse and cart, and if you pass this Bill, there is no accommodation for man or beast.

6250. That is to say, you don't think the exemption in favour of bonâ fide travellers would be of much use, because they would find the houses shut up?—Yes, exactly. A publican would not think it worth while to open his place for the sake of serving an occasional traveller. There is also another point which I would mention. You may be sure that I have read a great deal on this matter, and I have seen a great deal stated by the supporters of this Bill, to the effect that excursionists come home very drunk and very disorderly. I have watched them very carefully at Brighton, or Southampton, or Dover, or other places. I have gone into the station half-an-hour before the time of the train starting, and taken a carriage exactly opposite where all the passengers must come in to return home, and I have watched the whole of the persons that came in to enter that train, and I have rarely seen a person intoxicated. Last week I was speaking to a gentleman who is the manager of one of the large railways out of London, about this assertion of the Sabbatarian party, that the railway stations on the Sunday nights were the scenes of riot and debauchery, and all kinds of things. I asked him what his opinion was, and he said, "Well, it is simply this: that men are so cooped up during the week, that when they get out, which they do for an excursion of this kind, perhaps, once in a couple of months, their spirits are so elated and buoyant, that there is, perhaps, a little overflow of spirit, which is mistaken, on the part of some very sedate people, as being caused by spirits of another kind." I can also call to mind my experience when the Act was in existence, which it was for a short time, for closing the houses at 10 o'clock. I had been on an excursion in a train which, perhaps, reached Waterloo station, or whatever station it might be, within a few minutes of 10 o'clock. There has been a lock on the line, and we have heard Big Ben strike 10 when we have been sitting in theriages, and if you honourable gentlemen could have heard the expressions used throughout theriages by the passengers as to your wisdom in passing that measure, I think you would not have been very much flattered. I wish to call your attention for a moment, and especially of the promoters of this Bill, to the evidence of two gentlemen which, although not direct evidence, I hope Mr. Abel Smith will allow it to be given; it is the evidence of Mr. Burney, the manager of the Citizen Steamboat Company, and Mr. Sawyer, the manager of the Iron-boat Company. They stated this some 12 months ago in a deputation to Lord John Manners.

6251. Mr. Locke.] Did you go with a deputation to Lord John Manners?—Yes; I was on the deputation, and the statement was this: that formerly they used to take from 10,000 to 12,000 persons on Sunday to Cremorne Gardens, but since Battersea Park had been made so attractive, and the bands had been played there, instead of taking 10,000 or 12,000 to Cremorne, the numbers had come down to something under 2,000; whereas the numbers taken by them to Battersea Park had gone up to 10,000 or 12,000, shewing that the people were drawn away from Cremorne Gardens by the attractions of Battersea Park, and the performance of the band therein. I do not know now whether it might be allowable in me to state that my business calls me down Drury-lane and through Seven Dials in the morning as early as between six and seven, and that I never hardly go through without seeing drunken women. Only as lately as last Friday morning, at seven o'clock in the morning, there were six drunken women fighting and tearing one another to pieces in Drury-lane. Those are the class, the unskilled labourer and the costermonger class, who really produce the drunkenness that is so deplorable amongst us; but I venture to ask you, gentlemen, why is the large class of respectable mechanics that I represent to be inconvenienced, to be punished, to be reached, in fact, over this drunken and degraded class?

6252. Chairman.] You object to the respectable class being coerced on account of those who cannot restrain themselves?—I do; there are a number of points which I wish to speak to, because the Committee will be aware (Mr. Locke I know is), that I am one who have taken a deep and active interest in all questions connected with the working classes for the last 12 years; I have devoted a very considerable portion of my life to the promotion of temperance and to all measures which I conceive to be for the benefit of the working classes, without being at all biassed by what I conceive to be the erroneous and narrow-minded views of the Sabbatarian party; among other things, I have had something to do with the statistics quoted before this Committee. It is now some few years since that St. Pancras was reported to have been canvassed, and it was quoted very largely by those gentlemen getting up this Bill, that the number in St. Pancras, by a house to house visitation, was so largely in favour of the Sunday closing, that it fairly made the ratepayers open their eyes; they had no idea that their neighbours were so much of that way of thinking, but at a public meeting at St. Pancras Vestry Hall, I ventured to question it.

6253. When was that?—It was some seven or eight years ago; I have not anything to recall the date to my mind, but I was challenged to go to the Alliance offices in the Strand and look into the books and examine for myself; I did so, and this is what I found; it was just as I expected; taking my own street there were two returns in favour of the Bill, and, I think, not one opposed to it: the fact of the case was this, that in that street those two were the only ones who were in favour of it, and all the others were opposed to it, but when the person knocked at the door to leave this paper, the housekeeper, or whoever took it in, said, "You be off, and do not show your face here again;" another said, "If you come bothering me again I shall give you something that you will not like," and all that sort of thing.

6254. Are you speaking of the canvass, the result of which is before this Committee just now?—It was for the same object.

6255. But it was seven or eight years ago?—Yes.

6256. You do not know anything to that effect with regard to any canvass, the result of which is before the Committee now?—I can only speak of that in comparison as bearing upon the statistics which have been laid before you with regard to other places on the present occasion.

6257. You know that the statistics upon the same subject have been got up in a loose way; is that what you mean?—In St. Pancras not in a loose way, because I believe the parties getting it up know very well what the answer would be.

6258. Is this what you mean, that the statistics got up by the Alliance at one period were not trustworthy?—Yes.

6259. But you do not make that allegation against any statistics that are just now before the Committee?—No; because I have not personally tested them; I can only judge from my experience, and I am giving this as an instance of how those statistics were quoted, or rather misquoted at that time; and this is the point which I want to come at with regard to that, that it is useless to rely upon statistics got up by one party for the House of Commons; if the Government want to get an impartial return, it must be done by an impartial party; the working classes will pay no attention to anything put forward by one side or the other, but if you want to get an impartial return, I see various ways in which it could be done; for instance, I know that the trades societies of London, if applied to, would take the views of their trades upon such a question, in the same way as I have given you the views of Poole's establishment on Saturday last, and, therefore, it is that I would ask you not to dwell too much upon the statistics which you have had before you.

6260. When any question of general interest is before Parliament, a great many petitions come up, and if a great many come in favour of a measure, and not many against it, Parliament generally assumes that the prevalent opinion is in favour of the measure, although there are not direct and impartial returns to be procured?—Will you allow me to say in reply to that, that the feeling with reference to this Bill amongst the working classes (and I have heard it over and over again), has been, that surely the House of Commons has got too much sense than to pass such a Bill. I have not, and thousands that I know know have not signed, any petition in opposition to this Bill, because they place such implicit reliance upon the House of Commons that they have too much knowledge and too much wisdom to pass such a measure; and I may say that scarcely, ever within my knowledge, has greater surprise been expressed than when it was found, that this Bill had passed a second reading in the House of Commons; and it is a very common remark to hear in society, "Well, if they do pass it, the only thing we shall have to do, will be, to knock it over; we will get rid of it in a week, if they do." But still there is a very strong feeling not to pass the Bill; and I should have mentioned in the outset of my evidence perhaps, that I am not in any way connected with the publicans if they have any association or organisation on this matter. I come forward, simply on my own account, and to represent the working men. But what brings it to my mind now, is, that I have read a statement by one of the gentlemen who has been before you, to the effect that the Hyde Park affair that broke up the previous legislation was the result of the publicans organisation. Now, as I happen to know something of that, I can, perhaps, give you a little information upon it. It was spread about by word of mouth, that there was to be a meeting in Hyde Park on the Sunday. I heard of it accidentally, and I went with my wife. There were a number of nobility and gentry riding in the Row, and my wife said in a sarcastic way, "Oh, if those are the promoters of the Bill, why do not they go to church?" That was taken up, and the next one sung out, "Go to church," and the cry run along the whole Row, "Go to church, go to church," and it spread, and, as you know, that went on Sunday after Sunday.

6261. Do you say that there were a number of nobility and gentry riding in Rotten Row on Sunday?—Yes, I mean in carriages; I assure you that from so trifling a thing, the effect was most marked; it was like a spark to a barrel of gunpowder, it ran along so.

6262. You were going on, I think, to say, that this went on Sunday after Sunday, and at last the riots grew to a great head?—The roughs came in then, and of course brought discredit upon the others. I should like also to mention with regard to petitions, that a member of my own family, or rather a member by marriage, has, in my own presence, boasted that he has signed five petitions in favour of a Bill of this kind, as a member of five particular congregations. It was his boast to go from chapel to chapel and sign as a member of each particular congregation. I merely point this out that such means are really not honest; but some of these gentlemen seem to consider that the end justifies the means, and they are quite unscrupulous; they do things for a cause which they would shrink from doing as individuals.

6263. Still, although you say that you would not trust implicitly to statistics got up by a party, I suppose that you would admit that there has been a considerable advance among the working classes in favour of restrictive measures?—No; I do not admit that; I deny it most positively. I admit this, that there has been a very great improvement in the intellectual culture, and in the general advancement of the working classes. I say this. I have discussed the subject, and gone into the company of the most learned of the land; it has been my business, in carrying out certain measures, to bring me in contact with a number of the most learned men in the kingdom, and I have discussed with them in taking their signatures to the number of a thousand to a memorial to the Queen in favour of the National museums and galleries being opened on Sunday after morning service, and I know a great many of what I may consider the superior of the working classes, and I say that the working classes are very superior in their knowledge and acquirements to a considerable number of the grades of society above them. Taking the trading class, I believe that there is a vast proportion of working classes who are more advanced than those, and of others who are considerably above them, until you come of course up to a considerable grade above them, such as gentlemen who have had a college education.

6264. I am not saying that supposing three-fourths of the working classes were in favour of restrictive measures, it would be right to coerce the other one-fourth, but I am asking you whether you do not think that there is an increased feeling of late years among the working classes in favour of restrictive measures in this sense?—I do not think so. I think that what I have brought forward before you with regard to Poole's establishment may be taken as a fair example. For instance, as I said at the outset, I was 10 years foreman of an establishment, and I was 25 years in that establishment, and during the whole of that time I never knew any one employed in the establishment who was in favour of restrictive measures. I never knew any one who was a Sabbatarian, and I have had a number of instances come under my notice, where the House of Commons has been misled upon such questions. For instance, Mr. Cubitt some years ago, on a question of this kind in the House of Commons, stated that his men were opposed to the opening of the national institutions on Sunday, but, on inquiry of his men, I found out that they had never been asked. Mr. Cubitt had said to the gentlemen in his counting-house, "What do my men think of this question?" And those gentlemen immediately surrounding him, knowing his own views, said, "Oh, Sir, they think the same as you do, that these places should not be opened." And upon the faith of that, Mr. Cubitt had made that statement in the House of Commons.

6265. What is your opinion of the operation of the Act which closed the public-houses at one in the morning?—I would keep it as it is.

6266. Do you think that it has worked well?—I experience a little inconvenience occasionally, and so do the whole of my class, but we are disposed to put up with that inconvenience; for instance, if we go into the country we, perhaps, have breakfast at five or six o'clock in order to get away, and we find that it is a very long time to go till one; we cannot get luncheon.

6267. I am speaking of the law by which public-houses are now closed at one o'clock a.m. throughout the week?—As I am in the news trade and have to be up early in the morning, I really know nothing about public-houses being open at one o'clock in the morning.

6268. Then you do not know whether it has worked well or not?—I can say this: I can fully agree with this opinion expressed by Poole's men that the public-houses on Saturday night are very full and very noisy; I can hear that when passing them.

6269. You

6269. You are aware that for the last four years all public-houses must be closed at one o'clock in the morning; are you able to say whether you think that that restriction has been beneficial or otherwise?—I am not; as I know nothing of it I should not like to express an opinion.

6270. Supposing that there is evidence before the Committee that great order had been produced by the closing at one o'clock in the morning, and that a great deal of disorderly conduct had been put a stop to, should you say, accepting that evidence as true, that you thought that the change was beneficial?—I must qualify my answer again; really I am speaking only on the part of working men, and working men have nothing to do with public-houses at one o'clock in the morning.

6271. You think that that is an hour at which the habits of the working classes are not interfered with by such restrictions?—Certainly not.

6272. And that, therefore, if it represses disorderly conduct, the objection that you stated to this Bill would not apply?—Certainly not; I believe it is more fast young men and ladies of a certain description who are affected by the one o'clock closing.

6273. Do you think that the present restriction by which the public-houses must not be opened on Sunday morning until one o'clock in the day is a good restriction?—I answered that when I misunderstood your question before; I say that I and my class are occasionally inconvenienced by the present arrangement; if I have to get up at five or six o'clock, and get out into the country, I do frequently find that I want something before one o'clock, but we put up with it; we say that on the Sunday morning the publican does want, and his family want, to clean up, and they want a little rest, and that kind of thing, and, therefore, we say, as reasonable beings, we will not study ourselves so much in this matter, but let the matter stand where it is.

6274. The public-houses are now closed during what are conventionally called the hours of afternoon church, between three and five; do you think, and do you believe, that the working men generally think that that is a fair restriction?—In London I do not think that there is the slightest inconvenience from their being closed at those hours, and in the country you see there are such different arrangements about divine service; if I go to Hampton Court and go into a public-house on this side of Hampton Bridge, when the clock strikes three I am turned out, when at that time I may just have had my glass of ale put into my hands, but if I cross the bridge the houses are open the whole afternoon.

6275. Mr. John Abel Smith.] Why is that?—Different parishes or different magistrates, or something or other of that kind.

6276. Chairman.] Do you say of your own knowledge that that is the case?—I do; when I said Hampton Court I should have said Kew; on the Middlesex side of Kew the houses are shut punctually at three; I have had it happen to myself; I have called for a pint of ale with my family, and no sooner have they put the ale into my hand with one hand, than they have said "Gentlemen, it is three o'clock, and we are going to close;" on the other side of the water, the "Rose and Crown," and various houses that run down to the river, and all the houses in Kew, in fact, are open the whole afternoon.

6277. That must be from laxity on the part of the police, is it not?—I think not.

6278. We need not discuss that, because it must be an accident; we will treat it as if the law was that the public-house should be shut between three and five?—Allow me to say that it is an accident which it is very common throughout the country, because there are a number of other places that I go to where I can get a glass of ale before one o'clock and after three o'clock, but there are other places where I cannot.

6279. In the country the law is, that the public-house is open at half-past twelve, but we will not mind about those peculiarities, because I want to ask you your opinion with regard to the working of the law with which we are best acquainted, namely, the houses being closed from three to five; is there any difference in the class of the houses on the two sides of the river, that shut and that keep open?—No; none whatever.

6280. You say that the working men acquiesce on the whole in the shutting of the houses from three to five in the afternoon for the same reason that they acquiesce in it in the morning?—Yes.

6281. Supposing that it was not proposed to shut the houses altogether for the consumption of drink on the premises, but only to restrict a little further the hours during which they might be opened, and that a man should be able to buy liquor and consume it on the premises between one and three, as now, and again at night between 8 and 10, or say that it did not go quite so far as that, but that it left them open for three hours in the evening, but still gave the publican a little more rest and restricted the hours, do you think that perhaps on the whole the working classes would acquiesce in it?—It seems to me that that would be no gain to the publican while seriously in many cases discommoding the public, because if you are to compel a man to open half an hour during every hour throughout the day he might just as well be open all the time.

6282. I did not say that they were to be opened half an hour in every hour?—No, but it is the same argument.

6283. Do you think it is the same whether the publican opened for a half an hour every hour, or whether he opened for two hours at one period of the day and three at another?—I think that if he is obliged to open for two or three hours during the day he might just as well open altogether, so far as himself is concerned. He would not care for that matter, for the sake of two hours in between, whether he opened or not; in fact, it would not be worth his while.

6284. Surely, then, the rest he has now up to one o'clock and between three and five would be of no value to him according to that argument?—I do not know about that; it is, perhaps, long enough for him to have an afternoon's snooze, but what his habits may be I do not know; I have not so much to do with publicans as I have with my own class.

6285. You have stated your opinion with regard to the publican that from three to five is only just long enough to give them an afternoon's snooze; but supposing that the hours of closing were from three to eight, that would give him time to go out and have a walk, would it not?—Unquestionably it would; and as far as London is concerned I do not know, taking my own experience,

Mr. R. M.
Morrell.

perience, that I want anything from my dinner until my supper; that is my own practice, but that is in London; and it is when I get into the country that I feel the inconvenience; it is there where the Londoner feels it. And you must bear this in mind (I have not the statistics with me, but they have been taken), that there are about a quarter of a million of people who leave London every Sunday for Hampton Court, or the different seaside places and country resorts.

6286. They go very much to the same places every week, do they not?—Of course they visit them all in turn; they all endeavour to do so as far as their means will permit. This last year or two has been such a bad season for business that the railways no doubt have not found it so profitable, because there is only a certain amount that the working class can spend upon those kind of matters, and that amount is only realised after the living expenses. If a man has a bad season for business and for work, one of the first things that he is obliged to deprive himself of is his Sunday excursion.

6287. Still, excursionists frequent certain places, do they not?—Yes; Hampton-court, Kew-gardens, Brighton, and so on.

6288. Then there would always be certain public-houses in those particular towns which have what is called a Sunday business?—Yes.

6289. And people who knew that they were resorted to by regular travellers, would know that they must keep open their doors; but there would be a great number of districts, would there not, which are not so resorted to, where, if a publican was only required to keep open for certain hours in the day, he would make a holiday of it?—I think I have pointed out what seemed to me the main difficulties in the way. It is possible that a public-house just immediately adjoining a railway station, for instance, would open, and would have a person at the door for the traveller to show his ticket as he entered, to prove that he was a traveller. That might be so in the case of a house immediately contiguous, and they might expect to do a considerable business; but I am quite certain it would not be the case in the case of retired houses.

6290. And then the traveller might be inconvenienced?—Yes, undoubtedly.

6291. I presume you do not undervalue the evils of drunkenness?—I do not; and, more than that, a number of gentlemen on the list of vice-presidents of the Alliance are known to me, and I am known to them, and I should be very sorry to do anything that would promote drunkenness, but I believe this, that a measure of this kind will have a very evil operation. I mentioned, at the outset, that I have been a housekeeper, and have had lodgers, and amongst those lodgers I have had young goldsmiths coming up from Scotland, men in my own trade, and I had a sort of little colony of them at one time in my house; and what was their mode of spending Sunday? They laid in bottles of whiskey on Saturday night, and other Scotchmen in London came to them, and there they boozed the whole of Sunday, perhaps, in my place, and then the next Sunday the lot of them would go to one of the other lodgings, and they would booze there.

6292. Those were habits which they brought up with them?—Yes, those were habits which they brought up with them from Scotland.

6293. Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen.] As I understand your evidence, you think that restriction has reached the point at which it can be useful?—Yes, I do.

6294. And that carrying it any further would lead to an evasion, and defeat the object which the promoters of that restriction have in view?—I do think so. You have expressed my views precisely.

6295. Mr. Yorke.] You said that you had considered the question of opening places of public resort on Sunday in order to compete with the public-houses. Is it your opinion that if the Crystal Palace was open on Sunday, and there were bands of music in the parks, they would compete in favour of temperance?—I am quite certain of it; and it has done so to a very large extent.

6296. Is there a band of music in Battersea Park, at this moment, on Sunday?—Yes. If you will allow me to read this paragraph at the end of a petition, which was presented to the Honourable House of Commons, in the year 1855, it will answer your question: "It must be evident to everyone who walks through those parts of the metropolis inhabited by the poorer portion of the people, that the present prohibitory system of Sabbath observance has utterly failed to effect the moral regeneration of the people; nay, even helps further to demoralise them. If a freer and a better system prove unsuccessful in reforming the old, it will yet do something for the young. It is our deliberate conviction, that a large proportion of those who, Sunday after Sunday, habitually pursue a course of degradation and vice, would have been saved from a condition so deplorable had opportunities been offered them in youth of studying the wonders of nature and the beauties of art. It is the constant familiarity with beautiful forms which is the simplest and most effective teacher of all that is graceful and applicable in art; for it is through the eye that the perceptive and moral faculties are most easily reached, and such visual education would be the most practical means of rendering our working population not only more elevated in artistic taste, but more intelligent as citizens, and in every way better as men." It is 15 years since that was printed, and the more I have seen of society the more convinced I am of the soundness of the views put forth there.

6297. Do you believe that there is in the working classes any feeling so sensitive as to the observance of Sunday as to be shocked by the increase of such things as bands in the parks and the opening of places like the Museum and the Crystal Palace?—I think that but for the fact of the vast crowds attending those performances, Sunday after Sunday for the last 13 years, they would have been suppressed if it had depended upon petitions to the House of Commons; but there you have a mass of living bonâ fide human beings that no amount of petitioning can misrepresent, and it is my firm belief, that if every question now occupying public attention and before your Honourable House affected by the Sunday question, could be tested in the same way by gatherings of the people, the question would very soon be settled. But we know that we have in this country a powerful organisation with agents in most pulpits throughout the kingdom, and we know what they can effect. I should like to call honourable gentlemen's attention to the Report of the Select Committee of the House of Commons, in 1854. I do not know whether the honourable gentlemen gentlemen ever saw that Report; it goes over the very ground that we are now taking.

6298. Chairman.] Did you mean by the answer which you gave just now, to say, that you think that there is an agent of the Sunday closing association in every pulpit?—Generally speaking they go together on all these questions in opposition to the opening of national institutions and in favour of closing; they are usually the same parties.

6299. Mr. Locke.] What pulpits do you include to?—All pulpits that are influenced by the Lord's Day Society; the evangelical pulpits.

6300. You do not mean to say that all the pulpits in England are under the influence of the Lord's Day Society?—No, I know they are not; has been my pleasure to know and to converse with ministers who are not.

6301. Then you do not mean all the pulpits?—No.

6302. But only the Lord's Day Society pulpits?—Yes, that is all. Will you allow me to say that, in conversing with clergymen who have expressed their opposition to the Sabbatarian doctrine, I have asked them why it was that they did not come out and give some public expression of their opinion, and I have been answered in this way: that they had no desire to be crucified in the "Record" newspaper. You will understand the meaning of that.

6303. Mr. Yorke.] One of the objections against the introduction of such things as you have mentioned is, that a number of persons would be required to watch the Crystal Palace, and take care of the parks, and that an increased number of police would have to be employed; has that objection any force in your mind?—In that case I have also taken some little trouble. Police are on duty in the Crystal Palace every Sunday, though it is open only to shareholders, the park keepers are also on duty in the parks. I have conversed with the attendants, and with Dr. John Gray, who is one of the heads of departments in the British Museum, and I find that if the British Museum were to be opened on Sunday the police would do the duty, and the attendants could not be called upon at all. In the next place there is a sufficient number of reserved police always to do that duty without calling for any increase of labour.

6304. Then I understand that, in the first place, you think that no further measure of Sunday closing is required, and if it were required you would prefer to adopt such measures as closing the Crystal Palace and the Museum, and having bands in the parks on Sunday to compete with public-houses rather than to resort to coercion?—Yes; I have received a letter from Paris, and it is the evidence of the Commissaires de Police of the Arrondissements with regard to Sunday in Paris, in which he says that the police on Sunday have to take two arrondissements instead of one; so that one-half of the force is at liberty every other Sunday, there is so little for them to do; and he says that even with half the number there is really nothing for that half to do, and that crime in Paris is unknown on Sunday.

6305. Mr. Locke.] What reason does the letter give for that?—On account of the recreations of the people.

6306. What is the name of the gentleman who wrote the letter?—This letter is communicated from the firm of Bassot Brother, Rue de Cloître, 6.69.

St. Jacques, and it is addressed to Mr. J. P. Turner, of Birmingham and London, merchant. Perhaps I may be allowed to add, as a supplement to that, that during the whole of the performances of the bands in the parks, now for 13 years, there has not been a single police case that ever came before the magistrates, arising out of those bands. I know that for a fact; I have been in the parks 11 Sundays at least out of every 13 during the 13 years that they have played, and that is my personal knowledge.

6307. From your own experience, you know that in consequence of those recreations on the Sunday, the duties of the police, instead of being greater, have been lighter?—Exactly so.

6308. Mr. Yorke.] Has there been any drunkenness in the public-houses in the neighbourhood of the parks?—I am much obliged to the honourable Member for putting that question, because it is a very common assertion of the party to which I have been in opposition, to point to that, and say, look, here is the result of the playing of the bands, that the public-houses all round the parks are full; I admit that they are full for half an hour from the very cause that I spoke of earlier in my evidence, namely, that coming a long distance to the park, and promenading the park, and then having to go home, they go in to have a glass of ale; but I say this, and I have tested it over and over again, that if you go into those houses an hour after the closing of the band they are deserted; parties have been in, and have had their glass of ale, and are on their road home; and until it can be proved to me that it is a crime or anything wrong to go in and have a glass of ale, I maintain that they are legitimate, and right in a general way to have their glass of ale.

6309. You mean that the indulgence is used moderately?—Yes; I have heard this over and over again, that publicans at a distance from the bands, have said that they would give 5*l.* at any moment if they could shut up the bands; it is just merely those immediately surrounding the park which catch the visitors who go in and have a glass of ale before they return home.

6310. Mr. Berkeley.] Do you happen to have seen a paragraph going through the press, a copy from a Boston paper, in which the editor remarks that he has been in Paris during the Great Exhibition, and asks the question why so many more cases of drunkenness are to be found in Boston every Sunday, than were to be found in the great metropolis of France; in Boston the houses being absolutely hermetically sealed, and in Paris, on the contrary, the population doing what they please?—I have not seen that paragraph, but as almost every question that has been asked of me has brought something to my mind bearing strongly on this question, so has this gentleman's remark; I have alluded more than once to the establishment of Messrs. Drayson & Burwash, in which I was for so many years; and I may now say that in that establishment probably one-half, or about half the workmen, were always foreigners, not always the same men; they were continually changing, but those men I always found to be vastly superior in their intellectual acquirements to our own class of workmen. There was not one of them but who, if asked, could go into the counting-house, and sit down and make a drawing, and there was not one of our own workmen that could do that; I may say that in their bearing altogether there was a superiority, they were gentlemen, in fact.

Mr. R. M.
Morrell.

8 June 1868.

Mr. R. M.
Morrell.
8 June 1868.

6311. Mr. Roebuck.] How do you connect them with this Bill?—Mr. Berkeley asked me about this drunkenness abroad, and I answered that those men were so trained, and so superior in culture, that they never got drunk; you would not see them drunk here, and therefore I should imagine that when they were in their own towns on the Continent, they did not get drunk there.

6312. Mr. Locke.] Although they have every opportunity of doing so if they chose?—Yes; it was the superior education; and I may say that you will not get rid of the drunkenness in Drury-lane and the Seven Dials districts of which I spoke, and similar districts exist all over the metropolis, except by the compulsory education of the children of those costermongers who are spending that money in drink which ought to be devoted to training their children, and who are utterly indifferent how those children grow up, and when they grow up you have got a crop of criminals and blackguards that are a trouble to the country.

6313. Mr. John Abel Smith.] You have referred, have you not, to the Report of Mr. Villier's Committee in 1854?—Yes.

6314. And you have referred with approval to the recommendation of that Committee in favour of opening public museums and other places on the Sunday, as one means of stopping drunkenness?—I have.

6315. Are you aware that in the same Report they recommend the shutting up of public-houses, except between the hours of six and nine in the afternoon?—I am not aware of that. I have not the Report in full before me.

6316. Though you approve of the one, you would not approve of the other recommendation?—I have stated so fully my views before the Committee, that I think you may judge that I certainly should not be in favour of further restrictions than are at present imposed.

6317. But you are aware that that Committee of which you speak so highly, took a totally different view from yourself upon this subject?—I am only aware of it as far as you tell me; I am not aware of it myself.

6318. I think you belong to a body who are called the Recreative Religionists?—I do.

6319. Is that a religious body?—Yes.

6320. Have they any peculiar tenets?—Had I any knowledge that you were going to put that question, I would have put a paper in my pocket explaining the views that they entertain with regard to religion.

6321. I do not want to trouble you about any detail; but with you the opening of the parks is not only a social and moral question, but a religious question?—Undoubtedly; religious as we from our point of view of religion think it. Of course, so many constructions can be put upon religion, that what is regarded as religion by one class, is regarded as sacrilege by another, and I was going to say as damnation by another.

6322. And amusement for the working classes on the Sunday, is one of the tenets to which you attach value?—No, I beg your pardon; the bands in the park are certainly amusements chiefly; but we regard the bands in the parks as of very slight value compared to the opening of the national institutions. I do not know that we should ever have had anything to do with the bands in the park but for the fact of a certain Minister of the Government placing bands in the park, and a certain party by their influence obtaining the removal of those bands, which led us in our official capacity to step in and take the part of the defenders of the public right; but we do not consider the bands in the park of so much value, except this, that it brings a large number of people out into the fresh air; it gives them innocent recreation for two or three hours, and it certainly keeps them out of the public-house while they are there; there is no question about that.

6323. What I want to understand is, how far your opinions on these matters bear upon the evidence which you have given before the Committee; what does the doctrine of the Recreative Religionists mean; do you mean that it is a religion, or what?—Recreate we hold in the sense of to renew, to give new life, to recreate.

6324. Mr. Baines.] Is it a registered sect of religionists?—Yes, registered at Somerset House by that name.

6325. Chairman.] It is a sect just as the Independents, and the Society of Friends, and so on.—Yes.

6326. Mr. John Abel Smith.] Is it a numerous one?—The actual members were not so numerous but we had a very large number in our congregations; in fact, so large that it was thought worth while by certain parties to attempt to put them down, and the case is now being tried in the Court of Common Pleas, in Westminster Hall whether people have a right to go to a certain room on a Sunday evening and hear discourse on nature, and the wonders of the creation accompanied by music.

6327. Have you ever been threatened with prosecution?—Prosecution, as I mentioned, has been begun, and is now going on.

6328. On the ground of its being utterly irreligious?—As being opposed to certain Acts of Parliament.

6329. Is that with respect to what arose in St Martin's Hall?—Yes.

6330. Who belongs to the society?—Mr. Baxter Langley is the president of it, and he is the defendant in the action which is now going on in Westminster Hall.

6331. Mr. Locke.] What gentlemen attend those meetings?—A very large number of gentlemen; a series of lectures were delivered by Professor Huxley and Dr. Carpenter.

6332. Mr. John Abel Smith.] Those are the gentlemen who compose your body?—Yes.

6333. They are Recreative Religionists, are they?—I do not say that those gentlemen are those gentlemen attended on certain evening and occupied our pulpit, if you will allow me to call it so, at our invitation, but they were not bound to join the association in doing so.

6334. They have not joined your religious body?—Not all of them; some of them have. I have not a list of the members by me to point out their names.

6335. Is it not the suit in the Court of Common Pleas with reference to the money paymaster at the doors?—That is the ground put upon by the opposition.

6336. But has the question of the tenets held by the body to whom you belong ever been brought forward in a court of law in any way directly or indirectly?—I believe that this is the first case in which the question has arisen; I believe that the lawyers have found that there is no precedent in the matter, and no case to go upon; it is the first time it has been raised.

6337. Mr.

6337. May I repeat the question; has the question of religious opinion, or of opinion in reference to matters of religion or worship, been stirred or moved in any possible way in the courts of law?—It seems to me that the papers have been pretty well full of it for the last few years, as to whether you should have candlesticks or not candlesticks, and other forms and ceremonies to which some attach importance, and which others would restrain.

6338. You say that Mr. Wilson, who is foreman at Poole's, has taken the opinion of the working men at Poole's?—Yes.

6339. Do you know on what point he took it?—On the question of closing public-houses on Sunday altogether.

6340. Then, he did not take the opinion of those working men with reference to the Bill?—No; that was not the question.

6341. But you did not say that before?—I beg your pardon. I read the question: "Question of closing public-houses on Sunday put to the 300 men employed on the premises of Mr. Poole, tailor of Saville-street." I may say that he wanted to take it upon the Bill exactly as it is, but that he found that it involved such a deal of discussion and conversation that the question was put in this simple form, without entering into any details as a question of closing altogether on Sunday or not.

6342. Their opinion upon closing altogether had no direct bearing upon the question whether this Bill is desirable or not?—It had so far a bearing, that I think if you were to send in any paper, and take any vote upon the question, you will find that 291 will still be against the Bill.

6343. That is a matter of opinion, but not of knowledge?—It is a matter of opinion, of course.

6344. You referred also to some statistics relative to St. Pancras some seven years ago; are you speaking from report, or from any knowledge of your own?—I am speaking from my own knowledge, that I went to the Alliance offices, and I found that the returns were given of men who were in favour of restriction, but the whole of the other residents who were in favour of the present system were treated as neutrals, whereas, in reality, they were every one opposed to further restriction.

6345. Are you quite sure that that was a canvass made with reference to restriction?—I am sure it was, for there were papers put into every house.

6346. Would you not be surprised if you were told that there never was any canvass about restriction?—I should be surprised when I saw the papers myself, and had the whole thing before my own eyes. I should tell the party, whoever he was who told me so, that he was stating what was not the truth.

6347. Do not you think you have made a mistake, and that it was a canvass on behalf of the Permissive Bill?—I cannot say, really, if you enter into details; it was seven or eight years ago; it was the same kind of thing; it was the Alliance party who got it up.

6348. What did they canvass for; what did they ask people's opinion upon?—It was in favour of restrictive measures, with regard to the Sunday.

6349. What do you call restrictive measures; do you call the Permissive Bill a restrictive measure?—If the Permissive Bill was to be carried by such machinery as I see in operation for carrying this Bill, I should say that it would not be a Permissive Bill on the part of the great majority of the people.

6350. Is that an answer to my question; I asked you whether or not, you think that the canvass for the Permissive Bill can be called a canvass for further restriction?—I do, certainly.

6351. And that was the only canvass that they have ever made in the parish of St. Pancras?—It may be as you say, that it was with regard to the Permissive Bill. I only know that it was one of those measures which I call of a restrictive nature upon which I spoke at that meeting. You must be aware that many things have passed through my mind since, and what particular Bill it might have been in favour of I cannot exactly say.

6352. You do not see any inconsistency in your answer, though you admit that it is possible that you made a mistake, and that the canvass was in favour of the Permissive Bill and not of further restriction; but still you adhere to your statement?—I think that you and I look at the Permissive Bill from a different point of view. To me it seems that we have a Permissive Bill at the present time, and that is, that all who do not want to take anything, are permitted not to take it, whilst those who want to take it, are permitted to do so; and, therefore, we have a Permissive Bill at the present time. I think that to allow anything that shall show by statistics, or anything got up in the same way, as I have seen so much of by parties in supporting this Bill, an appearance would be given to it as if the majority of the people were in favour of it, whilst in reality they were not.

6353. But your statement with regard to that canvass is inaccurate, is it not?—No, I do not admit that it is.

6354. Although you state an object for the canvass other than that which existed?—I cannot answer anything further than that you and I take different views. I say that it was a restrictive measure, and you say that it was not.

6355. With regard to excursions you stated, did you not, that there were 250,000 excursionists carried every Sunday?—Yes.

6356. Can you explain to me if that is true, taking the case of the South Western Company, who carry people to the quarters to which you particularly alluded; Kew, Hampton Court, and other places of that sort, why there should be exactly half as many trains on Sunday as there are every other day in the week?—I can; because for a number of years past the different boards of directors have been so dunned and badgered by a number of gentlemen who wish to suppress the excursions, that for the sake of peace and quietness they have in many cases withdrawn the Sunday excursions. And another thing is this, I had the evidence only this last week of a gentleman connected with one of the railways, to whom I put a question about the discontinuing of those trains. I said, "I see the Lord's Day Society are boasting that they have influenced you to suppress Sunday trains." He said, "It has nothing to do with the Lord's Day Society; it is simply this, that the company believed that a considerable number of the public made the Sunday excursion trains available to do business which they would have gone to do at another time, and they were simply losing their ordinary traffic by the Sunday excursions, and they thought they would do without them."

O O

6357. But

Mr. R. M.
Morrell.

8 June 1868.

Mr. R. M.
Morrell.

8 June 1868.

6357. But in the face of that fact, that the Sunday trains on the South Western Railway are one-half what they are on the other days of the week, do you still adhere to your statement that there are 250,000 excursionists?—Yes; I do so far as can be judged by the fact of the numbers reported in the press at that time, some eight or nine years ago. However, I believe that you will have that more fully before you by returns from the railways before you have done your sittings, and therefore I do not like to speak too much upon subjects in which I am not thoroughly at home.

6358. Practically you know very little about it, I suppose?—I know that it was given in the newspapers at that date, that 250,000 people were out on a particular Sunday, as ascertained by a number of gentlemen who organised themselves as a staff and went to the different railways and inquired. But I should like to put against your remark about the decrease on the Sunday, the number of attendants at Kew Gardens and Hampton Court on a Sunday, because it is evident that they must get there somehow, and it is very singular that the number of attendants on the Sunday are equal to the attendants of all the other six days put together. Therefore, if a less number of trains run, they must get there by other means. It does not matter how they get there; the people are there, as shown by the returns from the curator of the gardens.

6359. Has there been, or is there, any allusion to excursionists in the Bill now before the Committee?—As I have not had the Bill before me, that is a question which I cannot answer.

6360. But have you not answered it?—I have not; it is sufficient for me to know the particulars of the Bill, and what it will effect.

6361. Do you mean to say that you have come here to give evidence against a Bill which you have not read?—I know all the effects of the Bill; I know what it is to do. Probably some honourable gentlemen have not waded through all the Acts of Parliament.

6362. I thought you said to the Chairman that you had read the Bill?—Then I did not understand the question. I have not read the wording of the Bill, certainly, as printed for the House of Commons; I have read all the particulars of what it is to effect.

6363. Will you be so good as to state what you believe it to be?—It is to prevent persons from being served with refreshment, except during certain hours, in London, and that the liquors are only to be drunk off the premises.

6364. And what other provisions are there with regard to travellers?—That a bonâ fide traveller is to be served; but that I explained earlier in my evidence.

6365. And is there anything else?—I do not see anything else, but that the public-house is to be open to a traveller, upon his proving his being a traveller.

6366. Is there any difference with regard to London and the metropolitan district and the rest of the country?—I do not know.

6367. Is there anything with regard to Sunday bands in the Bill?—No, not that I am aware of. I do not think it probable. I have seen nothing to that effect.

6368. There is nothing that affects the success or the interruption of the Sunday bands?—I beg your pardon. I have given you evidence that it would very greatly affect the persons attending them being able to get a glass of ale on leaving the band, previous to their return home.

6369. Then the success of the bands depends upon the people having some beer?—No; it is not in my mind a question of the success of the band; the people will probably go there whether they could get a glass of ale on their way home or not; but it is a question of their being seriously inconvenienced.

6370. You stated, I think, that you had a brother-in-law who signed five petitions?—It was a relation on my wife's side.

6371. Can you tell his name, and where he lives?—As I told you, it is a distant relation; if you wish to have his name, I will ascertain it, and forward it to the Committee.

6372. I should like to hear his story about it very much?—I said that it was a distant relation, and so it was. It is a party that I very rarely see; but I could get it, I have no doubt, and forward it to the Committee.

6373. Chairman.] Would you have any difficulty in giving his name?—I do not know that I know his name; it is a distant relation upon my wife's side; and I very rarely see him.

6374. Mr. John Abel Smith.] When did he tell you this?—This is some years ago.

6375. Then it was not with reference to the petitions which have been presented against this Bill?—No, not against this Bill; I only gave it as an illustration of the way in which petitions are got up.

6376. Will you be so good as to tell me who, amongst the various gentlemen who have given evidence before this Committee, stated that excursionists are in the habit of coming home drunk?—I do not know that that has been stated in evidence at all, but such is my belief.

6377. You said that you had looked over the evidence, and had seen that that fact had been stated?—I think you will find on reference to the notes, that I said the Sabbatarian party were continually putting it forward in pamphlets and in other ways, that such was the case.

6378. Do you mean to say that I have made another mistake so remarkable; I thought you said so, most decidedly?—I have not the evidence before me of every gentleman who has given evidence before you.

6379. Chairman.] You state that it is your impression?—It is my impression that I have read it in looking over the evidence before this Committee; but you will understand that my reading the evidence is confined to perhaps a quarter of an hour looking over the Alliance once a week, and that I have such a vast number of other things occupying my attention that I am not able to note down everything with that particularity which these gentlemen would require.

6380. Mr. John Abel Smith.] If you stated that it was somebody who made that assertion before this Committee, I imagine that you have seen it in the evidence. Do they ever sell any beer in Battersea Park at the time of the bands?—No; they sell tea and coffee, and ginger beer, and so forth, and pastry, but they do not sell beer.

6381. Are you quite sure of that?—I am quite sure of it.

6382. Do they not sell beer at Cremorne?—Undoubtedly they do; that is a public-house.

6383. Do not people, therefore, come to a place where they do not sell beer in preference to a place where they do?—Some of them, of course, course, because they do not want beer at those hours; the persons who go to Cremorne are a different class; they are not so far advanced in their ideas; in fact, they are mainly the fast classes of society.

6384. But still you think that the well doing of the bands depends upon people being able to get beer?—No, certainly not; I say that people do not want beer between those hours.

6385. But they do after the music is over?—Yes, after the music is over, certainly.

6386. And therefore they will not come unless they can get beer after the music is over?—No, I do not say that.

6387. Do you not apprehend that people would be prevented from coming to those bands if they could not get beer; at least, I understood you to say so?—No, I do not; I say most distinctly that I do not believe that their being able to get a glass of beer or not would affect their attending the bands in any way; but I say again, on the other hand, that it would be positively annoying to them not to be able to get a glass of ale when the bands were over.

6388. What I understand you to say is, that you are afraid of the disappointment which the people may experience, but you do not think that it would injure the attendance on the bands?—Certainly not.

6389. You stated, did you not, that for many years you have been occupied in promoting temperance in London?—I said movements of a progressive and temperance character.

6390. I do not know what you mean by a temperance character, unless you mean temperance?—I mean temperance. There again there are various constructions to be put upon that word as upon religion. A man may be temperate, and I consider myself a temperate man, but then certain gentlemen who are downright teetotallers would not; they would say "No, you cannot be temperate unless you are altogether a teetotaler." We take such a different view of this, that I cannot agree with you at all.

6391. My object was not to invite you to give us an essay upon it, but to enable me to understand what your answer was; what do you mean by saying that you have been promoting temperance for years?—I say that if the national exhibitions were open on Sunday, the habits of the people would be altogether improved, and they would become temperate in all things. I consider that there are as great intemperate men among teetotallers as there are among my own class. Men would be able to study, and they would acquire knowledge, and they would learn to use without abuse. I do not wish to give another essay, but really I think that what we have to learn most in all these questions is to bear and forbear, to take what we want ourselves, and let other people have what they want, unless it is something positively injurious to the morals and state of society.

6392. Then the temperance that you have been preaching is a temperance applying to other things besides drink?—Yes, to other things, to temperance in all things.

6393. Then this Bill has very little bearing upon that; have you ever in the furtherance of your objections against restriction, appealed to any general feeling or expression of union amongst the working classes; have you ever had a public meeting of any sort upon the subject?—No, nor do I know of any organisation to get up such a thing. Public meetings are not got up without organisation to get them up, and there is no organisation that I know of in opposition to the Alliance.

6394. Are you aware that there was a public meeting of working men called by the Lord Mayor, in the City of London?—I might have read of it at the time, but if I did, it has escaped my memory.

6395. In your pursuit of temperance, you did not attend that meeting?—No; I have attended meetings called by the teetotal party, and I have asked to speak, and been refused sometimes. Sometimes it has been said that I should speak, and when it has come to the time, they have said, "Oh, they forgot to call me."

6396. Do you call a meeting called by and presided over by the Lord Mayor, a teetotal meeting?—It was a ticket meeting, which those meetings generally are.

6397. But it was not if the doors were open?—If the doors were open; I should say what I know to be the fact, that the working classes look upon it in this way: they say, it is only a teetotal meeting, I shall not go to it. If you want a meeting to get at the fair and full expression of the opinion of the working classes, must be something like the votes on the paper that I suggested in the earlier part of my examination, that is, taken by a party above the partisans on either side, and done in such a way that all parties shall be assured that it is a fair and candid expression of opinion.

6398. Do you believe that the canvass of the large working establishments in London is a fair way of getting at the working men's opinions?—I believe so, if it was done legitimately and fairly.

6399. Do you know that there was a very large meeting held some time ago in the Lambeth Baths, which was attended by 3,000 people?—I know something of the Lambeth Baths, and I was once in one of their meetings, but never wish to be in another, because one of the party who had ventured to say something in opposition, had his coat torn right up the back.

6400. Have you done nothing of that sort on your side; have you never made any attempt at the Lambeth Baths or elsewhere to get up a meeting?—As I said just now, there is no organisation in opposition; I am connected with a number of associations, as you know, and we are persons of all shades of opinions, agreeing upon these particular subjects; we have, for instance, on our subscribers' list for the opening of the national institutions, persons who are subscribers to the Alliance, and, therefore, the National Sunday League, for instance, could not take up a question of this kind for opening or closing the public-houses; if we did we should cause a division in our own party; we are simply persons of all sects and shades of religious opinion; and, with regard to teetotalism, or not teetotalism, persons of all opinions come together, agreeing upon the necessity of national recreation on the Sunday, and we cannot depart from that to call a meeting in support of or in opposition to this Bill; nor is there any other association or organisation in London to do such a thing, and, as I said just now, public meetings are not convened, and not got up unless there is an organisation to do it.

6401. Then I will sum up my cross-examination by putting these questions to you; do I understand

Mr. R. M.
Morrell.

8 June 1868.

Mr. R. M.
Morrell.

8 June 1868.

derstand you rightly to say, first of all, that you are against further restriction?—I am.

6402. Secondly, do you believe recreation on Sunday to be the great regenerator, both morally and socially, of the working classes?—I consider it a very valuable agency in that direction, but I think that you are attaching an importance to my words which I did not intend.

6403. I only want to get hold of what you really mean to state as your opinion?—If you will allow me to answer that question in this way: I have had evidence before me as to the beneficial effects of the opening the Glasnevin Gardens in Dublin; and I do not believe that even the Lord's Day Society would venture to attack the opening or attempt to get Hampton Court or Kew Gardens closed; I believe that whenever recreation has been tried, all experience tends to that point, that all brutalising sports have been banished, and that improvement in the people has taken place just in proportion as rational recreation has been brought within their reach.

6404. You believe it to be one great instrument which is to be supported and encouraged?—I believe that it is one that, so far as experience has gone, teaches us is the right course of action, rather than coercion, which, I am quite certain, will have a very different effect to what is supposed by the promoters of the Bill.

6405. When you say by the promoters of the Bill, what have the promoters of the Bill said against recreation?—I say that the coercion entertained by the promoters of this Bill would have an effect the very contrary to what is intended.

6406. At what hours are public-houses to be closed, in considering the convenience of the working men?—I think that the present hours are very good. In the summer time, take for instance now, it is frequently the case that excursionists cannot get home till after 11, but that is only just during the long days; the fact is, that the working classes, when they get out for the day at this time of the year, the days are so long, and they are so elated, and so free and joyous in the country, that they cannot help remaining till dark begins to set in, and they find by the time they get home, that perhaps it is past 11; and after the enjoyment they have been experiencing, they are suffering inconvenience in having to get their supper without their supper beer, and I do not, however, wish that the law should be altered in that respect; I say, let matters be as they are.

6407. Then 11 o'clock, although it is a restriction, you accede to?—Yes, I do; I consider, as a reasonable being, that we ought to consider the conveniences of others.

6408. Do you think that 10 o'clock would be too early?—It would be too early, I am quite sure; I had quite proof enough of that in the short time it was in operation.

6409. With yourself, or with others?—With my family; we have been, as I have mentioned, in the railway station carriage; the station has been blocked, and we could not get in when the clock has struck, or we have been just perhaps five minutes too late on many occasions.

6410. Did you try to get a glass of beer at the refreshment rooms at the station, if you could not get it elsewhere?—I cannot say that the working classes, generally speaking, patronise those places much.

6411. If you wanted a glass of beer so badly, why not have gone in there?—We might, but it would not do with a family; a family want to have their meals at their own table.

6412. You supped after you came home, did you not?—Yes.

6413. And you could not have got the beer before?—You could have had the beer first, and supper after, but that would not be like having beer with your supper.

6414. Could not you have got the beer the day before?—That is one of many other things that you could do, but it is one thing that I should never do of my own choice; I am not an admirer of stale beer myself; I think that the most dull and flat thing imaginable is stale beer.

6415. There are others who think so as well as you; but would you not be enabled to get over that difficulty?—Of course we might have bottled beer, but we should want three or four bottles of bottled ale for a family, and we could not run to that; there would be a very great difference between the prices; a pot of beer, or a pot of porter, would be 3½d., whereas two or three bottles of ale would be at the rate of about, I suppose, 10d. a bottle.

6416. Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen.] I have found the evidence in which the witness stated before this Committee, that there was a great amount of drunkenness amongst excursionists. This question was asked by Mr. John Abel Smith of the Rev. G. W. M'Cree, at Question 6173,—“Would you allow excursions on Sunday?” to which he replied, “That is a question which perhaps I am not called upon to decide at this moment; I may say that, as a whole, I believe that the Sunday excursion is not beneficial to the morals of the working men; and that anyone who will stand at the railway station, say from 9 till 11 o'clock, will see that a very large number of those excursionists come home intoxicated; and I may also say, that I have been in the habit of going to the Bow-street Police Court, and hearing the Monday morning cases, and I have heard men deplore that they went into the country, and got drunk in a public-house, and got into mischief and trouble.” Was that the evidence to which you referred, when you stated that it had been stated before this Committee that there was drunkenness amongst excursionists?—Yes; I have read Mr. M'Cree's evidence, and I have read Mr. Murphy's evidence, and Mr. Potter's evidence, and many others.

6417. Mr. John Abel Smith.] Who was Mr. M'Cree?—One of the recent witnesses on the last sitting of the Committee, and I particularly noticed his evidence, because I often pass through his district. I passed through it yesterday afternoon, and I thought of him and I thought of the Committee; for there in Seven Dials there were a large number of women sitting without bonnets on, and you know the particular style of dress, and a lot of the labouring costermonger class, and a lot of barrow-men with cherries, all of them bawling and hollowing, which was their mode, I suppose, of enjoying Sunday afternoon, and I could not help feeling a wish that they had a sufficient amount of education to teach them a better mode of spending their Sunday afternoon; and that was just outside Mr. M'Cree's chapel door.

6418. Mr. Baines.] Have you read the evidence of Mr. Leicester upon the subject of the opinion of the glass-blowers?—I glanced at his evidence, vidence, but I could not say that I have read it full. If there is any particular point, perhaps you would ask me about it.

6419. I mean as to the opinion of the majority that body, not only in London, but throughout the country, in favour of this Bill?—That, of course, would be Mr. Leicester's opinion; but should hesitate to accept it otherwise than as an opinion, except I had some very good testimony.

6420. Are you aware that Mr. Leicester is himself a practical glass-blower and a journeyman in the trade, and has been so for 30 years, and has a very large experience of the trade?—I know that Mr. Leicester is an intelligent man, and I believe he did state something of that kind, but I am not in a position either to affirm or to deny what Mr. Leicester stated.

6421. May I ask you, then, further, did you hear or read what Mr. Leicester said as to the numerous open-air meetings which have been held in the south of London, sometimes attended by thousands, and at Seven Dials and Clerkenwell, and in other parts of London, in which meetings a great majority of the working people were assembled decided in favour of Sunday closing?—I cannot say that I have read the particulars of Mr. Leicester's evidence so far as that, but I know that such meetings have been held, and I know that very rarely anyone interferes with them, and no one places any importance, or attaches any value to resolutions passed at those meetings; they just simply let them be. It is a teetotal meeting composed of teetotallers, and no one takes any pains to molest them.

6422. Would you attach no importance to a public meeting, especially if called by placard and advertisements?—I should attach this importance: that it showed that there was a number of persons holding this particular view, but no further.

6423. You do not think that any person who held opposite views, especially if they thought that they were in the majority, would give themselves the trouble to attend a meeting of that sort?—I do think that they would not.

6424. Is that the principle upon which you act in all things; do you never attend a meeting except you agree with those who call the meeting?—I do occasionally attend a meeting that I do not agree with, but I sit perfectly still, and never take any part except in a case where my own name is brought prominently forward, as it has been in Lambeth.

6425. May I ask whether there was a meeting of people in the south of London called by placard and advertisements which you attended along with Mr. Baxter Langley?—It had nothing to do with the teetotal question.

6426. Had it to do with the Sunday amusements?—Yes, it had to do with Sunday recreation.

6427. May I ask whether that meeting agreed with Mr. Baxter Langley and yourself in your opinions upon that subject?—The majority did not.

6428. May I ask if the difference of their opinion from yours was very unmistakeably and strongly expressed?—It was very strongly expressed, of course, on the part of the speakers on the platform, and they had a sufficient majority in the meeting, although the majority was not very large; still it must be borne in mind that they were parties who were in the habit of going to those rooms every week.

6429. You have not answered my question: my question was, whether the difference of that meeting from you and Mr. Baxter Langley was very unmistakeably and strongly expressed?—It was not, and for this simple reason, that neither Mr. Baxter Langley nor myself was allowed to speak when they knew our opinion, and what our views were.

6430. Will you allow me to ask, if it is not an improper question, do you carry on your own trade on Sunday?—Up to the middle of the day, the news trade. I do not want to mince matters, but you must understand that I have left my own goldsmiths' and jewellers' trade. I may tell you that I have left that establishment, where I was for 25 years, through my taking so much part in public affairs. It was put to me that I must either throw up my foremanship or cease to act on public affairs, and I said to my master, however sorry I am that it must be so, I must part, and I did. Therefore, as it is not such an easy matter to start in business in my own trade of goldsmith and jeweller, and having a family, I started in the news trade.

6431. Are you a news agent?—Yes; a stationer and news agent.

6432. You keep open, as I understand you, half the Sunday?—Yes.

6433. You do not think it necessary and desirable to take for yourself Sunday as a day of rest?—I beg your pardon; I take my Sunday rest in this way.

6434. How much of it?—The whole day, occasionally.

6435. I understood you to say that you keep open your establishment for half the day on Sunday?—Yes.

6436. Do you work at it; does it engage you; is it a money-making trade?—Of course it is. My reason for keeping open is this, that the great sale of such papers as "Lloyd's" is on Sunday morning; and the working classes have as much right, in my opinion, to have their Sunday newspaper as a gentleman has to have the "Times" on Monday morning, or the "Observer" on Sunday morning. And it is quite certain that the working man cannot have his Sunday paper unless some one works.

6437. Mr. Roebuck.] Can you have the Monday newspaper without Sunday working?—Certainly not; the compositors go to work on Sunday evening.

6438. So that if there were a newspaper which comes out every day, the work must be done on Sunday to bring it out on Monday?—Yes.

6439. Mr. Baines.] If I were to tell you that that is not true, that it is distinctly not true, and that it is entirely untrue, would you believe it?—I should have to tell you that I know that it is true, and then we should be at variance directly.

6440. Perhaps we might speak about different papers. If I were to tell you that I know of a daily paper that is brought out on Monday, and on which there is no work on the Sunday, would you allow that to be possible?—I have seen it stated with regard to a certain Scotch paper, but I have seen proof to the contrary, that there was Sunday work upon it. I have also seen that the Scotch clergy send reports of their sermons on the Sunday to the press for the express purpose of appearing in the Monday's paper; and thus necessitate Sunday work. I should wish to put myself right, and to say that I have within two or three doors of me a shop in the same line with which there is very great rivalry, and that that shop is open the whole of Sunday; and if I was actuated by the same feelings as many gentlemen I should be certainly in favour of compelling that house to close at the same time as I think proper to shut up, or not allow him to open in the morning earlier than I choose to open myself; but I do not agree with that. I say if I found out that it was convenient to me to shut up on the whole of Sunday I should do it, but being obliged to serve my customers with the Sunday morning paper, it is no hardship to me; I do not experience any. A portion of the family take a holiday on one Sunday, and another portion on another, or we can take time, as I am now doing, in coming before you without pecuniary loss, as would be the case with journeyman mechanics.

6441. I only want to know both your practice, and the principles upon which you found your practice; as I understand it, in point of religion you are a recreative religionist, and in point of practice you are a tradesman who trade for one half of Sunday?—Yes, of course I have no Sabbatarian views with regard to Sunday; I hold that what is good on one day is good on another, and the rights and conveniences of society are the main thing that have guided me in all my doings.

6442. Then you do not consider that there is any religious character, except in so far as recreation is religion, to be attached to the Sunday?—Not to the Sunday any more than any other day in the week; all days are alike in my mind, and it is not necessary to worship the Almighty either in a building or in any set way. I take my ground very distinctly upon that; I claim not to be irreligious, but my views of religion and yours may be very different.

6443. Are you aware that we have had evidence to the effect that all the measures which have been adopted since the year 1831, for the reduction of the hours of drinking on Sunday, have been attended with a diminution of drunkenness?—I should say that there was a constant diminution of drunkenness, but you would attribute it, I suppose, to a certain extent to the closing of public-houses, whereas I should attribute it to the spread of intelligence and to a cheap press.

6444. But suppose we have the evidence of magistrates and many others who have had very great opportunities of observing, and who connect the two things together, would not you think that some considerable weight was to be attached to their opinion, that every restriction that had been put upon the Sunday opening of public-houses had been attended with a diminution of drunkenness?—I should be sorry to be so presumptuous as to think that I only can see things in a proper way, and set my judgment up as superior to everybody else. If those gentlemen see that connection between the two they see it, and there may be something in it; I will not pretend to say is, or is not; the question with me is, that I see in the general spread of intelligence and of education, so far as it has been brought more readily within the reach of people, and still, inferior as it is, a cause for this improvement, and I think that that has been going down through all society. It is not a question alone of the working men; it is just the same as with noblemen or gentlemen; a drunkard is looked upon as a disgrace in the upper class, and so he is in the lower class. If I get a drunken lodger into my house by accident I very soon get him out again, and so he becomes looked upon as a disgrace, and there is that to correct and to prevent drunkenness, and it is of a far more effective character, I think, than the closing of public-houses on Sunday.

6445. Will you give me a distinct answer; do you believe that those restrictions have not had any effect in the diminishing of drunkenness on Sunday?—I believe that the closing up to one o'clock has decidedly.

6446. Then if its closing up to one o'clock has had that effect, is it not reasonable to believe that yet further restriction would be attended with a further diminution in drunkenness?—I believe that I have already answered that question, or very nearly so.

6447. Then will you answer it again very shortly?—If you want me to answer it very shortly, I say no.

6448. Are you aware that in the whole of Scotland by the Forbes Mackenzie Act the public-houses have been closed even for the sale of liquor during the whole of Sunday, and we have the strongest evidence of a Royal Commissioner as well as of a Member of Parliament, who has been giving us evidence, and who was a Lord Provost of Edinburgh for several years, that that has been attended with a very considerable diminution of drunkenness?—As I have not read all these documents, I will not pretend to answer that as briefly as you may perhaps desire, but I may say this, from what I am informed, that if there is not so much drinking, of what you may call a general character going on there, there is a vast deal of illegitimate drinking going on; methylated spirits are introduced into a number of things.

6449. Chairman.] Do you know that of your own knowledge?—No, I never was in Edinburgh, so that I cannot say; I only hear of it from persons who do know.

6450. Mr. John Abel Smith.] Do you know what is imported by the term methylated spirits?—I know what methylated spirits is, because I use it in my own business.

6451. What is the meaning of the words methylated spirits?—Now you have gone beyond my scholarship.

6452. Mr. Baines.] But are you aware that there not only has been a most signal diminution in the amount of drunkenness in Scotland, but also a very great diminution in the quantity of spirits consumed there?—I believe that there has been a decrease, but I must claim for the decrease in Scotland to a great extent the same cause as in England, namely, the spread of intelligence. It is not so many years ago since it was denounced by a clerical gentleman in Scotland, that it was a deplorable sight to see a man on a Sunday, in his clean shirt, smoking a pipe or taking a walk in the street; it was something abominable; but the Scotch people, I am glad to say, have got so far in advance during the last few years, from the evidence which I have from the most reliable authorities in Scotland, that they have made more progress in regard to free views of the Sunday, and in abolishing those old superstitions during the last ten years than we in England have in 50. That is the evidence of a gentleman from Scotland, and partly to that I should wish to attribute the decrease in drunken habits. I cannot for the life of me separate the two; that a man shall have a taste for art and knowledge and and intellectual culture, and should remain a drunkard I cannot understand.

6453. We are not asking for your opinions, because you have expressed them very strongly; and you make your answers more copious than is necessary for the purpose that we have in view; may I ask whether you have examined the statistics that have been published concerning the uses of drunkenness in Scotland, and the amount of spirits consumed in Scotland with reference to the year in which the Forbes Mackenzie Act came into operation?—I have, but I have not gone into such particulars as to answer it in that way.

6454. If that is so, I think that it shows that our opinion upon the subject, perhaps, is not entitled to very much weight. You probably know that a Royal Commission was appointed to travel over Scotland, and to inquire into the working of the Forbes Mackenzie Act; and that that Royal Commission, after inquiring of all classes of people, reported that the working of the Act was altogether good, and highly popular?—I have not seen the report.

6455. You have spoken considerably of Paris; may I ask if you think that the way of observing the Lord's day in Paris is better, and attended with better effects than the observance of the Lord's day in England?—In giving my answer I must give the reasons for holding my opinion. I am of opinion that it is far better to follow the French fashion, to have an early morning service, and dispose of the religious duties of the day, and leave people free to enjoy themselves in the way they may think proper; that is especially in visiting such places as museums and galleries of art; and I think in the early part of my evidence I spoke of the superior culture and bearing and superior workmanship of the men who had been so brought up. It has been my pleasure to hold conversation with many of them, and I must say that they are vastly superior to those who have been brought up in our national schools, and under our Sunday school system.

6456. Are you aware that the gentleman whose name I have mentioned here, Mr. Leicester, himself a working man, who has lately been over to observe the Paris Exhibition, has given evidence within the last few days before this Committee, that his own opinion with regard to Sunday amusements had been changed by what he had seen in Paris, for that he found that a more pleasure-loving and a more wicked people there was not upon the face of the earth?—I am. I have read his evidence, and with that evidence I have read the evidence of a number of others who went over to Paris, who will speak equally as strongly, the proportion being much larger of those who speak favourably than the one which you have selected as speaking unfavourably of Paris. I have read their evidence in favour of the mode of spending Sunday there.

6457. Do you know that the Roman Catholic Archbishop of Paris has expressed his opinion very publicly that the way of spending Sunday in Paris is very unfavourable to morals and to religion?—I am not aware of what the Archbishop of Paris has said. It is not the Paris Sunday that is asked for in its entirety; no one that I know of asks for such a thing; the question is, whether the opening of national institutions, such as the Louvre and those places, is good, and tends to decrease drunkenness; as to the low saloons and those kind of things in Paris, it is quite contrary to the taste and feeling of English people.

6458. You have stated to us the opinion held by a prefect in Paris; was that the prefect of the department of the Seine?—The letter says: "In answer to your letter of 17th instant, which I only received on Saturday, too late to get the information required, I went to the police master of our arrondissement (district), whom I know, and obtained the following particulars."

6459. Have you heard that the directors of the South Western and Chatham railways have given up their Sunday excursions?—To a certain extent they have.

6460. Is it to a great extent?—Yes, to a great extent.

6461. Has that been on the alleged ground of the evils to their servants, and the drunkenness and disorderliness caused by the excursionists at Dover and Hastings, and other places?—It has not; most positively it has not.

6462. Then am I misinformed upon that point?—You are misinformed.

6463. Do you not consider that the opening of public-houses for consumption on the premises on Sunday evening presents a strong temptation to young persons to form habits of drinking and keeping bad company?—It presents such temptation to the ignorant and uninformed, to those having no self-respect; but the larger class that I come forward to-day to represent, are those who have a sufficient amount of self-respect and independence to make it immaterial to them what amount of temptation of flaring gas or gin palaces is put before their eyes; so long as they can get a glass of ale when they feel that they want it, they are above and beyond temptation.

6464. Then you come forward to represent a class who are beyond the reach of temptation; is that so?—Speaking as a general rule, yes.

6465. Do you not fear that that is rather a limited class?—I do not. I think it is a very growing class and a very extending class.

6466. Mr. Locke.] There are other temptations in the world, are there not, besides drinking?—I believe there are.

6467. Do you think it would be advisable to pass a law with respect to them all, or could it be done?—There are so many matters that must be left entirely to the intelligence of the individual, that I do not see the possibility of legislating to reach them.

6468. And do you think that an attempt at that description of legislation is likely to cause not only inconvenience, but a very strong reaction against the object which the legislation has in view?—The expression that I mentioned of having heard that if the House of Commons were so insane as to pass this Bill they should have to get rid of it, I think goes very far to prove it.

6469. You have been asked questions with regard to the sect, or whatever it is called, of recreative religionists; what are the precise opinions of the recreative religionists; are they confined to the advocacy of innocent recreation on the Sunday, or what is the object of them?—They go on the principle of love to mankind in general, and that you should do unto others as you would have others do unto you.

6470. Then you believe they do that?—Yes, they profess to do it.

6471. All religions profess that, do they not?—Yes.

O O 4

6472. But

Mr. R. M.
Morrell.

8 June 1868.

Mr. R. M.
Morrell.

3 June 1868.

6472. But I wish to know how you propose to carry it out?—The grand principle and design of the movement is to provide people with recreation on the Sunday, that is the modus operandi of the society.

6473. And you say that that would be beneficial?—We do.

6474. With regard to the persons who belong to the recreative religionists, as you call yourselves, are they persons who adopt different religions irrespective of that?—We have no tests.

6475. Mr. John Abel Smith.] Have you no creed?—Our creed and our reasons for faith in it is given in a document, which, had I been aware that I was going to be examined upon this particular branch, I would have brought with me. I had not the slightest idea that the recreative religion question would turn up here, or I would have come provided.

6476. Mr. Locke.] What document are you referring to?—The printed papers that were issued by the society. The president of the society delivered an address, every evening the same address, setting forth the objects and basis of the movement.

6477. The basis of it was explained at St. Martin's Hall, was it not?—Yes, it was explained every Sunday evening by the president previous to the lecture by the learned gentleman who gave the lecture.

6478. What were those lectures; were they not merely for the improvement and instruction of the persons who attended there?—That was the object.

6479. And besides that, there were concerts, were there not?—Yes. Some person has just put into my hand one of the addresses. It is called "The Churches of the Past and the Church of the Future: being a Discourse on the Indifference of the People to the Theological Organisation of the Nineteenth Century; delivered in St. Martin's Hall, February 24th 1867, by J. Baxter Langley, Esq., M.R.C.S., F.L.S.," the president.

6480. At St. Martin's Hall did Sir John Bowring lecture?—Sir John Bowring lectured there, and Dr. Carpenter, Dr. Hodgson, Professor Huxley, Mr. Frederick Harrison; and there were 12 gentlemen altogether who delivered lectures at St. Martin's Hall.

6481. Were those lectures upon different subjects?—They were.

6482. Just tell us some of the subjects?—Sir John Bowring's lecture was on Siam and the Siamese.

6483. Was not a Bill brought in by Lord Amberley last session, to repeal the 21 Geo. 3, c. 49?—It was.

6484. That Act prohibits any house being open for public amusement or debate on the Sunday, to which persons shall be admitted on payment of money; and it enacts that such house shall be deemed a disorderly house, and the keeper thereof shall forfeit 200*l.* for every Sunday the same shall be used as aforesaid; is the case that is now before the courts for decision a case founded upon the infringement of that Act?—It is.

6485. What is the occasion upon which that prosecution was instituted; or rather, is it a prosecution or an action for penalties?—It was an action for penalties for four different evenings, for 200*l.* an evening, against the proprietor of the hall, and also against Mr. Baxter Langley, as the president. Sir Thomas Henry pointed out to the prosecution that, as they professed to go only for nominal damages, and for the trial of the question, the four cases should be knocked into one, and that the real defendant, Mr. Baxter Langley, should be the only defendant.

6486. And a case was submitted for the opinion of the judges?—Yes, of the Court of Common Pleas.

6487. A case under the 21st of Victoria was sent by Sir Thomas Henry to take the opinion of the judges as to whether you had infringed this Act of Parliament?—Yes; Sir Thomas did not send it to the Court of Common Pleas; it was the prosecution that chose that court.

6488. The matter came first before Sir Thomas Henry, and then a case was submitted upon the law for the opinion of the court, and that is what is now pending?—Yes. Sir Thomas Henry pointed out that it was not a case to be tried in the way in which it was brought before him as a magisterial case for committing the lady lessee, as the keeper of a disorderly house; that that was not the proper course to take, but that a case should be submitted upon the law.

6489. Had it anything to do with any particular religion?—Of course, we claim to come under the Toleration Act of Victoria, as being a registered society, to be allowed to let sittings the same as other parties.

6490. Do you claim a right as a religious society to have sittings?—Yes, we do.

6491. But what that religious society is does not exactly appear, inasmuch as you have all sorts and descriptions of lectures on the Sunday evening, for the purpose of improving those who attend?—Yes.

6492. Are you aware that this Act of George the 3rd was passed for the purpose of preventing political meetings on the Sunday evening?—I have understood that it was framed for a very different purpose, and indeed, I have read the debates that took place in the Houses of Lords and Commons on the passing of the Bill, and I find that it was framed for a very different purposes from that to which it is now being applied.

6493. What was that purpose?—For putting down meetings at certain houses in Saville House, Leicester-square, where ladies and gentlemen were in the habit of meeting, and also of suppressing political discussion.

6494. You stated that the Glasnevin Gardens at Dublin are open on the Sunday; is the museum open likewise?—It is, and the National Gallery of pictures also at Dublin.

6495. Then those places are all of them open now on Sunday?—Yes, they are; I may say that previous to the opening of the Glasnevin Gardens a vast number of predictions were made to the Government; it was said that children would not be able to go into them without plucking berries, some of which were poisonous, and that it was predicted that some of the poor little things would be poisoned.

6496. Are you aware that that was carried by Mr. Gregory in the House of Commons in Committee of Supply, when he proposed that the money should not be granted for the purpose of maintaining the gardens unless they were open on Sunday?—Yes.

6497. He moved that as an amendment, and it was carried by the House of Commons?—Yes.

6498. Are you aware whether any inconvenience

Mr. R. M.
Morrell.
8 June 1868.

ence whatever has occurred in consequence?—The curator of the gardens in his various reports has presented the same testimony that has all along been presented by Mr. Hooker at Kew; namely, that the working classes, who are the frequenters of the gardens on the Sunday, commit no damage, and do no wrong.

6499. And your opinion is that the opening of those places is calculated to diminish drunkenness?—It is. As some papers have just been put into my hands which relate rather to a question which was put to me by the honourable Member for Leeds, as to the number of persons travelling on Sunday, I do not know whether I should be at liberty to use them. They are supplied by the companies. The London General Omnibus Company, for instance, gives the number of passengers travelling in all the company's omnibuses on Sunday, from the 1st of April 1866 to the 30th of September, inclusive.

6500. Where did you get that statement from?—From the company itself.

6501. And that you can authenticate?—Yes; it is signed by the secretary, Mr. Church, and it states that 2,882,670 travelled in their omnibuses on the Sundays within that period.

6502. Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen.] Does that mean travelling in London, or out of London?—All persons travelling by that company's omnibuses.

6503. Mr. Locke.] That company is a company within London, is it not?—Yes; but they go to Richmond, and Kew, and Hampton Court, and all those places.

6504. Then it includes London and the environs?—Yes, London and the environs. There is another statement from the Metropolitan Railway: "In reply to your letter of the 5th, I beg to hand you a return of the number of passengers using this railway on Sunday the 15th of July last, the traffic on that day being about the average. I may say that the railway is very largely used by persons going to places of worship. —Your obedient servant, Myles Fenton." The numbers are, first class, 4,167; second class, 10,214; and third class, 40,530, making a total of 54,911.

6505. Mr. John Abel Smith.] Was there a meeting at which you were present at Newington Causeway?—Yes.

6506. What meeting was that?—It was a meeting called by a branch of the National Sunday League, at a certain room there, and the branch left the doors open for the general public; but the room was taken possession of by its being announced from a certain pulpit the previous Sunday, and certain gentlemen were there, who constituted the rather larger half of the meeting.

6507. And you were defeated, were you?—You may call it a defeat, if you please.

6508. Were you in a minority?—Yes; but I may say that we had a larger meeting afterwards. We called a meeting at another room.

6509. When you took care not to have anybody adverse to your views?—I beg your pardon, we did nothing of the sort. Ticket meetings in our association is a thing unknown. We leave them to the gentlemen who cannot do without them. We held a second meeting at a large room that had been a chapel, by St. George's Hall, in St. George's-road, just opposite the horse repository. I think we held two meetings there. At one meeting we had a very close shave, and at the next meeting it was crammed full, and we had a large majority.

6510. Who was in the chair?—Mr. William Allen, the secretary of the amalgamated engineers; this is some years ago.

6511. How long ago?—I really cannot tell you; it is some years ago.

6512. Was the Newington Causeway meeting a long time ago?—You will understand that those meetings have been going on at one time and another during the last 15 years; and I have attended so many that to ask me to fix the date of any particular meeting from memory is more than I can do.

6513. I do not ask you for any exact date; but with regard to this meeting at Newington-causeway at which you had a majority against you, do you know within a certain length of time how long it was ago; is it three years ago, or five years ago, or two years ago, or what?—I should say that it was about three or four years ago.

6514. Are you sure that it more than 18 months?—I want to fix on something to connect it to be able to answer that question, and I have nothing in my own mind just now to connect it with any particular date. It is some two or three years ago, as far as I can say. I think we have held a second meeting at the same room. Dunn's Tailors' Labour Agency Rooms is the room, and we have held more than one meeting there, so that I do not know which you refer to.

6515. What was the exact object of the meeting; was it a meeting tending to express any opinion of working men about Sunday drinking?—No, it had nothing to do with Sunday drinking, except so far as this, that it was to advocate the opening of the national institutions on Sunday.

6516. Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen.] The accuracy of your statements about the canvass in St. Pancras was impugned; that canvass was made by the Alliance, was it not, who are among the advocates of this Bill?—Yes; and I was referred to the Alliance office in the Strand.

6517. I only want to get at this; am I right in supposing that all you meant was to impugn the general accuracy of a canvass made in the manner in which canvasses have been made by the promoters of restriction?—That is all; I contend that this great majority of residents in that street, instead of being treated as neutral or of no opinion, were in reality in opposition to the Bill.

6518. You were asked whether it was a proper thing, and the effect of your evidence was to impugn the general accuracy of those kind of canvasses?—Yes.

Mr. THOMAS WINTERBOTHAM, called in; and Examined.

6519. Mr. Locke.] WHAT is your occupation?—A Licensed Victualler.

6520. Have you been for 36 years engaged in business as a licensed victualler?—I have.

0.69.

6521. About 29 years on your own account?—I have.

6522. Have you been engaged for the last 25 years in all the questions that have been raised upon upon this subject?—I have been engaged for the last 25 years upon almost every public question that has interested the trade of which I am a member, and necessarily upon this subject amongst others.

6523. And likewise you have been engaged with regard to the charitable institutions of the licensed victuallers, have you not?—I have held the office of governor of the Incorporated Society of Licensed Victuallers, which unites that of the chairman of the Licensed Victuallers' School, and also chairman of the committee of the proprietors of the "Morning Advertiser." I have been the chairman of the Protection Society, and I now hold the position of chairman of the Retail Wine and Spirit Sellers' Society.

6524. Were you chairman of the Protection Society when Mr. Wilson Patten introduced his Sunday Closing Bill in 1854?—I was a member of the committee.

6525. Will you be kind enough to tell us what action was taken by that committee in reference to that Bill?—The committee of which I was a member, felt that it was their duty to oppose that measure as being injurious to the trade, and also as being unjust to the public; but in the progress of that Bill through Parliament, we were advised by many of those Members of the House of Commons in whom we had great confidence, that in consequence of the report and recommendations of Mr. Villier's Committee, unless we had accepted something like a compromise, we should get the full recommendations of Mr. Villier's Committee, which would make it even worse, I believe, than was contemplated by the original Bill of Mr. Wilson Patten.

6526. Will you state to the Committee what were the recommendations of Mr. Villier's Committee with respect to closing?—I am not quite clear upon that point, but my impression is that we were to open from one till two in the afternoon, and from six till nine.

6527. You objected to that?—Yes.

6528. Will you state upon what grounds you objected to that?—I understand that the objection taken at that time was, that as far as our trade was concerned, it was such a change as would be injurious to us, and as far as the public were concerned, it was such a change as would be unjust to them; and that there were great wants existing at those hours at which they were intended then to be closed; that those wants legitimately existed, and required a legitimate supply, and that it was unfair and unjust to oblige the houses to close at the hours proposed by Mr. Wilson Patten's Bill in the first instance.

6529. Do you say that you made a compromise upon that occasion?—A compromise was effected upon that occasion, as I have already stated, on the recommendation of gentlemen of the House of Commons, who felt that there was a danger that we should get the worst that was proposed, and therefore I, in common with others who were acting with me, felt that we were doing our duty to the trade, and doing the best we could do for the public (for there was no public organisation at that time), to accept a certain portion of the closing rather than run the risk of a division of the House upon the whole question; the result of our acceptance of that compromise was, that we got into a large amount of disrepute and discredit both with the public in our own houses, and most certainly with the trade which we then represented; there was no other organised association at that time in connection with the trade, and we were the only ones who could adopt anything on the part of the trade; and the trade who were not parties to that compromise, complained most bitterly of the course we had taken, and they adopted a line of conduct which resulted in the establishment of a new association; I may say that the result of that compromise to every man who was associated with it was serious discredit and disrepute, as far as the trade was concerned, from a number of men with whom he was on the most friendly terms, and, as far as the public were concerned, from a number of those customers to whom he was indebted for his business.

6530. At all events, what you did then you did for the best, as you thought?—We thought we did it for the best, and we adhere to it; we did not feel it our duty, having made that compromise, to assist in any movement by which that Bill should be altered, and although a movement was made in which the public joined and shared, by which that Bill was eventually repealed, we had nothing whatever to do with it.

6531. Had the licensed victuallers as a body anything whatever to do with the opposition which was raised to the provisions under that Bill in 1854?—I should think that there was no doubt that the licensed victuallers had something to do with it; I am confining myself expressly to those who were actively associated with the compromise previously effected. I believe that a large portion of the trade, in fact I am satisfied that a large portion of the trade who felt themselves aggrieved, had something to do with the opposition to that measure.

6532. How was that opposition carried out?—I am not sufficiently in the secret to be able to say, but I believe that it was carried out by means of public meetings, and those other ordinary courses which are usually adopted in opposition to any measure which may be felt to be oppressive.

6533. We have heard evidence with respect to what took place in the parks; had the Licensed Victuallers' Protection Society anything whatever to do with that?—Most certainly not; and I will go further, as far as regards the parks, and state that I have made some inquiry with regard to the gentlemen who were actively opposed to us upon that question, and I have had from one in whom I have the highest confidence, a statement, this very day, that they had nothing whatever to do with it, but, on the contrary, it was a demonstration in the park, with which the licensed victuallers of either one side or the other had not the slightest to do.

6534. Can you say by whom it was got up?—I am not in a situation to say, but I believe that it was got up by those who felt that their interest would be seriously injured by the introduction of the measure introduced by the then Lord Robert Grosvenor, and it was certainly assisted to a very great extent by those who felt that their liberties had been interfered with by the Act which was then actually the law of the land.

6535. You state that there was no opposition got up by the licensed victuallers of any description, either by the Protection Society, or by any other body or individuals belonging to the licensed victuallers?—No, not so far as regards the parks, or the riots that took place there.

6536. Have you ever read this Bill?—I have, and I have had some difficulty to understand it.

6537. Have

6537. Have you arrived at some sort of knowledge of what the Bill intends to do?—I believe that the Bill intends, in the first place, to stop entirely the consumption of liquors upon the premises, and I believe it intends to confine the sale for non-consumption from one to half-past two o'clock, and from eight o'clock to ten. I see that there is an exemption made with regard to the metropolitan district, and I have heard it stated in this room that the case of the traveller, as far as the country is concerned, is not to be interfered with, but I am free to admit that I can see no necessity for the introduction of the proviso, as far as regards the metropolitan police district, when the same law as regards the traveller exists in the country and in London, unless there were originally, at least, an intention to prevent a traveller from being supplied throughout the whole country, excepting only the metropolitan district.

6538. Therefore your opinion is, that if this Bill were carried as it at present stands, the privileges of the traveller throughout the country would be abolished?—I shall speak of course with all deference to those legal opinions which have been given in this room, but certainly as far as my common sense reading of it goes, I say that they would be abolished.

6539. If that were so, great inconvenience would arise as far as the country is concerned; that would be the inconvenience to excursionists in that case?—The inconvenience necessarily would be of as great a character as regards the right and of a greater character as regards the middle of the day than was the case under Mr. Wilson Patten's Act. And I am justified in saying, that in the exercise of my business, and from the comments of the public press, and from communications which I have received from many members of our trade, those complaints were not new and far between, but general and powerful; and I believe that the same result would follow this bill as far as the complaints are concerned. I think, that as regards the excursionists, a large number of them arrive much later than they could possibly have the conveniences which even this bill professes to offer to them, because they would be compelled in the first instance to fetch or borrow a jug for the purpose of taking the liquor home, and they may live some of them two or three miles, as I believe a number of them do, in many instances, from the station at which they alight after their Sunday's excursion.

6540. That is, as regards excursionists returning home?—Yes; I am anxious to confine my evidence, if possible, to the metropolis, as I know most about it.

6541. Can you tell us what your experience was after Mr. Wilson Patten's Act passed?—I have endeavoured already to show, as far as my own experience went, that it resulted in a large amount of personal disrepute, discredit, and unpleasantness to all who were associated with the compromise; and as far as my customers were concerned, it resulted in my having a large number of them on the Monday morning complaining that they had knocked at my door on the Sunday night and had to go to bed without their beer for their supper, and in my having to explain to them that it was not my fault, but the fault of the Legislature which had chosen to adopt the Act which was then in force.

6542. Then the complaint was made by persons who wished to have beer and other liquor to be consumed off the premises?—Yes.

6543. At what hour were you required to shut then?—At 10 o'clock, precisely the same hour as is proposed by this bill.

6544. And you think that if the houses were now obliged to be closed at 10 o'clock the same inconvenience would arise?—I do not think there can be a question about it. But there was another inconvenience independent of that going a little further, and that was the inconvenience to a man who wanted to have his glass of ale as he was walking home, having no family in all probability to provide him with it when he got there, and having to go home without it, and go to bed without it, which had been certainly not his usual custom.

6545. Is there a class of persons employed in their business on Sunday to whom it would be inconvenient?—There is a large number of persons who, I venture to think, are legitimately employed, certainly, in earning their livelihood on Sunday, who would be more inconvenienced by this measure, assuming it to pass into a law, than they were by the operation of Mr. Wilson Patten's Act. I may mention amongst them omnibus conductors and drivers, and cabmen, and all that vast mass of stablemen and others connected with those particular classes of business, and especially men employed in gas factories, and last, though certainly not least, I think those who are employed upon the public press, such as printers and compositors, and others, who I believe, from my knowledge of the working of the "Morning Advertiser" (although there may be some exceptions, I hardly expect to hear one), who go to work somewhere about seven in the evening on Sunday, and they do not usually conclude their labour until three or four o'clock on Monday morning. Those I think would be especially inconvenienced, and those I think are entitled to the consideration of the Legislature.

6546. Then it is the Monday paper which causes the work of the Sunday, and not the Sunday paper?—Certainly.

6547. With regard to the Sunday papers, the only persons employed are those who sell them?—Yes, and they are very few.

6548. The persons who prepare them are not employed on Sunday at all?—I should think not, certainly, but I have not any personal experience of Sunday papers.

6549. Then a strict Sabbatarian Act would abolish the Monday paper, although there might be one or two particular individuals who said that they produced all their news on Saturday night, and stopped there, and never published any Sunday news of any sort or kind?—I should think, assuming that there was no work to be done on the Sunday night, we should certainly cease to have anything like a Monday paper with any news of any importance in it as a rule.

6550. And that might be an objection to some newspapers?—I think it is more than probable.

6551. Those persons that you have mentioned, are a very large class of people indeed, are they not?—I believe them to be so.

6552. Is there in addition to them a large class of persons in London, who are living in lodgings, and to whom a public-house on the Sunday, is necessary?—I have no personal knowledge of that, but that argument I recollect was used very strongly by those who were

were opposed to the operation of Mr. Wilson Patten's Act, but of myself, I really do not know it.

6553. Are there not persons living in lodgings who come to Peel's coffee-house on Sunday, to take something to drink?—I do not know that myself, but I know that we are surrounded by a large number of gentlemen who are living only in chambers in the Temple, Clifford's Inn, and neighbourhoods of that description, who I have reason to believe have no other place to go except one of public resort. I believe there are large numbers of gentlemen who go away to their friends on the Saturday night or the Sunday, but still there necessarily must be left a large number of them in town who must obtain their meals at some houses of public resort, but we have not a very large number of them as far as my experience goes.

6554. With regard to the other houses round about that locality, you cannot speak?—No, I am not in a situation to speak about them.

6555. Have you had an opportunity of ascertaining whether or not the habits of the people have improved with regard to drinking?—I believe that the habits of the people have materially improved; in fact, I think taking those usually called the working classes the improvement has been so marked and so steady, that no man who has had anything to do with them could by any possibility have mistaken it. I believe although I am free to admit that the restriction which closed public-houses on Sunday to 1 o'clock after Divine service, was of value to a large portion of the working classes, still I believe that the improvement that has taken place in them, has resulted from the spread of education, and resulted from their desire to do better for themselves than they used to desire. I believe that very much to be attributed to that. I am not here going for one moment either to deny or to decry the efforts of religion, which have been made with reference to them, but I believe that one of the best and most important agents in the improvement of the social habits of the people has been the means which they have had of getting away from town on the Sunday, thus invigorating their bodies and improving their minds. I believe that to have been one of the most powerful agents that we have had; it has improved their social and moral position; it has increased their self-respect, and induced them to desire one man to appear as good as his neighbour, and has had an effect of a most important character.

6556. If this Bill were passed into a law, would not its provisions cause great inconvenience to all that class of persons whom you have enumerated, and who have had such benefits conferred upon them by leaving London on the Sunday?—I cannot conceive but what it must be so.

6557. Of course if they leave London on the Sunday they cannot be out in the open air all day; they must go into some place for refreshment?—They would do then, or they would desire to do then, what they customarily do now. Numbers of them, I believe, take down their own provisions, and a number of them one shade higher in the social scale, by which I mean the moderately-positioned class of tradesmen who enjoy themselves on Sunday in that way, go into a house according to their means, calculating the cost by its appearances and its accommodation, and there have that which they feel to be a necessity, or assuming that they do not feel it to be a necessity, what they consider to be a legitimate enjoyment.

6558. If there is no exception in this Bill made for the traveller, of course that inconvenience would be entire and complete?—Perfectly so.

6559. They would not be able to go into any place at all?—No.

6560. But supposing the law were to exist after the passing this Bill precisely in the same way as it does now, have you any experience as to the inconvenience to persons who go out into the country upon an excursion and endeavour to obtain entrance into public-houses within the limited hours?—The law regulating the conduct of licensed victuallers with regard to travellers has been so long a vexed and difficult question, that, notwithstanding the decision which has been referred to, I think by yourself, in this room there are a very large number of the trade who dread, from various influences of the magistracy and the authorities around them, even now, to open their houses unless they can be certainly guaranteed that the man is a traveller, and comes something like what they believe to be a reasonable distance, difficulties even now exist, notwithstanding that decision.

6561. Would it not be almost impossible for the generality of persons who go out upon excursions on the Sunday to prove to a licensed victualler that they were bonâ fide travellers?—It would be a very great difficulty for them to do so. There are numbers who walk, and who may walk some long distances, but I do not think that the majority of our trade would be disposed to accept that interpretation of a traveller, and I am afraid that the magistrates would not be so either, assuming the police summoned a person for that offence.

6562. Therefore, if the hours were as proposed by the Bill, with the exception of the traveller, even supposing the Bill is more favourable to the traveller than some of us imagine it is, a person would have no opportunity whatever of getting any refreshment in a house of any kind, sort, or description upon the Sunday, unless it was shown that he was a bonâ fide traveller?—Much of that would depend upon the mode in which the traveller question was carried out in the various towns to which excursionists go; I believe the practice of the authorities in various of our large towns, to which the long trains especially go, differs very materially as to the time at which they think a house should be open; I think that there are some of the watering places, especially where they do not object to those houses being opened as a rule on a Sunday morning, even now; but I believe that there are others where they are more strict and more particular, and they apply the exception in favour of the traveller only to the latter part of the day.

6563. Do you think that there has been a good result in the way of temperance from the education of the people, and do you think that there is an increasing desire to improve their condition of life amongst them?—Yes, I think so.

6564. And you think that the facilities of leaving London by railway and steamboat on Sunday has accelerated that improvement?—I think very much so.

6565. Have you ascertained what is the number of charges before the police for drunkenness?—I had occasion to look over some documents that were, I believe, forwarded to the honourable members of this house, and if my memory serves me aright, taking the population of London, which is something like 4,000,000, I do not think there were more than 2,000 persons charged with drunkenness, and crimes arising out of drunkenness, within 12 months.

6566. Do you consider that there would be an impracticability on the part of the licensed vicarallers to carry out this Bill if it were passed into an Act?—I think that the Committee will feel that my long experience would suggest to me some mode by which it might be done, but I am free to admit, and I have looked at it with the greatest possible care, that I see a large amount of impracticability about it. I see in the first place a great difficulty about preventing anyone who may get certainly his malt liquor in a glass from drinking it, and those with whom he may come in within the shop. I should see a great difficulty about ejecting a man from my house with his own beer, even if it was in my jug, because he gave it away, and even if it was in my house, and I think that that is one very especial difficulty that necessarily would arise in the carrying out of this Bill, assuming it were to become law. I think there is another very great difficulty, and one that will create for the trade, of which I am a member, even a greater difficulty than that vexed question of the bonâ fide traveller; and I certainly must express a hope that if the Legislature passes this measure, it will at least define what is a bonâ fide meal, because I find by this Bill it is proposed to be the law that a man within the Metropolitan district is to be allowed to have, and the trader is to serve him with intoxicating liquors, most of which are articles in which we deal during the time he is partaking of a bonâ fide meal. I am free to admit that I cannot by any possibility find any rule that I could exercise for my own conduct, or give to my young men in the exercise of their duty by which they could ascertain what a bonâ fide meal was, and how long a man was taking it, or when they were to begin to serve him, and when they were to leave off serving him; and yet I should be subject to some penalties for not being able to know what I ought to do; and assuming this Bill ever to pass into a law, I hope the House of Commons will at least in its wisdom interpret that for us.

6567. Do you think that it would be evaded by persons who were entitled to come in and take a meal?—With regard to evasion, I may just say this: that I think that this broad principle may be adopted, that where there is an undue and unnecessary restriction evasion is sure to follow, and that numbers of men, in fact, by the majority of men who are not influenced by the strictest possible principle will not feel that they are committing any crime in evading a law; to the action of which they object, as trenching upon their personal liberties. I believe that with regard to a bonâ fide meal the Act would be evaded to even a greater extent than I believe the question of a bonâ fide traveller is now evaded; and I believe that to be the case in a large number of towns even now. That is a difficulty which certainly I can by no possibility see any mode of treating and providing for; and I think that the fact of having no means of obtaining liquor within a public-house would be an inducement to a number of people to take it home; and when taking it home, although having taken it home with the best motives and best intentions, a number of others, with whom they are associated, would be calling, and I think that it would be hard work for them to refuse, more particularly if they felt that a man was wanting it, or who ever called was wanting it, the result of which would be, that what was done in one man's house on one Sunday would be done in another man's house on another Sunday; and I think the broadest and best principle that can be adopted is, that the sale of all articles in which we deal should be as open and as public as it is possible for it to be. I believe such to be a prevention to a large amount of impropriety that would otherwise ensue if the same article is consumed away from the eyes of those who have the responsibility of keeping their house in order, so much as there is depending upon it, and it is transferring it only to where a man is perfect master of his own house.

6568. You think that there is a greater restraint to persons when they go into a public-house where they have the eye of the person who keeps it upon them, than there necessarily would be if they took the liquor home and drank it in secret?—I believe that such would be the rule. I believe secret drinking to be the most baneful mode by which they can consume the articles in which we deal.

6569. A great many petitions have been presented against this Bill; can you state the time during which those petitions were presented?—Perhaps I may be allowed to state to the Committee that some differences of opinion existed amongst those who felt it their duty to oppose this measure on behalf of our trade, but, eventually, the number of petitions that were continually pouring into the House of Commons in favour of the measure was of such a character that the Committee felt that it was their duty to test public opinion to the best of their ability as to whether or not the feeling was altogether on one side of the question, and we found that the question of petitions was assuming so much importance that we felt it was necessary that we too should represent or give the public an opportunity of representing to the House of Commons, at least that portion of the public who did not agree with the desirability of closing public-houses on Sunday, that we should give them an opportunity also of expressing their opinions. I may say that we did that because we could see that there was a large organisation employed on the other side; that the public, as a rule, unless led by some of those in whom they have confidence, have but little organisation of their own, and that we felt it was necessary to supply them with the means of expressing their opinion to the House, as in contradistinction to the means which were so readily supplied by those on the other side of the question, who had a large and important influence amongst them. I may just state that the result of these petitions was this. I will tell the Committee exactly that those petitions came into the hands of those who were actually engaged in opposition to this measure; that they were watched with the most scrupulous care, and instructions of a most expressive character were given as to the mode in which those signatures should be obtained, and that every petition bearing upon its face the appearance of anything like having been improperly signed, or anything contrary to the rules of the House of Commons, was examined petition by petition, and whenever a doubt existed those petitions were

Mr.
T. Winter-
botham.

8 June 1868.

were thrown aside, otherwise the signatures, I believe, would have been much larger than even those which we presented. I may also state that that result was accomplished in three weeks, and I may add to that that a very large number more of signatures would have been obtained had the parties who were actively engaged in it not been met with this statement. The House of Commons, after the experience of Colonel Wilson Patten's Act, never will again venture upon a species of legislation like this, and your opposition is absurd and ridiculous; it is useless for you to engage in this trouble. And I may say that in that statement a large number of members of our own trade shared, who had petitions sent to them for the purpose of obtaining signatures; they never unfolded them, and never took the slightest means to obtain signatures to them. I do not say all, but I say a large number of them did so, upon precisely the same ground that the fear of the measure passing this House was perfectly ridiculous and absurd.

6570. What was the number of signatures to the petitions?—Nearly 500,000 signatures.

6571. With regard to the mode in which the canvass has been taken, have you adopted any means of verifying the statement that was made by one of the witnesses here, as to a house-to-house canvass which took place, commencing at Lambeth, and going round to London Bridge?—I have done so; but I would just like, with regard to those petitions, to hand in the suggestions and instructions that were given to those gentlemen who had petitions entrusted to them for signature: "Suggestions to gentlemen undertaking to procure signatures to petitions against Mr. J. Abel Smith's Bill. 1. The sheet on which the words of the petition are written must contain three or four signatures. 2. Let everything be bonâ fide; no children or young persons ought to sign. 3. Make it the special business of some one in your establishment to see that this is done. 4. Keep the petitions clean; blotting paper is provided. 5. Return the petitions, as numerous signed as possible, to Mr. J. F. Homer, Chairman of the Licensed Victuallers' Protection Society, temporary offices, 1, Great College-street, Westminster, without delay. 6. If you have not a sufficient supply of petitions, and the sheets for signatures, apply to me at once, and your wants will be immediately supplied."

6572. Have you anything further to say about the petitions?—Nothing further that strikes me.

6573. With regard to the statement with respect to the house-to-house canvass which we have heard of in that district, have you anything to say to the Committee?—I was present when the Rev. Mr. Murphy gave evidence with respect to the canvass of a large number of workshops and a large number of streets and courts. From my own personal knowledge of the number of men employed in several of those workshops, and likewise from my personal knowledge of the number of houses in the several streets which he mentioned, I felt that there was no comparison between the number signing both for and against and neutral, as represented by the Rev. Mr. Murphy; and also that there was no comparison between the number of houses in the streets he named in the same way for, against, and neutral, and I therefore felt it my duty to ask from the Protection Society some assistance to ascertain for myself with reference to those particular workshops something concerning them, and also with reference to the number of streets.
